

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

COBBETT'S

CHARLES I.—A.D. 1625.

NO sooner had Charles taken into his hands the reins of government (March 27th, 1625), than he issued his writs, dated April 2, for summoning a new parliament on the 7th of May. But on account of the arrival of the princess Henrietta of France, whom the king had espoused by proxy, it was again prorogued to the 13th of June, and from thence to the 18th of the same month.

The King's Speech on opening the Session.]
June 18. The King being seated on the throne, the Lords in their robes, and the Commons present below the bar, his majesty commanded prayers to be said; and, during the time of prayers, his majesty put off his crown, and kneeled by the chair of estate. Then it pleased his majesty to declare the cause of the summons of this parliament, in manner following:

"My lords spiritual and temporal, and you gentlemen of the house of Commons, in this parliament assembled; I thank God, that the business to be treated on at this time is of such a nature, that it needs no eloquence to set it forth; for I am neither able to do it, nor doth it stand with my nature to spend much time in words. It is no new business, being already happily begun by my father of blessed memory, who is with God; therefore it needeth no narrative.—I hope in God you will go on to maintain it, as freely as you advised my father to do it. It is true, he may seem to some to have been slack to begin so just and so glorious a work; but it was his wisdom that made him loth to begin a work, until he might find a means to maintain it: but after that he saw how much he was abused in the confidence he had with other states, and was confirmed by your advice to run the course we are in, with your engagements to maintain it, I need not press to prove how willingly he took your advice; for, the preparations that are made, are better able to declare it, than I to speak it. The assistance of those in Germany, the fleet that is ready for action, with the rest of the preparations, which I have only followed my father in, do sufficiently prove, that he entered, not superficially, but really and heartily, into this action.—My lords and gentlemen; I hope that you do remember, that you were pleased to employ me to advise my father, to break off those two Treaties that were now on foot; so that I cannot say, that I came hither a free unengaged man. It is true, I came into this business willingly and freely, like a young man, and consequently rashly; but it was by your interest, your engagements: so that though it were done like a young man, yet I cannot repent me of it, and I think none can blame me for it, knowing the love and fidelity you have ever born to your kings; having myself, likewise, some little experience of your affections. I pray you remember, that this being my first action, and begun by your advice and intreaty, what a great dishonour it were both to you and me, if this action, so begun, should fail of that assistance you are able to give me. Yet knowing the constancy of your love both to me and this business, I needed not to have said this, but only to shew what care and sense I have of your honours and mine own.—I must intreat you likewise to consider of the times we are in, how that I must adventure your lives, which I should be loth to do, should I continue you here long; and you must venture the business, if you be slow in your resolutions. Wherefore I hope you will take such grave and wise counsel, as you will expedite what you have in hand to do: which will do me and yourselves an infinite deal of honour; you, in shewing your love to me; and me, that I may perfect that work which my father hath so happily begun.—Last of all, because some malicious men may, and, as I hear, have given out, that I am not so true a keeper and maintainer of the true Religion that I profess; I assure you, that I may with St. Paul say, that I have been trained up at Gamaliel's feet: and although I shall never be so arrogant as to assume unto myself the rest, I shall so far shew the end of it, that all the world may see, that no man hath been, nor ever shall be more desirous to maintain the religion I profess, than I shall be.—Now because I am unfit for much speaking, I mean to bring up the fashion of my predecessors, to have my Lord Keeper speech for me in most things: therefore I have commanded him to speak something unto you at this time, which is more for formality, than any great matter he hath to say unto you."

The Lord Keeper's Speech.] Then the Lord Keeper, Williams, added, "That the king's main reason of calling the parliament, besides the beholding of his subjects faces, was to remind them of the great engagements for the recovery of the Palatinate, imposed on his majesty by the late king his father, and by themselves, who brake off the two Treaties with Spain. Also to let them understand, That the succeeding treaties and alliances, the armies sent into the Low Countries, the repairing of the forts, and the fortifying of Ireland, do all meet in one centre, the Palatinate; and that the Subsidies granted in the last parl. are herein already spent, whereof the Account is ready, together with as much more of the king's own revenue. His lordship further commended three circumstances to their considerations: 1st, The Time; all Europe being at this day as the pool of Bethesda, the first stirring of the waters must be laid hold on: wherefore his maj. desires them to bestow this first meeting on him, or rather on their actions; and the next shall be theirs, as soon, and as long as they please, for domestic business: 2ndly, The Supply; if Subsidies be thought too long and backward, his maj. desires to hear, and not to propound the manner thereof: 3rdly, The Issue of this Action; which being the first, doth highly concern his majesty's honour and reputation, for which he relies upon their loves, with the greatest confidence that ever king had in his subjects; witness his royal posey, 'Amor civium regis munimentum.' and he doubts not, but as soon as he shall be known in Europe to be their king, so soon shall they be known to be a loving and loyal nation to him."

The Speaker's Speech.] June 20. The commons presented sir Thomas Crew, knight, sergeant at law, for their Speaker; who made his formal excuse; but being confirmed in his office, he addressed himself to the throne in words to this effect: "He first protested that he undertook the office of Speaker, in obedience only to his maj.; he remembered the proceedings in the last most happy parl. in which it pleased the late king, of famous memory, to ask the advice of his people; and expressed their joy that God, who hath the power of the hearts of kings, directed his maj. that now is, to proceed in the like parliamentary course. That, as a woman forgets her sorrow at the birth of a man child, so they, when his maj. was placed on his father's throne. And shewed their hopes, that as good king Hezekiah, was five and twenty years of age, and having a wise and great council, when he began to reign, and, at his first entrance, shewed his zeal to God and his care for Religion; so his maj. being of the same age, and having a faithful people to advise him, will maintain true religion and the antient laws, so much esteemed in all ages. In this, he said, their hopes were the greater, for that his maj. begins with a parliament. And remembered his father's charge to maintain our religion, and God's merciful power to bring his maj. back out of danger when he was in a strange land, and their sorrow for his then absence, and exceeding great joy at his safe return; and humbly besought his maj. That now God had put the sword into his hand, he would extend it for the Recovery of the Palatinate, so dishonourably gotten and kept by hostile arms; which was anciently a refuge for religion; and not to suffer those locusts the Jesuits to eat up the good fruits of this land. He acknowledged his maj.'s stem to be lineally descended from Lucius, the first British king that embraced the gospel; and concluded with the accustomed petitions for freedom from arrests, 'eundo, sedendo, et redeundo,' during this parliament; for freedom of speech in their consultations; not doubting but to confine themselves within the limits of duty and modesty; access to his maj. on all needful occasions; and a benign interpretation of all their actions, and of this his speech in particular."

The Lord Keeper's Answer] The Lord Keeper, having first had conference with the king, answered to this effect: "That his maj. had amply accepted the Speaker's obedience, though he refused his sacrifice. That he remembered the last parl. to be happy; as it was so accounted by the late king, so esteemed by his maj. and so it proved by the event, in which the two Treaties with Spain were dissolved, and so many gracious laws enacted. It became the late king so to close his government; in which parl. our present king being a principal actor, he can never forget the desires of the Commons nor the wishes of the Lords.—That his maj. takes in good part mr. Speaker's observation of the five circumstances of his entrance to the crown; as that he began with a parl.; that he came to us with noble blood, being lineally descended from the ancient British kings; that his succession sweetened the loss of his glorious father; that God was with him in a strange land, and delivered him from thence; even as God was with Moses so be he always with his maj. to which let all say Amen. And, lastly, that his maj. professes the true religion, it being the last blessing his father gave him to have a special care thereof. As mr. Speaker recommends to his maj. the laws of the land; so he also recommends the same to the lawyers; that they study the ancient laws themselves, and not the abridgements. And whereas you represent to his maj. that unjust acquisition of the Palatinate, the dishonour of our nation, no man can but be sensible of his maj.'s care for the recovery thereof; he having given a lively representation of his affection to it himself the other day in this place. He now hopes that ye who first drew him into this action will give him such Supplies as will enable him to perform it.' And, as touching the Banishment of those Locusts the Priests and Jesuits, his majesty commends that saying of S^c

Ambrose, 'That the poorest man hath interest in Religion.' Yet, he desires you to trust him with the manner thereof, and he will be careful to give you good satisfaction of his zeal therein. Lastly, as touching mr. Speaker's petitions for your privileges, his maj. grants them all without any limitation; knowing well that yourselves will punish the abuses thereof."

The Commons appoint a Fast among themselves.] The first business done, in the house of commons, was to appoint a solemn Fast amongst themselves.* It had been the custom in several late parliaments to begin in the same manner, but now it was, more particularly, urged, on account of the general Plague which was round them.

Motion for a good Harmony between King and Parliament.] June 22d. Sir B. Rudyard spoke to this effect: "That the late distates between the late king and parliament, were the chief cause of all the miseries of the kingdom. The first turn of which, towards a reconciliation, was given by the now king, then prince; by which accrued more benefit to the subject, than in any parliament these many hundred years. What may we then expect from him, being king, and having power in his own hands? his good natural disposition; his freedom from vice; his travels abroad; his being bred in parliaments promised greatly. Therefore, he moved to take such course now to sweeten all things between king and people, that they may never afterwards disagree."

Sir Edw. Coke moved, "That there might be no Committees for Grievances or Courts of Justice; first, in respect of the Plague; next, because this was the very beginning of the new king's reign, in which there can be no Grievances as yet; 3rdly, because the Petition against Grievances, in the last parliament of the late king, was preferred too late; only to petition for an Answer to these. For, though the Prince is gone the king liveth; no Interregnum."

The rest of this day's debates turned, chiefly on raising a Supply, and the old topic of putting the laws in execution against Jesuits, Popish Priests, &c. The Solicitor General acquainted the House, "That the king had taken care of their Grievances preferred the last parliament; and, at any one day the house would assign, satisfaction would be given them therein."

The Plague still raging more and more, in and about London, made the members of both houses very uneasy in their situation at Westminster; some of them taking notice, that the bell was tolling every minute, whilst they were speaking. At the petition of both houses, the king proclaimed a general Fast, all over the kingdom, on a certain day; and his maj. in person, went with the two houses to prayers and sermon, at St. Margaret's church in Westminster.

July 4. Sir Edw. Coke reported the king's Answer to the Commons Petition, about a recess from parliament, at this sickly season: "That the king had taken their safety, which he valued more than his own, into consideration; and when he should hear the Commons were ready with their bills (for he would not hasten them in any thing,) he would put an end to this session."

The Lords reject the Bill of Tonnage.] July 5. The bill for granting two entire Subsidies, passed the commons; Tonnage and Poundage was also given; but because it was limited for one year, whereas former grants to his majesty's predecessors were for life, the house of lords would not pass it. It was also declared, "That the intention and resolution of the house was, as in the act of Subsidy, 21 Jac. that all charges mentioned there, are to be deducted out of the Subsidies and Fifteenths, and to be paid according to that act."

Complaint against Dr. Montagu.] July 7. An affair came on in the House of Commons, which made a considerable noise at this time. A Complaint had been made there against one dr. Montagu, for printing and publishing a book, called "An Appeal to Cæsar." The Recorder of London, one of the committee appointed to examine into this matter, made a report, "That the abp. of Canterbury had censured the said dr. Montagu for a former book,* and had told him, that tho' there were some things in it which might receive a favourable interpretation; yet there were others in it not of that nature. In which the committee all agreed, That the abp. had done what was fitting: but they were of opinion, That there were many things contained in the doctor's book directly contrary to the Articles of Religion established by parliament; as, that the Church of Rome was 'vera Christi ecclesia, & sponsa Christi;' and that the said church 'endem fundamenta doctrinæ & sacramentorum nititur.' That the committee held this second book as factious and seditious, tending manifestly to the dishonour of the late king, and the disturbance of both church and state. For the first, he denies that Arminius was the first that infected Leyden with errors and schisms: that the Synod of Dort, so honoured by the late king, was slighted by him; calls it 'forinsecus,' and partial; he knows not what ends they had, nor cares for them: He directs his book to the present king, and calls it 'Appello Cæsarem,' and yet says the Pope is not Antichristus; which is contrary to what the late king himself had wrote to all Christian princes. The committee think that there is enough in this book to put a jealousy between the king and his well-affected subjects. Says there are some amongst us that desire an Anarchy, and means

* In the year 1581, the Commons having appointed a Fast, by their own authority, the queen highly resented it as an intrusion upon her authority ecclesiastical, see Vol. I. p. 811.

the Puritans, whom yet he hath not defined. He plainly intimates that there are Puritan bishops; which the committee conceived tended much to the disturbance of the peace in church and state. He respects Bellarmine, but slighted Calvin, Beza, Perkins, Whitaker, and Reynolds. In his book he much discountsenances God's Word, disgraces lectures and lecturers, and preaching itself; nay, even reading the bible. That never a saint-seeming, bible-bearing, hypocritical Puritan was a better patriot than himself. That the whole frame of the book was to encourage Popery; in maintaining the Papists to be the true church, and that they differ not from us in any fundamental point. If therefore they hold us heretics, and not to be saved, and we hold the contrary of them, who will not think it safer for us to be in their church than in ours? The Papists read, and commend this book to others to be read; whereas they suffer none of ours to be read amongst them. Lastly, He had done an injury to that house in two points: That when he knew his first book was there questioned, and referred to the abp. of Canterbury for censures, he prints a new book worse than the former. And whereas a petition had been preferred to this house by one Yates and Ward, he says they are Puritans, altho' they have subscribed the Articles; and to revile them for this, is a reflection upon the House."—Upon the question it was resolved, That, at their next meeting, the lords should be acquainted with these books, and a conference to be prayed with their lordships about them: likewise for a touch, as it is termed, to commit him to the custody of the serjeant at arms, to answer his contempt in the next session. But the king sending a message to the house, that dr. Montagu, being his servant and chaplain in ordinary, he had taken the cause into his own hand; wished they would enlarge him, and that he would take care to give the house satisfaction in it; the doctor, upon giving in bail of 2000l. was discharged out of custody.

Lord Conway represents the State of foreign Affairs.] July 11th, the day that both houses desired a recess, on account of the Plague, after a motion to that purpose, the Commons ordered, "That their house should be called over the third day of the next meeting, and those members that were absent should incur the censure of the house." Afterwards, being informed by the lords, that a commission was come to them to pass the bills, and adjourn the houses, the Speaker went up with the rest; and, upon presenting the Subsidy bill, which, he said, was "the first fruits of their love," the lord Conway, secretary of state, spoke to this purpose; "He signified the king's gracious acceptance of the bill of two Subsidies; yet, that the necessity of the present affairs were not therewith satisfied, but required their further counsels. He reminded them that the late king was provoked beyond his nature, to undertake a war for the recovery of his children's ancient patrimony; that the charges of this war appeared, by computation, to amount unto 700,000l. a year; to support the Netherlands, and to prevent the emperor's designs of concluding with the princes of Germany, utterly to exclude the Palgrave; he levied an army under Count Mansfield; the kings of Denmark and Sweden, and the princes of Germany, levied another; France, Savoy, and Venice, joined together for a war of diversion; and, lastly, to uphold the Netherlands, the charges of Mansfield's and the Danish army must yet continue."—The Lord Keeper then told the houses, "That his maj. had received their Petition about Religion, and had answered it, in some measure, before; but now he had done it to the full;" which Petition and Answer will appear in the sequel. Afterwards the two houses adjourned to the 1st of August next, at Oxford.

The King's Speech.] Aug. 1. The parliament met at Oxford; and, on the 4th, the lords and commons were commanded to attend the king, in the Great Hall at Christ Church; where he spake to them as followeth:

"My lords, and you of the Commons; We all remember, that, from your desires and advice, my father, now with God, brake off those two Treaties with Spain that were then in hand: well you then foresaw, that, as well for regaining my dispossessed brother's inheritance, as home defence, a war was likely to succeed; and that as your counsels had let my father into it, so your assistance, in a parliamentary way, to pursue it, should not be wanting. That aid you gave him by advice, was for succour of his allies, the guarding of Ireland and the home parts, supply of Munition, preparing and setting forth of his Navy. A council you thought of, and appointed for the war, and treasurers for issuing of the monies: and, to begin this work of your advice; you gave three subsidies, fifteenths, and tenths; which, with speed, were levied, and, by direction of that council of war (in which the preparation of this Navy was not the least) disbursed.—It pleased God, at the entrance of this preparation, (by your advice begun) to call my father to his mercy, whereby I entered as well to the care of your design, as his crown. I did not then, as princes do, of custom and formality re-assemble you, but that, by your further advice and aid, I might be able to proceed in that which, by your counsel, my father was engaged in. Your love to me, and forwardness to further those affairs, you expressed by a Grant of two Subsidies, yet ungathered; although I must assure you, by myself and others, upon credit taken up, and beforehand disbursed; but all far too short, as yet, to set forth the Navy now preparing; as I have lately found by Estimate of those of care and skill employed about it. Before you could be acquainted fully with these necessities of further aid, it pleased God to visit the place of your assembly then with a grievous Plague. To stay you in that danger had been a neglect of my just care, and to prorogue the parliament had been to destroy the enterprize: I therefore adjourned you to this place; a place then free from that infection, with which it hath pleased God since also to visit. Here, then, to hold you long against your own desires, were to express little care of your safeties; and to adjourn it, without your further helps, were to destroy the preparations already made: I therefore leave the care of both to your elections, resolutions, and answers; only acquainting you with my own opinion, which is, That it is better far, both for your honours and mine, that, with hazard of half the fleet, it be set forth, than, with the assured loss of so much provision, it be stayed at home. The whole particular of all Expences about this Preparation shall be laid before you, when you shall be pleased to overlook them, and the Lord Treasurer, with other ministers employed, shall acquaint you with them."

Lord Conway and Sir John Cooke declare the State of the King's Affairs.] After his maj. had ended this speech, he commanded his secretaries, the lord Conway and sir John Cooke, more particularly to declare the present State of his Affairs; which they did to this effect: "That our sovereign lord king James, of famous memory, at the suit of both houses of parliament, and by the powerful operation of his maj. that now is, gave consent to break off the two Treaties with Spain, touching the Match and the Palatinate: That it was then foreseen a war would ensue, there being no other means to recover the Palatinate, nor to vindicate the many wrongs and scorns done unto his majesty and his royal children: besides, if the king of Spain was suffered to proceed in his conquests, under pretence of the Catholic Cause, he would become the Catholic Monarch, which he so much affects, and aspires unto. Also amidst these necessities, our late king considered that he might run a hazard with his people, who being so long injured to peace, were unapt to war; that the uniting with other provinces in this undertaking, was a matter of exceeding difficulty. This drew him to new treaties for regaining his children's right, which were expelled by the friends and agents of Spain; and wherein his majesty proceeded as far as the wisest prince could go, and suffered himself to be won unto that, which otherwise was impossible for his royal nature to endure. He considered also the many difficulties abroad; the duke of Bavaria, by force and contract, had the Palatinate in his own possession; most of the electors and princes of Germany were joined with him; the estates of other princes, most likely to join in a War of Recovery, were seized and secured, and all by a conquering army: besides, the emperor had called a diet, in which he would take away all possibility of recovering the honour and inheritance of the Palatinate: thus it stood in Germany. And, in France, the king there chose to sheath his sword in the bowels of his own subjects, rather than to declare against the Catholic Cause. In the Low Countries, the sect of the Arminians prevailed much, who inclined to the Papists rather than to their own safety, notwithstanding that the enemy had a great and powerful army near them; so that his majesty was enforced to protect and countenance them with an army of 6000 men from hence, with a caution of repayment of the Charges, and the like Supply further, if required. Moreover, he sought alliance with France, by a Match for his royal majesty that now is, thereby to have interest in that king, and to make him a party. The last consideration was his majesty's own honour, who had laboured with the two kings of Denmark and Sweden, and the German princes, from whom he received but cold answers, they refusing to join, unless they first saw his majesty in the field: but of this he was very tender, unless the league was broken, or he first warred upon. The forces of an army were considered, and the way of proceeding, whether by invasion or diversion: the Charges thereof appeared in parliament to be 700,000*l.* a year; besides Ireland was to be fortified, the Forts here repaired, and a Navy prepared, he thought it feasible to enter into a league with the French king, and the duke of Savoy and Venice. Hereupon an army was committed to count Mansfield, the charge whereof came to 20,000*l.* a month for his majesty's part; also he commanded the preparing of this great fleet: all which so heartened the princes of Germany, that they sent ambassadors to the kings of Denmark and Sweden, and those two kings offered a greater army, both of horse and foot, to which his maj. was to pay a proportion. Count Mansfield's army, though disastrous, produced these happy effects: 1. It prevented the Diet intended by the emperor: 2. The German princes gained new courage to defend themselves and oppose their enemies: 3. The king of Denmark hath raised an army, with which he is marched in person as far as Minden: 4. The confederates of France and Italy have prosecuted a war in Milan, and Peace is now made by the French king with his own subjects; so that by this army, breath is given to our Affairs.—This parliament is not called in meer formality upon his now majesty's first coming to the crown; but upon these real occasions: two Subsidies are already given, and graciously accepted; but the monies thereof, and much more, are already disbursed. A Fleet is now at sea, and hastening to their rendezvous, the Army is ready at Plymouth, expecting their commanders. His majesty's honour, religion, and the kingdom's safety, is here engaged; besides, he is certainly advised of designs to infest his dominions in Ireland, and upon our own coasts, and of the enemy's increase of shipping in all parts. These things have called the parliament hither, and the present Charge of all amounts to above 400,000*l.* the further prosecution whereof, the king being unable to bear, hath left it to their consultations. His maj. is verily persuaded, that there is no king that loves his subjects, religion, and the laws of the land, better than himself; and likewise, that there is no people that better love their king; which he will cherish to the uttermost. It was thought that this place had been safe for this assembly; yet, since the sickness hath brought some fear thereof, his maj. willeth the lords and commons to put into the ballance, with the fear of the sickness, his and their great and weighty occasions.

The Commons resume the Complaint against Dr. Montagu. On the first day of the session, the affair of Dr. Montagu's books was renewed in the commons by sir Edw. Coke and others. The serjeant at arms told the house, that he had the doctor's bond of 2000*l.* for his appearance; but that he had lately got a letter from him, that he was sick of the stone: On which the serjeant was ordered to produce both the bond and the letter. The Solicitor General begg'd leave to put the house in mind of his majesty's message to them before the last recess; and moved to acquaint the king with the particulars and consequences of the Book, and doubted not but they would have leave to send for him. Hereupon a debate arose, Whether any of the king's servants might be questioned in that house? Mr. Alford urged the danger of such an exemption; and others named some instances where they had; as, particularly, the case of sir Tho. Parry, who was a privy councillor, whom the king desired might be left to him; but the house would not consent, but expelled him. Mr. Wentworth (afterwards Earl of Strafford) mentioned the lord chancellor Bacon's and the lord treasurer Middlesex's cases, whom this house dealt with; he said Montagu reproached Bible-bearers, which was the Arms of that University; and moved to proceed against him for a contempt of that house. This was agreed to, and to pray a conference with the lords about it; not to meddle with his tenets, but to leave them to the bishops. The serjeant was commanded, at his peril, to bring dr. Montagu to the house, with all convenient speed, and he to stand committed till he shall be discharged by the house.

Debate on a Motion for the Supply. Aug. 5. The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved for the supply; which, he said, must be two Subsidies, and two Fifteenths, for that less would not serve for the present occasions.

Sir S. Weston urged to know the cause for this Supply, and the enemy against whom the preparations were destined: and that the estates of the papists, who contributed to their enemies, may be speedily looked into to supply the king.

Sir Edw. Coke said: 'Necessitas affectata, invincibilis, & improvida.' The two last, he said, break all laws and orders, and must be supplied: but, if their necessities came by providence, then there existed no such cause to give. 'Neutralitas nec amicos parit nec inimicos tollit. Commune periculum, commune auxilium.' No king can subsist in an honourable estate without three abilities: 1. To be able to maintain himself against sudden Invasions. 2. To aid his Allies and Confederates. 3. To reward his well-deserving servants. But, he urged, there was a leak in the government, of which leak such as these were the causes; Frauds in the Customs; Treaty about the Spanish Match; new invented offices, with large fees; old unprofitable offices, which the king might justly take away with law, love of his people, and his own honour; the preships of York and Wales; multiplicity of offices in one man; every officer to live on his own office; the king's Household out of order; new tables kept there made the leakage the greater; upstart officers; voluntary annuities or pensions, which ought to be stopped till the king was out of debt, and able to pay them. In the 4th Hen. IV. no man was to beg of the king till he was out of debt. Lastly, that all unnecessary charges, costly diet, apparel, buildings, &c. increase still the leakage.—To apply some means for remedy; the multiplicity of forests and parks, now a great charge to the king, might be drawn into a great benefit to him. The king's Ordinary Charge in Edw. III.'s time, was borne by the king's ordinary revenue. Ireland, at that time, was also 30,000*l.* a year benefit to the king; but now a great charge to him. To petition the king rather for a logique than a rhetoric hand; a strait, than an open one. He concluded by moving for a committee to put down these, and such other heads as shall be offered."

The Solicitor General moved to petition the king to declare the king of Spain an enemy, since it was he that had done them all the wrong: to take care of Papists at home, whose hearts were with the Spaniards, and are dangerous here whilst our navy was abroad. Two Subsidies and two Fifteenths, to be paid in Oct. and April come twelve months. Others declared against granting Subsidies in reversion; and not to graft Subsidy upon Subsidy in one parliament. A committee for this matter was moved for, the Duke to be called to it, "That he may give satisfaction for these aspersions that had been laid upon him." But no resolution was come to on this day.

Aug. 6. Sir H. Mildmay said, "That they were called thither for two reasons; for the cause of Religion, and granting a Supply to his majesty. That their coldness in Religion was one of the principal causes of the grievous visitation then upon them. To add to our former Petition to his majesty, that he will upon no account give any connivance to the Papists. That they were not absolutely bound to maintain a war, but to assist and supply the King in a war. Moved, first, to know what money will serve for the Fleet; then to raise the Supply, if not by subsidy, yet by some other course, of which there are precedents; and which, being done in parliament, is a parliamentary course."

Mr. Coryton moved for a committee, to consider of what was fit to be done, both for Supply of the king, and relief of the kingdom.

Sir J. Cooke moved that the Commission for the Navy might be examined.

Mr. Strode moved, for a grand committee presently, to consider of the King's Supply, and that all who spoke in the committee might apply themselves to this, How two Subsidies and Fifteens, payable more than one year hence, can supply a navy, to go out in fourteen days.

Sir Nath. Rich said, that they ought not to refuse to give at all; but, first, to represent their wants to the king, first, for Religion, to have his majesty's answer in full parliament, and then enrolled; which then would be of force with an act of parliament. Next, to know the enemy against whom War was to be made. The Necessity of an advised Counsel for governing of the great affairs of the kingdom. The Necessity of looking into the King's Revenue. To have his majesty's Answer concerning Impositions on Wines. And though the time was not now fit for the decision of all these points, yet a select committee to be appointed to set down the heads of them, and then to have the King's Answer to them in parliament; the doing of which, he said, was no capitulation with his majesty, but an ordinary parliamentary course, as 22 Edw. 3. and that without which the commonwealth could neither supply the king, nor subsist.

Mr. Rushworth tells us,* that the anti-courtiers were freer than all this with the ministry. At this debate, he says, they urged, "That great sums of money were given for places, to the value of 140,000*l.* at least. That the king ought to contribute to help the Palatinate's cause with his own estate. That the time of the year was too far spent for the fleet to go out for service. That enquiry ought to be made, Whether the duke brake not the Match with Spain, out of spleen and malice to the Conde Olivares? Whether he made not the Match with France upon harder terms? And whether the ships, employed against Rochel, were not maintained with the Subsidies given for the relief of the Palatinate?" Of all which there is no mention in the Journals. Though, indeed, there is sufficient reason to believe they might have been said in the course of this debate, by what follows: For Mr. Edward Clarke, a member, used an expression in a speech, "That there had been speeches there, with invective bitterness, and very unseasonable for the time." On which there was a general acclamation, "To the Bar;" and, being ordered to explain himself there, he gave still greater offence. He was then further ordered to withdraw, whilst this matter was debated in the house. Some argued for expulsion; others said, though the offence was great, yet the punishment ought to be more moderate. At length, it was agreed, "That he should kneel at the Bar, and the Speaker to let him know the house had taken just offence at his words; and therefore that he should stand committed to the serjeant during the pleasure of the house." But, the next day, upon submission made, he was released.—In the course of this Debate,

Sir Robert Cotton, the learned Antiquary, spoke as follows: "Mr. Speaker; Although the constant wisdom of this house of commons did well and worthily appear, in censuring that ill-advised member the last day, for trenching so far into their ancient liberties; and might encourage each worthy servant of the public here, to offer up freely his counsel and opinion; yet, since these walls cannot conceal from the ears of captious, guilty and revengeful men without, the counsel and debates within; I will endeavour, as my clear mind is free from any personal distaste of any one, so to express the honest thoughts of my heart, and discharge the best care of my trust, as no person shall justly tax my innocent and public mind; except his conscience shall make him guilty of such crimes as worthily have, in parliament, impeached others in elder times. I will therefore, with as much brevity as I can, set down how these disorders have, by degrees, sprung up in our own memories; how the wisdom of the best and wisest ages did of old redress the like; and, lastly, what modest and dutiful course I would wish to be followed by ourselves, in this so happy spring of our hopeful master. For, mr. Speaker, we are not to judge, but to present: the redress is above 'ad querimoniam vulgi.'—Now, mr. Speaker, so long as those attended about our late sovereign master, now with God, as had served the late queen of happy memory, debts of the crown were not so great; commissions and grants not so often complained of in parliament; trade flourished; pensions not so many, though more than in the late queen's time, for they exceeded not 18,000*l.* now near 120,000*l.* all things of moment were carried by public debate at the council-table; no honours set to sale; nor places of judicature; laws against priests and recusants were executed; resort of Papists to ambassadors houses barred and punished; his maj. by daily direction to all his ministers, and, by his own pen, declaring his dislike of that profession; no wasteful expences in fruitless ambassages, nor any transcendent power in any one minister. For matters of state, the Council-Table held up the fit and ancient dignity. So long as my lord of Somerset stood in state of grace, and had, by his maj.'s favour, the trust of the signet seal, he oft would glory justly, that there passed neither to himself, or his friends, any long grants of his highness's lands or pensions: for of that which himself had, he paid 20,000*l.* towards the marriage-portion of the king's daughter. His care was to pass no monopoly or illegal grant; and that some members of this house can witness by his charge unto them. No giving way to the Sale of honours, as a breach upon the nobility, (for such were his own words) refusing sir John Roper's office, then tendered to procure him to be made a baron. The Match with Spain then offered, (and with condition to require no further toleration in religion than ambassadors here are allowed) he, discovering the double dealing and the dangers, dissuaded his maj. from; and left him so far in distrust of the faith of that king, and his great instrument Gondomar, then here residing, that his maj. did term him long time after a 'Juggling Jack.' Thus stood the effect of his power with his maj. when the clouds of his misfortune fell upon him. What the future advices led in, we may well remember. The marriage with Spain was again renewed: Gondomar declared an honest man: Popery heartened, by employing suspected persons for conditions of conveniency. The forces of his majesty in the Palatinate withdrawn, upon Spanish faith improved here and believed, by which his highness's children have lost their patrimony; and more money been spent in fruitless embassages, than would have maintained an army fit to have recovered that country. Our old and fast allies disheartened, by that tedious and dangerous treaty: and the king our now master exposed to so great a peril, as no wise and faithful council would ever have advised. Errors in government, more in misfortune by weak counsels, than in princes.—The loss of the county of Poyntois in France, was laid to bishop Wickham's charge in the first of Rd. 2. for persuading the king to forbear sending aid when it was required: a capital crime in parliament. The loss of the duchy of Maine was laid to De la Pole duke of Suffolk, 28 Hen. 6. in singly and unwisely treating of a Marriage in France.—A Spanish Treaty lost the Palatinate. Whose counsel hath pronounced so great power to the Spanish agent (as never before) to effect freedom to so many priests as have been of late; and to become a solicitor almost in every tribunal for the ill-affected subjects of the state, is worth the inquiry?—What Grants of Impositions, before crossed, have lately been complained of in parliament? As that of Ale-Houses, Gold-Thread, Pretermitted Customs, and many more; the least of which would have, 50 Edw. 3. been adjudged in parliament an heinous crime, as well as those of Lyon and Latymer.—The duke of Suffolk in the time of Hen. 6. in procuring such another grant, in derogation of the common law, was adjudged in parliament.—The Gift of Honours, kept as the most sacred treasure of the state, now set to sale. Parliaments have been suitors to the king to bestow those graces; as in the times of Edw. 3. Hen. 5. and Hen. 6. More now led in, by that way only, than all the merits of the best deservers have got these last 500 years. So tender was the care of elder times, that it is an article 28 Hen. 6. in parliament against the duke of

Suffolk, that he had procured for himself, and some some few others, such Titles of Honour, and those so irregular, that he was the first that ever was earl, marquis, and duke of the self-same place. Edw. 1. restrained the number, in policy, that would have challenged a writ by tenure: and how this proportion may suit with the profit of the state, we cannot tell. Great deserts have now no other recompence than costly rewards from the king; for, we are now at a vile price of that which was once inestimable. If worthy persons have been advanced freely to places of greatest trust, I shall be glad. Spencer was condemned in the 14 Edw. 2. for displacing good servants about the king, and putting in his friends and followers; not leaving, either in the church or commonwealth, a place to any, before a fine was paid unto him for his dependence. The like in part was laid by parliament on De la Pole. It cannot but be a sad hearing unto us all, what my lord treasurer lately told us of his maj.'s great debts, high engagements, and present wants: the noise whereof I wish may ever rest inclosed within these walls. For, what an encouragement it may be to our enemies, and a disheartening to our friends, I cannot tell. The danger of those, if any they have been the cause, is great and fearful. It was no small motive to the parliament, in the time of Hen. 3. to banish the king's half-brethren for procuring to themselves so large proportion of crown lauds. Gaveston and Spencer for doing the like for themselves, and their followers, in the time of Edw. 2. and the lady Vessy for procuring the like for her brother Beaumont, was banished the court. Michael de la Pole was condemned 10 Rich. 2. in parl. amongst other crimes, for procuring lands and pensions from the king, and having employed the subsidies to other ends than the grant intended. His grand-child, William duke of Suffolk, for the like was censured 28 Hen. 6. The great bishop of Winchester, 50 Edw. 3. was put upon the king's mercy by parliament, for wasting in time of peace, the revenues of the crown, and gifts of the people; to the yearly oppression of the commonwealth. Offences of this nature were urged, to the ruining of the last duke of Somerset in the time of Edw. 6. More fearful examples may be found, too frequent in records. Such improvidence and ill counsel led Hen. 3. into so great a strait, as after he had pawned some part of his foreign territories, broke up his house, and sought his diet at abbies and religious houses, engaged not only his own jewels, but those of the shrine of st. Edward at Westminster; he was in the end not content, but constrained to lay to pawn (as some of his successors after did) magnam coronam Angliæ, the crown of England. To draw you out to life the image of former kings extremities, I will tell you what I found since this assembly at Oxford, written by a reverend man, twice vice-chancellor of this place; his name was Gascoign; a man that saw the tragedy of De la Pole: he tells you that the reve-

ness of the crown were so rent away by ill counsel, that the king was enforced to live 'de tallagis populi:' that the king was grown in debt 'quinque centena millia librarum:' that his great favourite, in treating of a foreign marriage, had lost his master a foreign duchy: that to work his ends, he had caused the king to adjourn the parliament 'in villis & remotis partibus regni,' where few people, 'propter defectum hospitii & victualium' could attend; and by shifting that assembly from place to place, to enforce (I will use the author's own word) 'illos paucos, qui remanebant de communitate regni, concedere regi quamvis pessima.' When the parliament endeavoured by an act of resumption, the just and frequent way to repair the languishing state of the crown (for all from Hen. 3. but one, till the 6 Hen. 8. have used it) this great man told the king it was 'ad dedecus regis,' and forced him from it: to which the Commons answered, although 'verati laboribus & expensis, nunquam concederet taxam regi,' until by authority of parliament, 'resumeret actualiter omnia pertinentia coronæ Angliæ:' and that it was 'magis ad dedecus regis,' to leave so many poor men in intolerable want, to whom the king stood then indebted. Yet nought could all good counsel work, until by parliament that bad great man was banished; which was no sooner done, but an act of resumption followed the enrolment of the act of his exilement. That was a speeding article against the bishop of Winchester and his brother, in the time of Edw. 3. that they had ingrossed the person of the king from his other lords. It was not forgotten against Gaveston and the Spencers, in the time of Edward 2. The unhappy ministers of Rd. 2. Hen. 6. and Edw. 6. felt the weight, to their ruin, of the like errors. I hope we shall not complain in parliament again of such.—I am glad we have neither just cause, or undutiful dispositions, to appoint the king a counsel to redress those errors in parliament, as those 42 Hen. 3. We do not desire, as 5 Hen. 4. or 29 Hen. 6. the removing from about the king any evil counsellors. We do not request a choice by name; as 14 Edw. 3. 5. 5. 11. Rd. 2. 8 Hen. 4. or 31 Hen. 6. nor to swear them in parliament, as 35 Edw. 1. 9 Edw. 2. or 5 Rd. 2. or to line them out their directions of rule, as 43 Hen. 3. and 8 Hen. 6. or desire that which Hen. 3. did promise in his 48d year, 'se acta omnia per assensum magnatum de concilio suo electorum, & sine eorum assensu nihil.' We only in loyal duty offer up our humble desires, that since his majesty hath, with advised judgment, elected so wise, religious, and worthy servants, to attend him in that high employment; he will be pleased to advise, with them together, a way of remedy for those disasters in state, brought on by long security and happy peace; and not be led with young and single counsel."

A grand Conference relating to Religion.]
We now return to the Lords' Journals, for an affair of no small moment, since the consequence of it determined the fate of this parliament. It is very imperfectly inserted in the Journals of the Commons, and more so in Rushworth.

Aug. 8. This day the Lords sent a Message to the Commons, "That they had received one from the king, which was to be delivered to the lords and commons together, by the lord keeper and the duke of Buckingham, and that his maj. had commanded the lord keeper to require the lord treasurer, the lord Conway, and sir John Cook, to assist his grace therein. Upon which account, the lords required a present meeting with their whole house, in the great hall of Christ Church, if it suited their convenience."

The Answer returned was, "That the Commons would meet, at the time and place appointed, with their Speaker and the whole house. And, as intimation was given, that there might be occasion for a worthy member of their house, in delivering the message from his maj.; though it was against the very fundamental privileges of the house of commons, yet they gave way to it, with this proviso; That he speak, as the king's servant and commissioner, and not as a member of their house."—At the same time, the Commons ordered, within themselves, That, as the Speaker and the whole house went up, if the Lords kept bare, to do the same; if they covered, then the Speaker and the rest to cover also.

Aug. 9. The Report of this grand Conference between the two houses was made in the house of lords, by dr. Abbot, abp. of Canterbury: and first, on what had been offered by the Commons concerning Religion. "That they presented a Petition, directed to his maj. desiring this house to join with them therein; the effect whereof was, That whereas the lords and commons did, at their last meeting, present a Petition to his maj. for advancement of God's true Religion and suppressing the contrary; unto which his maj. vouchsafed, as well by his own mouth, as by the lord keeper's, on the 11th of July last, to return such an Answer as gave them assurance of his royal performance thereof; yet, at this meeting, they find that, on the 12th of July last, his maj. granted a pardon unto Alexander Baker, a Jesuit, and ten other Papists; which, as they are informed, was upon the importunity of some foreign ambassador; and that it passed by immediate warrant, and was recommended by the principal secretary of state, without paying the ordinary fees. Also, That divers Copes, Altars, Chalice, &c. being found in the house of one Mary Estmond, in Dorsetshire, by two justices of the peace; they thereupon tendered her the oath of allegiance; which she refusing, they committed her to the constable, from whom she made her escape and complained to the king. That the said secretary of state did write unto these justices in her favour; all which they humbly desired his maj. to take into consideration, and to give a due, effectual, and speedy redress therein."

The said Petition, Pardon, and Letter were read; and then the abb. proceeded with the Report, "That the Commons insisted much upon three points: 1st. The date of the Pardon, being the next day after the king's Answer delivered to both houses, by the king's command: 2ndly. That the Pardon dispenseth with these laws, viz. with the statutes of the 23d and 27th Eliz. and the 6d Jac. provided to keep his maj.'s subjects in due obedience; and with the statute the 10th Edw. 3. which directeth, That every felon, upon pardon obtained, should be bound to good behaviour: 3rdly. That it was solicited by the principal secretary, the lord Conway; and to this they added these circumstances: That this Jesuit, being formerly imprisoned and now set at liberty, his conversation might be dangerous in perverting many of the king's subjects. That, heretofore, in the time of queen Eliz. if any were convicted and pardoned, (for she pardoned none before conviction that their faults might be first known) they were also banished, not to return upon pain of death, which is prevented by this pardon. They concluded, That both this Pardon and Letter were procured by the importunity of some foreign ambassadors; which was of dangerous consequence, to give the subjects here any dependency upon them."

—The archbishop having ended,

The Lord Conway stood up and affirmed, "That though the Pardon was dated the next day after the king's promise to the parliament, yet it was no breach thereof; for it was granted long before: And his ldp. shewed, That, at Christmas last, his late maj. promised to the marquis de Villa Clara, (the French ambassador) certain graces and privileges to the Papists; that the marquis D'Effiat did afterwards obtain the like, to the end that the queen might come the more easy hither; and the duke de Chevereux (his maj.'s kinsman) who brought the queen over, had importuned him that he might also carry home the like graces. That the Pardon passed by immediate warrant, to take off the continual importunity of the ambassadors to the king; and he, being secretary of state, solicited it himself; but it was at his maj.'s command, to take off all imputation from himself; and not out of any affection of his to that religion which he ever hated. As touching the Non-payment of the Fees, his ldp. said, That mr. Benbowe demanded 50l. for them; and the ambassador complaining thereof to the king, he commanded him to see that no fees should be taken. That the duke de Chevereux importuned the king to write that letter, himself, in favour of mrs. Estmond; and he, as secretary, was forced and commanded to do it, rather than that his maj. should. The said duke complained much of the justices hard carriage unto her, but he never heard any thing of her obstinate behaviour to them; nor of any copes, nor altars, found in her house; wherefore he wrote also to be advertised of her offence by them, but was not answered till within these few days.

His ldp. protested his sincerity to the true religion here established; whereof he had formerly given good testimony, and in which he would persevere. And what he did, in these matters, was only to take away all scandal from the king, though it lighted upon himself; and that he did nothing but what he was first expressly commanded to do by the king."

The Lord Keeper affirmed, "That he received the said Pardon, long before the date thereof; and if he had made a recepti upon the warrant, as is usual in other cases, it had born date with that though sealed afterwards. But that his ldp. deferred the sealing thereof, in hopes that the ambassadors would have been gone first, as they were often for going. But, they staying and daily urging the king for the Pardon, he, being again commanded, sealed it at the next general seal; and so it had date with the time of the seal and not of the grant. His ldp. well hoping, upon the departure of the ambassadors, to have stopped it with his maj. otherwise it had been sealed before the king's promise to the parliament; and therefore this can be no breach of the king's promise." His lordship also said, "That the ambassador urged his majesty very much to give a general dispensation to the Papists; but the king was advised rather to pardon some few of them what was past. Which counsel, though to be commended, yet none gave way to it, but much against their wills; and his ldp. wished that a Petition might be presented to the king, to stay the like Pardons hereafter."

Next follows in the Journals, a Copy of a Petition to the king, from the lords and commons, repeating the aforesaid evidences; and that as the Letter and Pardon were drawn from him by the importunity of foreign ambassadors; a course of late too frequently practised by his ill-affected subjects, it was of dangerous consequence, inducing to a dependency upon foreign princes, &c. But as the whole of this would be a repetition of what is gone before, and besides, as it was never presented, it may well be omitted.

The Lord Keeper, on the same day, next proceeded to give the rest of the Report on what passed in the Conference, along with the king's Message and the consequence of it. His ldp. began with telling the house, "That his maj. had graciously, fully, and parliamentarily, answered the Petition concerning Religion, delivered him by both houses, at Hampton Court, the 7th of July last; and had commanded his ldp. to signify to the Lords and Commons, that he had also given command to the lord admiral to deliver his said Answers thereunto, to both houses; to be by them disposed, as the Answers of kings unto Petitions, of that kind, exhibited, are wont to be. And withal to deliver a Message from his maj. concerning the great affairs of his, now in agitation in the house of commons."—That then the lord admiral said, "His maj. had laid upon him such a charge, as, when he did consider his own weakness, it might utterly discourage him; were it not that reflecting again upon that plainness and sincerity, wherewith a king should deal with his people, he found himself the fitter for the employment; in that he was sure he should deliver it without rhetoric or art. As concerning the Petition, he could dispatch that in two words; that is, by giving a full assurance that all was granted which was desired; but held it fitter, for more satisfaction, to read the Petition with the Answers annexed; and they were read accordingly, by Mr. Attorney, in hæc verba:

“ The Petition of both Houses for Execution of the Laws against Popery, and for advancing true Religion.

“ To the King's Most Excellent Majesty.

“ Most gracious Sovereign; It being infallibly true, that nothing can more establish your throne, and assure the peace and prosperity of your people, than the unity and sincerity of Religion: We your most humble and loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons of this present parliament assembled, observing that of late there is an apparent mischievous increase of Papists in your dominions, hold ourselves bound in conscience and duty to represent the same to your sacred maj. together with the dangerous consequences of the increase of Popery in this land, and what we conceive to be the principal Causes thereof, and what may be the Remedies.

“ The Dangers appear in these Particulars.

1. Their desperate ends, being the subversion both of Church and State; and the restlessness of their spirits to attain these ends, the doctrine of their teachers and leaders, persuading them, that therein they do God good service. 2. Their evident and strict dependency upon such foreign princes, as no way affect the good of your maj. and this state. 3. The opening a way of popularity to the ambition of any, who shall adventure to make himself head of so great a party.

“ The principal Cause of the Increase of Papists. 1. The want of the due execution of the laws against Jesuits, Seminary Priests, and Popish Recusants; occasioned partly by the connivency of the state, partly by defects in the laws themselves, and partly by the manifold abuses of officers. 2. The interposing of foreign princes by their ambassadors and agents in favour of them. 3. Their great concourse to the city, and frequent conferences and conventicles there. 4. The open and usual resort to the houses and chapels of foreign ambassadors. 5. The education of their children in seminaries and houses of their religion in foreign parts, which of late have been greatly multiplied and enlarged for the entertaining of the English. 6. That in some places of your realm, your people be not sufficiently instructed in the knowledge of true Religion. 7. The licentious printing and dispersing of Popish and seditious books. 8. The employment of men ill-affected in religion in places of government, who do, shall, or may countenance the Popish party.

“ The remedies against this outrageous and dangerous disease, we conceive to be these ensuing: I. That the youth of this realm be carefully educated by able and religious schoolmasters, and they to be enjoined to catechize and instruct their scholars in the grounds and principles of true religion. And whereas, by many complaints from divers parts of the kingdom, it doth plainly appear, That sundry Popish scholars, dissembling their religion, have craftily crept in, and obtained the places of teaching in divers counties, and thereby infected and perverted their scholars, and so fitted them to be transported to the Popish seminaries beyond the seas; that therefore there be great care in the choice and admission of schoolmasters, and that the ordinaries make diligent enquiries of their demeanors, and proceed to the removing of such as shall be faulty, or justly suspected.”—His Majesty's Answer.

“ This is well allowed of, and for the better performance of what is desired, letters shall be written to the two archbishops, and, from them, letters to go to all the ordinaries of their several provinces to see this done; the several ordinaries to give account, of their doings herein to the archbishops respectively, and they to give account to his maj. of their proceedings herein.”—II. “ That the ancient Discipline of the Universities be restored, being the famous nurseries of literature and virtue.” Ans. This is approved by his maj. and the chancellor of each university shall be required to cause due execution of it.

—III. “ That special care be taken to enlarge the Word of God throughout all the parts of your maj.'s dominions, as being the most powerful means for planting of true Religion, and routing out of the contrary; to which end, among other things, may it please your maj. to advise your bishops, by fatherly intreatment and tender usage, to reduce to the peaceable and orderly service of the church, such able ministers as have been formerly silenced, that there may be a profitable use of their ministry in these needful and dangerous times: and that Nonresidency, Pluralities, and Commendams, may be moderated. Where we cannot forbear most humbly to thank your maj. for diminishing the number of your own chaplains; not doubting of the like princely care for the well-bestowing of the rest of your benefices, both to the comfort of the people, and the encouragement of the Universities, being full of grave and able ministers unfurnished with livings.” Ans. This his maj. likes well, so it be applied to such ministers as are peaceable, orderly, and conformable to the church government. For Pluralities and Nonresidencies, they are now so moderated, that the archbishops affirm, there be now no dispensations for Pluralities granted; nor no man is allowed above two benefices, and those not above 30 miles distant: and for avoiding Nonresidence, the canon, in that case provided, shall be duly put in execution. For Commendams, they shall be sparingly granted, only in such case where the exility and smallness of the bishoprick requireth. Also, his maj. will cause that the Benefices belonging to him shall be well bestowed. And, for the better propagating of religion, his maj. recommendeth to the houses of parliament, that care may be taken, and provision made, that every parish shall allow a competent maintenance for an able minister; and that the owners of parsonages impropriate would allow to the vicars, curates, and ministers, in villages and places belonging to their parsonage, sufficient stipend and allowance for preaching ministers.—IV. "That there may be strict provision against transporting of English Children to the Seminaries beyond the Seas, and for the recalling of them who are already there placed; and for the punishment of such your subjects, as are maintainers of those seminaries or of the scholars; considering that, besides the seducing of your people, great sums of money are yearly expended upon them, to the impoverishing of this kingdom." Ans. The law in this case shall be put in execution. And further, there shall be letters written to the lord treasurer, and also to the lord admiral, That all the ports of this realm, and the creeks and members thereof, be strictly kept, and strait searches made to this end; and a proclamation shall be to recall both the children of noblemen and the children of any other men; and they to return by a day: also maintainers of seminaries of scholars there, shall be punished according to law.—V. "That no Popish Recusant be permitted to come within the court, unless your maj. be pleased to call him upon special occasion, agreeable to the statute of 3 Jac. c. 5: And whereas your maj. for the preventing of apparent mischiefs; both to your majesty and the state, hath, in your princely wisdom, taken order, that none of your natural-born subjects, not professing the true Religion by law established, be admitted into the service of your royal consort the queen, we give your maj. most humble thanks, and desire that your order herein may be observed." Ans. If his maj. shall find, or be informed of any concourse of Recusants to the court, the law shall be strictly followed. And his maj. is pleased, that, by Proclamation, the British and Irish subjects shall be put in the same case. And as his maj. hath provided in his Treaty with France, so his purpose is to keep it, That none of his subjects shall be admitted into his service, or into the service of his royal consort the queen, that are Popish Recusants.—VI. "That all the laws now standing in force against Jesuits, Seminary Priests, and others having taken orders by authority derived from the see of Rome, be put in due execution. And to the intent they may not pretend to be surprized, that a speedy and certain day be prefixed by your maj.'s proclamation for their departure out of this realm, and all other your dominions, and not to return upon the severest penalties of the law

now in force against them: and that all your maj.'s subjects may be thereby admonished not to receive, comfort, entertain, or conceal any of them, upon the penalties which may be lawfully inflicted: and that all such Papists, Jesuits, and Recusants, who are and shall be imprisoned for Recusancy, or any other cause, may be so strictly restrained, as that none should have conference with them, thereby to avoid the contagion of their corrupt religion; and that no man, that shall be suspected of Popery, be suffered to be a keeper of any of his maj.'s prisons." Ans. The law in this case shall be put in execution, and a Proclamation shall be to the effect desired; and such restraint shall be made, as is desired; and no man, that is justly suspected of Popery, shall be suffered to be a keeper of any of his maj.'s prisons.—VII. "That your maj. be pleased to take such order, as to your princely wisdom shall be expedient, That no natural-born subject, or strange bishops, nor any other by authority from the see of Rome, confer any ecclesiastical orders, or exercise any ecclesiastical function whatsoever, toward or upon your maj.'s natural-born subjects within your dominions." Ans. This is fit to be ordered according as is provided; and it shall be so published by proclamation.—VIII. "That your maj.'s learned counsel may receive order and commandment to consider of all former Grants of Recusants' lands, that such of them may be avoided as are made to the Recusants' use or interest, or out of which the Recusant receiveth any benefit, which are either void, or voidable by the law." Ans. The king will give order to his learned counsel to consider of the Grants; and will do according as is desired.—IX. "That your maj. will be likewise pleased strictly to command all your judges and ministers of justice, ecclesiastical and temporal, to see the laws of this realm against Popish Recusants, to be duly executed: and namely, that the censure of Excommunication be declared and certified against them; and that they be not absolved hut upon public satisfaction, by yielding to conformity." Ans. His maj. leaves the laws to their course, and will order in the point of Excommunication as is desired.—X. "That your majesty will be pleased to remove from places of authority and government, all such persons as are either Popish Recusants, or, according to direction of former acts of state, to be justly suspected." Ans. This his maj. thinks fit, and will give order for it.—XI. "That present order be taken for disarming all Popish Recusants, legally convicted, or justly suspected, according to the laws in that behalf, and the orders taken by his late maj.'s privy council upon reasons of state." Ans. The laws and acts in this case shall be followed, and put in due execution.—XII. "That your maj. be also pleased, in respect of the great resort of Recusants to and about London, to command forthwith, upon pain of your indignation, and severe execution of the laws, that they retire themselves to their several countries, there to remain confined within five miles of their places." Ans. For this the laws in force shall be forthwith executed.—XIII. "And whereas your maj. hath strictly commanded and taken order, that none of your natural-born subjects repair to the hearing of Masses, or other superstitious service at the chapels or houses of foreign ambassadors, or in any other places whatsoever; we give your maj. most humble thanks, and desire that your order and commandment therein may be continued and observed, and that the offenders herein may be punished according to the laws." Ans. The king gives assent thereto, and will see that observed which herein hath been commanded by him.—XIV. "That all such Insolencies, as any that are popishly affected have lately committed, or shall hereafter commit to the dishonour of our religion, or to the wrong of the true professors thereof, be exemplarily punished." Ans. This shall be done as is desired.—XV. "That the statute of 1 Eliz. for the payment of twelve-pence every Sunday, by such as shall be absent from divine service in the church, without a lawful excuse, may be put in due execution, the rather, for that the penalty, by law, is given to the Poor, and therefore not to be dispensed withall."—Ans. It is fit that this Statute be executed, and the Penalties shall not be dispensed withall.

XVI. "Lastly, That your maj. would be pleased to extend your princely care also over the kingdom of Ireland, that the like courses may be there taken for the restoring and establishing of true Religion".—Ans. His maj.'s cares are, and shall be extended over the kingdom of Ireland; and he will do all that a religious king should do for the restoring and establishing of true Religion there.—And thus, most gracious sovereign, according to our duty and zeal to God and Religion, to your maj. and your safety, to the Church and Commonwealth, and their peace and prosperity, we have made a faithful Declaration of the present estate, the causes and remedies of this increasing disease of Popery, humbly offering the same to your princely care and wisdom. The Answer of your majesty's father, our late sovereign, of famous memory, upon the like petition, did give us great comfort of reformation; but your maj.'s most gracious promises made in that kind, do give us confidence and assurance of the continual performance thereof; in which comfort and confidence reposing ourselves, we most humbly pray for your maj.'s long continuance in all princely felicity."

The Duke of Buckingham, assisted by Sir J. Cooke, gives the King's Reasons for approving of the said Petition, &c.] The Petition and Answers being read, the Lord Admiral said, "That as his maj. took well their putting him in mind of his care for Religion; so he would have done and granted the same things, though they had never petitioned him. Neither did he place this Petition, in this order, as a wheel to draw on other affairs and designs; but leaves them to move in their own spheres, as being of sufficient poise and weight within themselves. What was done in this Petition, came from these two fountains, conscience and duty to his father; who, in his last speech, recommended unto him the person, but not the religion of his Queen."

The Duke's Account of the Preparations for the Fleet, and of the Conduct of the War.] Then his Grace signified, "That, by the king's commands, he was to give to both houses, an Account of the Fleet, and all the Preparations thereof;" which he did in this manner, viz. "That the first and last time he had the honour to speak in this auditory, it was on the same business; and then he was so happy as to be honoured and applauded by both houses: And he made no question but, speaking with the same heart, and on the same business, he should be so now: For, if they looked upon the change of affairs in Christendom, they could not think it less than a miracle. Then the king of Spain was sought and courted by all the world; he was become master of the Valtoline; had broken all Germany in pieces, and was possessed of the Palatinate. The princes of Germany were weak, and not able to resist; and, by reason of his master's neutrality, caused by a treaty, he kept all other king's and princes in awe. Now, on the contrary, the Valtoline is at liberty; the war is proclaimed beyond the Alps; the king of Denmark is in arms, with 17,000 foot and 6000 horse, besides commissions to make them up 30,000; the king of Sweden is also interested; the Princes of the Union are revived; the king of France is engaged against Spain, and, for that purpose, having made peace with his own subjects, hath joined and confederated himself with Savoy and Venice. Why should not he, therefore, hope for the same success; considering that, since the time of his last speech to both houses, there was not one action, or a thought of his, that levelled at any other than one and the same object, which was to please their desires? If he should credit all rumours, which he would not do, he should speak with some confusion of fear, to hold the same place he formerly did in their affections: But, having still the same virtuous ambition, and considering his own heart to the king and state, he could find no cause of alteration, but was all courage and confidence."

Here the Duke made a request to the House of Commons, "That if any man had spoken or should speak any thing, in discharge of his conscience, zeal of reformation, or love to his country, which may seem to reflect upon some particular persons, he may be the last that shall apply it to himself: Because he is confidently assured of two things; 1st. That they are so just as not to fall upon him without cause, who was so lately approved by them. And, 2ndly, That himself shall deserve nothing that shall misbecome a faithful Englishman."

The Lord Keeper (sir J. Cooke) next proceeded to give the remaining part of his Report, which was the sequel of the duke's speech. He said, his grace chose rather to proceed in it by way of Question and Answer, than in one continued speech, as being the speedier way and means to yield satisfaction. He would take his rise, he said, from the Breach of the Treaties and Alliance, and put some Questions to himself, yet none but such as should be material to the business in hand. Here his grace did move 12, which the Lord Keeper said he would enlarge, for clearness and perspicuity's sake, into 14 Questions :

Quest. 1. By what Counsel the Designs and Actions of War were carried and enterprized?

—Answer. “By the Counsel of parliament: and this his grace proved by the act of both the houses, March 24, 1623, which was read; and then his grace proceeded and said, Here you see, my lords and gentlemen, that his maj. moved by this council, applied himself accordingly for the defence of the realm, the securing of Ireland, the assisting our neighbours, the States of the United Provinces, and other our friends and allies, and for the setting forth of the Navy Royal. The king looking into his purse, saw enough to do all the former actions, but not the latter: For when he came to consider the Navy, there was neither money nor preparations; yet, looking upon the affairs of Christendom, he found this the most necessary. Hereupon his maj. of famous memory, did his grace that honour as to write to him from Newmarket to London, a Letter to this effect, ‘That observing foreign affairs, he found it necessary that a Royal Fleet should be prepared, and put in readiness; but that he had no money: Wherefore his Lordship and his friends must begin to lay out, and no doubt others would follow. And, by this means, the king might the longer lie concealed and undiscovered in the enterprize, as bearing the name of the subjects only; and other princes, in hopes to draw him on, would sooner come to the business.’ Upon this Letter, his grace leap’d into the action with allalacrity; and, having received all he had from his maj. was desirous, and held it a happiness, to pour it out upon his service and occasions. But this he did not on his own head, but fortified by the advice and counsels of these worthy persons, the lords Conway, Chichester, Grandison Carey, Brook, and Ley, sir Rob. Mansell, and sir John Cooke—Their first consultation was of a War, the next of the Means; but both the one and the other was justified by more than himself. He never did any thing but by them; nothing was ever resolved on or altered but in their company; for either he repaired to them, or else they did him that honour, (as his grace term’d it) to resort to his chamber. When all was thus digested and prepared, and that they came to proportion time and levies, then, with the king’s leave, the business was imparted to all the lords of the council; the Account was made to them, and allowed by them; who said there openly (his maj. being present,) That if this was put in execution, it would do well, and gave some attributes to it.—Here sir John Cooke justified the shewing and approving of their Accounts, at the council table; that those Accounts consisted of long particulars for soldiers to be levied, mariners to be pressed, forwardness of the ships and provisions, and that nothing was wanted but money; and that he had all these particulars ready to be shewn to the house of commons, if they should require it.—His grace then proceeded and shewed, “That he was so religious to guide these great affairs by counsel; that, at his Journey into France, which fell out about this time, he desired his majesty to recommend the business to a select committee, which his maj. did, to the lord treasurer, the lord chamberlain, the lords Conway and Brook, who in his absence, took care of the same. This his grace thought fit to tell their lordships, that they may see by what counsel this great business was carried; and that, in all the management thereof, he took no steps but by their approbation.”

Quest. 2. Why did not his majesty declare the Enemy presently, upon the granting of the two subsidies? Ans. “His maj. considered the State of Christendom at that season, and found it full of danger to declare the enemy, for 3 reasons: 1st, because that great enemy would be more prepared. 2ndly, Spain being the enemy, our merchants would be embargoed, who are now drawn home. 3rdly, Our friends, finding us so long unprepared, after our Declarations, had despaired, and never believed any reality of our intendments.”

Quest. 3. Whether this vast sum of 300,000*l.* bestowed upon the Navy, together with 40,000*l.* more to be now employed, and 60,000*l.* at the return, be so frugally husbanded as was fit?

—Ans. “That his grace refers to sir John Cooke’s Accounts, which the house of commons may peruse; and when sir John hath done, the particular officers should be ready to justify it with their Accounts.”—Here sir John Cooke interposed, that he had already shewed this Account, and said, “That the duke had laid out of his own money 44,000*l.* and the Treasurer of the Navy, at his request, above 50,000*l.*” To this his grace added, “That all this borrowed money was managed, by the proper officers, as if it had issued out of the exchequer; and had not been borrowed elsewhere.”

Quest. 4. Whether a considerable Sum of Money be yet required?—Ans. “40,000*l.* is yet necessary; but that our master is exhausted; his treasure anticipated, his lands engaged, his plate offered to be pawn’d, but not accepted; and yet his majesty must be maintained.”

Quest. 5. Whether this Fleet was ever intended to go out or not?—Ans. “There have been some flying rumours to that effect. But what policy were it in the king, with the Charge of 400,000*l.* to amaze the world, cozen his people, and put you to such a hazard? What should he gain by an act that should make him blush when he met his parliament again? Certainly the king would never employ such a sum, but when the Affairs of Christendom made it necessary to do it; and it was done with an intention to set it out with all the speed possible."

Quest. 6. Why was not this Want of Money foreseen in the first Project of the whole Service; but now only thought upon unexpectedly, and dangerously, considering the Sickness: Why not before the last adjournment, whereby we are cast upon so unseasonable a time?—

Ans. "It was foreseen before, but interrupted by unfortunate accidents. 1. The Death of the late king. 2. The Funeral; which, for decency's sake, could follow no sooner. 3. The Journey into France, and the Marriage; which procured more delays than were expected, but necessary." Since the opening of this parliament, his maj. declared his necessity; and told you plainly, That this sitting must be not for counsel, but resolution. And when he received the grant of the two Subsidies, he understood that money to be but a matter of custom, to welcome him to the crown; and intended, when they were presented to him, to dilate more at large, as afterwards he did by sir John Cooke.

Quest. 7. Who gave the Counsel to meet so suddenly, when the Sickness was so dangerously spread?—

Ans. "His maj. commanded him to say, That it was the business itself that gave the Counsel, with the necessity of it, else the king would not have hazarded the two houses, and the rest of the kingdom, by its spreading. If he had been able any way, without your help, to have set out the Navy, he would have done it, and relied upon you for a Supply afterwards. If it be a fault, (as I see none, said the duke) why should the realm and the occasions of the State of Christendom suffer for it? If it be undertaken for your good and the king's honour now budding) as also for the State of Christendom, why should a particular man's fault make it miscarry? I hope your wisdom will so pierce through it, as to set the affair forward."

Quest. 8. Why should not the King help on this occasion with his own Estate?—

Ans. "Judge you whether he doth not; for, observing the great gift you gave the session before last, he was unwilling to take any more from you, and laid out all his estate upon the enterprise, and will do so again as soon as he shall be enabled."

Quest. 9. Is not the Time of the Year too far spent for the Navy to go forth?—

Ans. "The king answered this the last day. 'Better half the Navy should perish, than the going forth thereof should be stopped.' It would shew such want of counsel and experience in the design; such want of courage, weakness and beggarliness, in not being able to go through with it. And, for the Time, there were only three ends proposed by this service, and the time of the year is yet seasonable for any of them. He could demonstrate the same, if the design was to be published; which your wisdom would not think fit to have done." Here the duke said he would satisfy the houses in some other things.

Quest. 10. Whether these 8 ships, lent the French king, to be employed against the Rochellers, were not paid with the Subsidy Money?—Ans. "These 8 ships were, 1st, employed at the Charge of the French king. 2nd. It is not always fit for kings to give account of their counsels. Judge the thing by the event."

Quest. 11. Whether, having been employed to break with Spain, the Duke made not a worse match with France, and upon harsher conditions?—Ans. "He hoped the contrary would appear by the King's Answer to their Petition; and he assured them his maj. had broken no public faith in giving the said Answers."

Quest. 12. Did not the Duke serve us in breaking the Treaties with Spain, out of particular spleen and malice to count Olivares?—

Ans. "There was no cause for him to hate Olivares, he was the means to make his grace happy; for out of his hands came those Papers by which his grace gained the love of a nation, which before thought not so well of him. He is not vindictive in his temper; he can forgive those who had no such natural respect to that country as Olivares had. Neither doth his grace love that any man should be an instrument, by ill means, to do a good action, as Olivares intended to serve his master and kingdom by indirect means. And he can further prove that he is not vindictive; for he could forgive one of our own nation who concurred with Olivares. But he thought proper to let that business sleep; which, if it should awake, would prove a lion to devour him who was the Author of it; meaning one of our own nation who co-operated with Olivares (the Earl of Bristol)."

Quest. 13. Will it not be objected, That hitherto the Duke speaks of nothing but immense Charges, which the kingdom is not able to bear; as, to the king of Denmark, 30,000*l.* a month; to count Mansfield, 20,000*l.* to the Low Countries, 8000*l.* to Ireland, 2600*l.* a month; besides the backing of the Fleet with a Supply, for which twelve of his majesty's ships are now in preparing?—

Ans. "Make the king chief of the war, by a diversion of this kind, and he will give a greater advantage to all his allies, than by allowing them 50, nay 100,000*l.* a month. What is it for his allies to snatch with the king of Spain; to win a town to-day, and to lose it to-morrow? It is almost impossible to hope for a conquest of this kind, the Spanish king being so able by land: But let the king our sovereign, be master of the wars elsewhere, and make a diversion; and let the enemy be compelled to spend his money and men in other places; and our allies in these parts will be suddenly and imperceptibly strengthened and enabled: and, by this kind of war, you send no Coin out of the land; you send nothing but Beef, Mutton, and Powder; by which the kingdom is not impoverished, but may make good returns."

Quest. 14. Where is the Enemy?—

Ans. "Make the Fleet ready to go out, and the king had given him command to bid you name the Enemy yourselves. Put the sword into his maj.'s hands, and he will employ it to your honour, and the good of true religion. As you issue nothing that is lost, so will you bring home somewhat again; and henceforward maintain the War by the perquisites thereof. Make but once an entrance, it may afterwards be maintained with profit. When the Enemy is declared, you may have letters of marque; none shall be denied. And I have not been so idle, said his grace, but I shall make propositions of venturing, whither you yourselves may go, and may have the honey of the business."—Lastly, The Duke told us, "That the king commanded him to admonish the assembly to take care of the season and their own health; for, if they lost time, no money could purchase it again. His grace concluded with this Apology: If, in this Relation, through my weakness, I have injured the King's Affairs and those of the State of Christendom, I crave your pardon: my intentions were good."

The Lord Treasurer's Account of the King's Estate.] We next proceed to give the rest of the Lord Keeper's Report, concerning what the Lord High Treasurer said at the Conference, relating to the King's Estate. "The Treasurer produced a Paper, wherein he had set the same down, according as his memory and the time would permit him on the sudden. And he divided the same into three parts: 1. The Estate the late King left. 2. The Estate the King now stands in. 3. How it will be in the future. And the first of these he again divided into other three parts; the late King's Debts; Anticipations; and Engagements. His Debts were to the city of London, and some gentlemen, borrowed upon the Great Seal and the Lords Bonds, 120,000*l.* besides growing interest. The Wardrobe 40,000*l.* at the least, part whereof is due to poor people. To the king of Denmark, 75,000*l.* and the interest; which was borrowed for the Palatinate. Arrears for Pensions, a large sum, but not cast up. To his Household, a great sum; which his lordship left to the officers thereof to relate to the Commons. The Anticipations made by the late king of his Rents, before they were due, came to 50,000*l.* which was presently bestowed on this occasion, the Fleet. His Engagements were, for the Pay of 6000 foot in the Low Countries; of 10,000 foot under count Mansfield; and for the rigging, victualling, and providing this great Navy, not the like in our memory.—2. Concerning the Estate of the King, as it now stands, his ldp. divided the same into Debts and Disbursements, which he defrays out of his own coffers: that his father's Debts, Anticipations, and Engagements, lie ill upon him. His own Debts, as Prince, come to 70,000*l.* at the least, it is feared 90,000*l.* For payment whereof his maj. hath engaged those lands he then had, and the commissioners bonds. This great occasion brought his maj. when he was Prince, thus into debt; for he then gave 20,000*l.* to the Navy, and 20,000*l.* to count Mansfield, besides other great gifts that way; whereas, before, he owed very little, to his lordships own knowledge. The King's Disbursements defrayed out of his own coffers; to the king of Denmark, 46,000*l.* to the Soldiers at Plymouth and Hull, 16,000*l.* for Mourning and Funeral, 12,000*l.* paid, and 16,000*l.* to pay. Expences of the Queen, Entertainment of Ambassadors in Diet and Gifts, 40,000*l.* advanced to the Queen, 50,000*l.* to the king and queen of Bohemia, 11,000*l.* to the Navy, 300,000*l.* and 100,000*l.* to be disbursed, viz. 40,000*l.* now, and 60,000*l.* at the return.—3. The King's Estate for the future, as in Charges of Continuance, consisted of ten Articles. 1. Of Debts unpaid, and Interest. 2. Old Anticipations of 50,000*l.* 3. Anticipations of new, 200,000*l.* taken up by himself, to the emptying of all his coffers, even of that which should maintain him with bread and drink from this day forward. 4. To the king of Denmark, 30,000*l.* per mensem. 5. To count Mansfield 20,000*l.* 6. To the Dutch 8,500*l.* 7. To Ireland 2600*l.* all per mensem. 8. The queen's allowance and diet, 37,000*l.* per annum, And 9. To the king and queen of Bohemia, 20,000*l.* per annum. 10. Preparations for defence of the Realm, and seconding the Navy.—The Lord Treasurer alleged, That some sums were omitted, because they were uncertain and before his time. That no total was cast up, because he had no auditor here; and promised that himself, or his subordinate officers, would be ready to give satisfaction of all or any of these particulars."—The Lord Keeper having ended this Report, which was the business of a whole day, the Lords expressed their approbation of it, and ordered it to be entered on their Journals.

Aug. 9. A report was made in that house of what had been delivered at the conference, by the recorder of London, the solicitor general, and Mr. Pym. This report was divided, as before in the Lords, into 3 heads: The King's Answer to their Petition about Religion; the Duke's Account of the Fleet, &c. and the Lord Treasurer's Conclusion. But it is all so imperfectly inserted in the Journals of the Commons, and such great hiatus made in the recital, that it is impossible to make any thing of the matter. One particular is mentioned in the Commons Journal, not taken notice of in the Lords; which was, That the Lord Treasurer told them, "That since their house had first taken care of Religion, and had received so gracious an answer to it; therefore they ought now, speedily, to think of a Supply; not of his maj.'s wants, but of those for the defence of the kingdom."

Debate in the Commons thereupon.] The report as above, being delivered,

Mr. Maynard, (afterwards the famous serjeant Maynard,) stood up and told the house, "That it was an easy matter to infest the king of Spain; but he did not like the vast charge now demanded, which was not to be supported by the kingdom. That he was not for a war by land, but by sea; and there not with letters of marque, but for an open war. Was for recommending to his majesty the way to live gloriously at home, viz. by declaring war. Was against Subsidies in reversion; but would willingly give, if he knew how; for giving, was adding spurs to the sea-horses. Moved for a general committee to go on these matters the next day."

Mr. Mallet said, "That it was not proper to stand too much upon precedents. That it was plain the house did not regard them, when they tended to straiten the king's revenue: For, in the act of tonnage and poundage, which was always, since Henry VI's time, granted for life, it is limited now but to the 25th of March next, contrary to former precedents. He moved for a consideration of the danger, which might grow by not contenting the king in his just desires this parliament."—Others moved for a grand Committee to go upon these matters the next morning at 8 of the clock; which was agreed to.

The King's Message to hasten the Supply.] Aug. 10. Mr. Chancellor delivered a Message to the house from the king to this effect: "That his maj. understanding this house intended to enter into consideration of divers heads, concerning the king and commonwealth, had sent by him this Message: That he was well pleased with their good intentions; but desired them to consider that his affairs required a speedy dispatch. That tho' the season was far spent, it was yet seasonable; and, if the plague should begin in the navy, the action would be lost; or, if any here should be touched with the sickness, much inconvenience would ensue by an abrupt breaking up. Therefore he desired a present answer about his Supply: If not, he will take care of their healths more than they themselves, and make as good a shift for his present occasions as he could: But, if they would now comply, he gave them his royal word, that in winter, at what time they should chuse, they should meet again, and hold together till they had perfected all those things for the king and commonwealth, which are now before them. To all which he promised to give such answers, as dutiful and loyal subjects might expect from a gracious and religious king. Lastly, The king desired them to consider, That this was the first request he ever made unto them."

Debate on the King's Message.] The debates on this Message and the Supply were this day very long, above 30 different members speaking in them: The most material of whose arguments, pro and con, we shall collect, and give as follows:

The Master of the Wards argued, "That the reputation of both king and kingdom, in point of honour, was at stake. That the preparations now making for war, must have their movement from parliament. 2. The consideration of the disastrous state of the king's royal sister; 3. Religion in great danger abroad, which suffered also at home. 4. Consideration of their confederates; who would fall asunder, if their king did not hold them together. 5. The danger of king, lords, and commons, by the sickness, by a longer continuance."

Sir Roger North said, "That he was once against giving any thing at this time; but had now altered his opinion by his maj.'s most gracious answer about Religion; also: because it was his first request: besides the consequence of an ill parting this parliament would be a thing very acceptable to the Papists. Moved for two Fifteens to be added to the two Subsidies."

Mr. Chancellor of the Duchy said, "That precedents were neither to be despised, nor adored as gods. That in the first parliament of the late king, two Subsidies were granted and four Fifteens; within a month after one Subsidy more was given in the same session. Mors in olla. If all our greatest enemies were here they would refuse to give; to give now, because they could not, at another time, give towards this supply."

Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer wished them to leave now their fears, jealousies, and disgusts at home, and to rely upon the king's promise for their next meeting to reform such things. These disorders complained of did not happen in this king's time; that he, both in his father's and his own time, had assured them of his desire and resolution to reform those things. Moved the question, Whether we will give at this time, or not.

Sir Robert Philips said, "That the point now before them, by the king's last message, might be reduced short to this; either to give presently, or else that, in respect of danger to us, he will adjourn us to some other time. That the arguments for giving were honour, necessity, and safety; honourable actions grounded upon sound counsels. That necessity had been the continual argument for Supply in all parliaments; but the counsels which had put the king, and the present great designs into this hazard, whoever gave them must answer it. Moved that the present necessity might be supplied by some other means, rather than by so dangerous a precedent. That a committee might be appointed to consider of a fit Answer to the king, why they could not now give; and yet to assure him that they would, in due time, supply all his honourable and well-grounded designs."

Sir Francis Seymour said, "That the commons of England should be called hither only for a Supply of 40,000*l.* shewed that the king's necessities were great. What was become of all the money raised by the act of resumption of the crown lands? That 140,000*l.* had been also raised by places of honour; places of justice were sold, and sergeants places; which must come to a greater sum."—Others argued for giving, so that it might be in a parliamentary manner. But,

Sir Thos. Wentworth said, "That he feared the pressing this precedent for so small a sum was to take the advantage of it for greater things hereafter. Was against present giving; but most ready and willing to give in due time."

Sir Heneage Finch argued, "That the granting of Subsidies in reversion, as the clergy had done, was to bind and give for our executors, as they had for their successors. He disliked their drawing hither; and wished they might never hereafter be put upon such rocks: Yet was for giving then, in respect of the king's answer to their petition about Religion; the rather, because he had said it was not done to draw us on: But to do this with great caution, and with a protestation never to do the like, upon any necessity hereafter."

Mr. Rolle said, "That the king could not but have credit, without their grant, for 40,000*l*. That if the necessity for money was now so great, this was the time to press for redress of grievances. That Turkish pirates take our ships and men, and endanger our coasts; which were forced to arm to defend themselves." The last speaker, on this side, we shall mention was, old

Sir Edward Coke; who said, "That two leaks would drown any ship. That solum & malum concilium was a bottomless sieve. An officer should not be, cupidus alienæ rei, parvus suæ; avarus republicæ; super omnia expertus. Misera servitus est, ubi lex incerta aut incognita. That in the 11th Hen. 3. Hubert de Burgh, chief justice, advised the king that Magna Charta was not to hold, because the king was under age when that act was made. He was created earl of Kent, but degraded for this some time after. In the 16th Hen. 3. Segrave, chief justice, was sentenced for giving sole counsel to the king against the common-wealth. That it was malum consilium to press more Subsidies when they had given two; and to bring them hither only for 40,000*l*. And, lastly, offered to give 1000*l*. out of his own estate, rather than grant any Subsidy now." The result of all which was, resolution was then agreed on, "That a committee of the whole house should be appointed at eight o'clock the next morning, to consider what return to make to his maj.'s message delivered this day."

The Commons proceed in the Consideration of Grievances, and postpone the Supply.] Aug. 11th. Notwithstanding yesterday's resolution, we find no mention of the Message in this day's proceedings; instead of that, the house went upon a Complaint made against sir Francis Stewart, an admiral, for suffering a pirate to take an English ship before his face. That the merchants acquainted him with this, and desired him to go out and chase the pirate; who answered, that his commission was not to go on the French coast, where he conceived the pirate was. He confessed that he saw the pirate board the English ship, but thought they had been fishermen. That, in conclusion, though he was offered great sums of money, or half the goods in the ship, yet he refused to go out.—Sir

Edw. Coke moved for a committee to be appointed for this; and afterwards to acquaint the lords with it. Sir F. Seymour said, "That the lord admiral, Buckingham, had the care of these things; therefore the default must needs be in him or his agents. And moved for a committee to consider of the causes thereof, and where the default lay." Mr. Lyster mentioned the wrongs done to our trade, by the Dunkirkers; and therefore moved that the committee to be appointed might in a general way, consider of this, and the safety of all the seaports." Others agreeing in this, a committee of the whole house was appointed to take these matters into consideration.

The rest of this day was taken up with a long repetition of the Pardon to the Jesuits, &c. and of their desiring a conference with the lords, in order to induce them to join in a Petition to the king, to beseech him not to be importuned hereafter by any foreign ambassador, to grant any thing contrary to the Answers to their former Petition. On which Sir R. Philips observed, "That no Popish king would, at the instigation of our Ambassadors, release any person out of the Inquisition." A conference with the lords, on this, was agreed upon, and held, and Sir Edw. Coke made the report of it to their house. After repeating what is said before, about obtaining the Pardon from the king, he told them, "That the Lords had resolved to move the king never to pardon any Jesuit, or other Papist, till they were attainted. For their joining in the petition, they denied it not; but, considering his maj.'s gracious Answer to their other Petition about Religion, and that both houses were to give him thanks for it, the purport of this last might only be intimated to the king; which the Lords pressed them to consent to. That he had declared the satisfaction of that house, touching the Pardon and the date thereof, and the lord Conway's letter. Lastly, That all the lords were most hearty in the point of Religion."

The King dissolves the Parliament.] Aug. 12th. A Protestation was unanimously agreed upon, by the Commons, in a grand committee, which was reported to the house, ordered to be entered in the clerk's book, and presented to his maj. with all convenient speed, by all the members that were of the privy council, with sir John Fullerton and sir R. Carr attending them. Immediately after this, the gentleman-usher of the black rod came to call the house and the Speaker to come up to the lords, to hear a commission from the king, read to both houses: which was done accordingly.—Thus far the Journals. But Rushworth proceeds to tell us, "That the king, perceiving the commons resolved against a Supply, without redress of Grievances; and, in their debates, to reflect upon some great persons near himself, on the 12th of Aug. sent to the house of peers a commission, directed to several lords, for the Dissolution of the Parliament. And the Speaker, with the other house, being sent for, the commission was read before them all and this parliament was declared to be dissolved."—The Protestation of the Commons, mentioned above, is not in their Journals; but is preserved by Rushworth, and some other historians of those times, and is as follows:

The Commons' Protestation.] "We the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the commons house of parliament; being the representative body of the whole commons of this realm, abundantly comforted in his maj.'s late gracious Answer touching Religion, and his Message for the care of our health, do solemnly protest and vow before God and the world, with one heart and voice, that we are all resolved, and do hereby declare, that we will ever continue most loyal and obedient subjects to our most gracious sovereign lord king Charles; and that we will be ready in convenient time, and in a parliamentary way, freely and dutifully to do our utmost endeavours, to discover and reform the abuses and grievances of the realm and state; and in like sort to afford all necessary supply to his most excellent maj. upon his present, and all other his just occasions and designs; most humbly beseeching our said dear and dread sovereign, in his princely wisdom and goodness, to rest assured of the true and hearty affections of his poor commons, and to esteem the same to be (as we conceive it is indeed) the greatest worldly reputation and security that a just king can have; and to account all such as slanderers of the peoples affections, and enemies to the common-wealth, that shall dare to say the contrary."

As we have hitherto given the State of the Peérage, at the beginning of every new reign, we shall now do the same; by exhibiting

A New Parliament called.] In the ensuing month of February, which was still the first year of his reign, the king thought proper to summon a New Parliament, which met at Westminster, on Monday the 6th of the said month.

The King's Speech.] His maj. being placed on his royal throne, the lords in their robes, and the commons below the bar, it pleased his maj. to speak as followeth: "My lords spiritual and temporal, and you gentlemen all; of mine own nature I do not love long speeches, and I know I am not very good to speak much. Therefore I mean to shew what I should speak in actions; and therefore I mean to bring in the old custom, which many of my predecessors have used before me, which is that my lord keeper should tell you at large what I should speak to you in parliament."

* By the Judgment passed upon this great man (see Vol. I. p. 1249), he was disabled from ever sitting in parliament; and though he was afterwards pardoned by king James, yet he was not summoned during that reign.

[The Lord Keeper's Speech.] The Keeper (sir Thomas Coventry), conferring first with his maj. spake as followeth; "My lords, and you the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons, You are here assembled, by his maj.'s writ and royal authority, to hold a new parl. the general, antient, and powerful council of this renowned kingdom; whereof, if we consider aright, and think of that incomparable distance between the supreme height and maj. of a mighty monarch and the submissive awe and lowliness of loyal subjects, we cannot but receive exceeding comfort and contentment in the frame and constitution of this highest court; wherein not only the prelates, nobles, and grandees, but the commons of all degrees have their part; and wherein that high maj. doth descend to admit, or rather to invite, the humblest of his subjects to conference and counsel with him, of the great, weighty, and difficult affairs of the king and kingdom; a benefit and favour whereof we cannot be too sensible and thankful; for sure I am, that all good hearts would be both sensible and sorrowful, if we did want it; and therefore it becometh all, with united hearts, and minds free from distraction and diversion, to fix their thoughts upon counsels and consultations worthy of such an assembly, remembering, that in it is presented the maj. and greatness, the authority and power, the wisdom and knowledge of this great and famous nation; and it becometh us to magnify and bless God, that hath put the power of assembling parliaments in the hands of him, the virtue (inherent) of whose person doth strive with the greatness of his princely lineage and descent, whether he should be accounted major or melior, a greater king, or a better man; and of whom you have had so much trial and experience, that he doth as affectionately love, as he doth exactly know and understand the true use of parliaments; witness his daily and unwearied access to this house, before his access to the crown; his gracious readiness in all conferences of importance; his frequent and effectual intercession to his blessed father of never-dying memory, for the good of the kingdom, with so happy success, that both this and future generations shall feel it, and have cause to rejoice at the success of his maj.'s intercession. And when the royal diadem descended upon himself, presently, in the midst of his tears and sighs for the departure of his most dear and royal father, in his very first consultations with his privy council, was resolved to meet his people in parliament. And no sooner did the heavy hand of that destroying angel forbear those deadly strokes, which for some time did make this place inaccessible, but his maj. presently resolved to recall it, and hath now brought you together, and in a happy time, I trust, to treat and consult, with uniform desires and united affections, of those things that concern the general good.—And now being thus assembled, his maj. hath commanded me to let you know, That his love and affection to the public moved him to call this parliament; and looking into the danger and the spreading of that late mortality, and weighing the multitude of his maj.'s pressing occasions and urgent affairs of state, both at home and abroad, much importing the honour and safety of this kingdom; the same affection that moved him to call it doth forbid him to prolong the sitting of this parliament: And therefore his maj. resolving to confine this meeting to a short time, hath confined me to a short errand; and that is, That as things most agreeable to his kindly office, to the example of the best times, and to the frame of modern affairs, his maj. hath called you together to consult and advise of provident and good laws, profitable for the public, and fitting for the present times and occasions; for upon such depends the assurance of religion and justice, which are the surest pillars and buttresses of all good government in a kingdom: For his maj. doth consider, that the royal throne, on which God, out of his mercy to us, hath set him, is the fountain of all justice, and that good laws are the streams and rills by which the benefit and use of this fountain is dispersed to his people; and it is his maj.'s care and study, that his people may see, with comfort and joy of heart, that this fountain is not dry; but they and their posterity may rest assured and confident, in his time, to receive as ample benefit from this fountain, by his maj.'s mercy and justice, as ever subjects did in the time of the most eminent princes amongst his noble progenitors; wherein, as his maj. shews himself most sensible of the good of the public, so were it an injury to this great and honourable assembly, if it should be but doubted, that they shall not be as sensible of any thing that may add to his maj.'s honour; which cannot but receive a high degree of love and affection, if his maj. succeeding so many religious, wise, and renowned princes, should begin his reign with some additions unto those good laws which their happy and glorious times have afforded. And this his maj. hath caused me to desire at this time especially above others; for his maj. having, at his royal coronation, lately solemnized the sacred rites of that blessed marriage between him and his people; and therein, by a most holy oath, vowed the protection of the laws and maintenance of peace, both to church and people; no time can be so fit for his maj. to advise and consult at large with his people, as at this present time, wherein so lately his maj. hath vowed protection to his people, and they have protested their allegiance and service to him. This is the sum of that charge which I have received from his maj. to deliver unto you; wherein you see his maj.'s intent to the public: and therefore his desire is, That, according to that conveniency of time which his affairs may afford, you will apply yourselves to dispatch the business of this parliament. And you of the house of commons, for to you I must speak, his maj.'s pleasure is, that, according to your antient custom, you may resort to the house appointed for you, and there make choice of a Speaker, whom his maj. wisheth to be presented unto him on Wednesday next."

The Speaker's Speech.] On the Wednesday following, the commons presented sir Heneage Finch, knt. serjeant at law, and recorder of London, for their Speaker; who having made the accustomed excuses, and acknowledged his maj.'s approbation, made this speech.

"Since it hath pleased your maj. not to admit my humble excuse, but, by your royal approbation, to crown this election; after my heart and hands first lifted up to God, that hath thus inclined your royal heart, I do render my humblest thanks to your maj. who are pleased to cast so gracious an eye upon so mean a subject; and to descend so low as, in a service of this importance, to take me into your princely thoughts. And since we all stand for hundreds and thousands, for figures and cyphers, as your maj. the supreme and sovereign auditor, shall please to place and value us, and, like coin to pass, are made current by your royal stamp and impression only, I shall neither disable nor undervalue myself, but with a faithful and cheerful heart, apply myself with the best of my strength and abilities, to the performance of this weighty and public charge; wherein, as I do, and shall to the end, most humbly desire your gracious acceptance of my good intentions and endeavours, so I could not but gather some confidence to myself, that your maj. will look favourably upon the works of your own hands. And, in truth, besides this particular, these public things which are obvious to every understanding, are so many arguments of comfort and encouragement; when I contemplate and take a view of those inestimable blessings, which, by the goodness of God, we do enjoy under your maj.'s most pious and prudent government.—If we behold the frame and the face of the government in general, we live under a monarchy; the best of governments, the nearest resemblance unto the divine majesty which the earth affords, the most agreeable to nature, and that in which other states and republics do easily fall and reverse into the ocean, and are naturally dissolved as into their primam materiam. The laws by which we are governed, are above any value my words can set upon them; time hath refined and approved them; they are equal at least to any laws human, and so curiously framed and fitted, that as we live under a temperate climate, so the laws are temperate; yielding a due observance to the prerogative royal, and yet preserving the right and liberty of the subject; that which Tacitus saith of two of the best emperors, "Res olim insociabiles miscuerunt, imperium & libertas : And so far is this from the least diminution of sovereigns, that, in this, your maj. is truly stiled pater patriæ, and the greatest king in the world, that is king of such and so many free-born subjects, whose persons you have not only power over, but, which is above the greatest of kings, to command their hearts. If time or corruption of manners breed any mists or grievance, or discover any defect in the law, they are soon reformed by parliament, the greatest court of justice, and the greatest council of the kingdom, to which all other courts and councils are subordinate. Here your royal person still introneth in the state of maj. attended by a reverend and learned prelacy, a great and full nobility introneth, like stars in the firmament, some of a greater, some of a lesser magnitude, full of light and beauty, and acknowledging to whom they owe their lustre; and by a choice number of worthy knights and gentlemen, that represent the whole body of your commons. But to leave generals: We live not under a monarchy only, the best of governments, and under a government the best of monarchies; but under a king the best of monarchs, your royal person, and those eminent graces and virtues which are inherent in your person, (in whom greatness and goodness contend for superiority) it were presumption in me to touch, though with never so good a meaning; they will not be bounded within the narrow compass of my discourse: and such pictures of such a king are not to be made in limning, but for public things and actions which the least eye may see and discern; and in them, obliquely and by reflection, cheerfully and with comfort behold your person. What age shall not record and eternize your princely magnanimities in that heroic action or venturous journey into Spain, or hazarding your person to preserve the kingdom? Fathers will tell it to their children in succession; After-ages will then think it a fable. Your piety to the memory of your dear father, in following and bedewing his herse with your tears, is full in every man's memory. The public humiliation when God's hand lay heavy upon us, and the late public thanksgiving to Almighty God for removing his hand, both commanded and performed in person by your maj. is a work in piety not to be forgotten; and I trust the Lord will remember them, and reward them with mercy and blessing to your maj. and the whole kingdom. Your love to justice, and your care in the administration of justice, we all behold with comfort, and rejoice to see it; the great courts of justice from the highest to the lowest furnished with judges of that wisdom and gravity, learning and integrity. The thrones of kings are established by justice; and may it establish, and I doubt not but it will establish the throne of your maj. in your person, and in your royal line, to the end of time. But above all, and indeed it is above all, as far as heaven is distant from the earth, your care and zeal for the advancement of God's true religion and worship, are clearly and fully exprest, and do appear both in your person, and by your public acts and edicts. It is true that it is said of princes, "Quod faciunt præcipiunt : " of your maj. both are true, and a proposition unde convertible. We have received a most gracious answer from your maj. to all our late petitions concerning religion, seconded with a public declaration under the great seal, and enrolled in all the courts of justice, for your royal pleasure and direction to awaken and put life into these laws by a careful execution, with provision that the penalties be not converted to your private coffers; and yet the coffers of the kings are not private coffers, but, by your express direction, set apart to public uses, such as concern the immediate defence of the kingdom, wherein we all have our share and interest. Your royal proclamation hath commanded those Romish Priests and Jesuits to banishment; those incendiaries that infect the state of this church and common-wealth. Their very entrance into this kingdom is, by a just and provident law, made treason; their aims being in truth (how specious soever their pretences be) nothing else but to plot and contrive treason against the state, and to seduce your natural born subjects from their true obedience, nourishing in their posterities factions and seditions: witness those many treasons and conspiracies against the person of that glorious lady, whose memory will never die; and that horrible matchless conspiracy, the Powder Treason, the master-piece of the devil. But God that preserved her and your royal father against all their treacherous conspiracies, and hath given you a heart to honour him, will honour and preserve you: religion will not more truly keep your kingdoms, than the seas do compass them: it is the joy of heart to your maj.'s loyal and well-affected subjects, and will ever be the honour of your regal diadem, and the crown of your crown. The Spanish Invasion in 1588, I hope will ever be remembered in England, with thankful acknowledgment to God for so great a deliverance: and I assure myself it is remembered in Spain, but with another mind, a mind of revenge; they are too constant to their counsels, to acquit their resolutions and purposes that drew on that attempt. It was long before discovered, and since printed, not without their liking, that they affect an universal monarchy. Videor mihi videre (saith Lipsius of their state) Solem orientem ab occidente; a monster in nature. And one of their own, speaking of the two great lights which God had placed in the firmament, makes the Pope Luminare majus presidens urbi & orbi, and the king of Spain, Luminare minus at subdetur urbi & dominetur per totum orbem: a great flattery; and a bold and impudent illusion. But I trust, as God hath put it into the heart of your blessed father, by the matchless book of his, written to all christian monarchs and princes (a work by which he raised a monument to himself more lasting than marble) to denounce war to that adversary of God and kings, the Pope; so he hath set your sacred maj. upon the throne of your father, to do as many things worthy to be written, as he had written things worthy to be read, amongst them, to restrain that unlimited pride and boundless ambition of Spain, to reduce it to their proper current and channel; who, under the title of catholic king, makes his pretence to more countries and kingdoms than his own; and, by colour of disguised treaties, he invades the Palatinate, and dispossesteth the incomparable lady your royal sister, and the children of this kingdom, of their right and their antient patrimony and inheritance, to the discomfort and dishonour of this great and glorious nation. God in his mercy soon repair this breach by your royal head; and, I assure myself, the hearts, the hands, and the purses of all good subjects will say Amen.—But I may weary your maj. and lose myself, and forget for whom I am Speaker. Custom gives me the privilege, as an humble suitor on the behalf of the house, to present their few petitions unto your majesty. 1. The first, That, for our better attending this public and important service, ourselves and our necessary attendance may, with your maj.'s tender allowance, be free, both in our persons and goods, from arrests and troubles, according to our antient privileges. 2. The next, That since, for the preparing and drawing to conclusion such propositions as shall be handled in the house, debate and dispute will be necessary; and by variety of opinions, truth is oftentimes best discerned; your maj. will likewise, according to your antient usage and privilege, vouchsafe us liberty and freedom of speech, from which, I assure myself, duty and loyalty to your maj. will never be severed. 3. That when occasions of moment shall require, your maj. upon our humble suit, and at such times as may best sort with your occasions, will vouchsafe us access to your royal person. 4. That the proceedings of the house may receive a favourable interpretation at your gracious hands, and be free from misconstructions."

All the Commons receive the Sacrament.]

The first thing the Commons went upon, was to appoint a grand committee for privileges and elections: to fix a day and place for receiving the communion; and to nominate a preacher. Every member of the house was to take the Sacrament at St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, on Sunday Sevennight: To bring his name, and the place for which he serves, and to deliver it to some gentlemen appointed for that purpose. After that time no man was to come into the house, till he had first received the communion in the presence of some of this committee. This religious precaution had been taken at the beginning of some late parliaments, designed, no doubt, for the detection of concealed papists; imagining, that though they might take the oath of allegiance and supremacy, against their consciences, yet they would not be so wicked as to crown their hypocrisy with receiving the sacrament.

The King's Message concerning sir Edm. Coke.] Feb. 10. The Chancellor of the Exchequer delivered a message from the king to the commons, to this effect: "That his maj.

taking notice of an order they had made, to send out new writs upon double returns, desires to acquaint them also, That sir Edw. Coke, being sheriff of Buckinghamshire, was returned one of the knights of the shire for Norfolk, contrary to the tenor of the writ: therefore he hoped the house would do him that right as to send out a new writ for that county."—In order to understand the meaning of this Message better, it is necessary to look into the histories of these times for a further explanation. It is said, That, to disqualify some gentlemen, who had been zealous in their opposition to the court in the last parliament, from serving in this, the king had pricked them as sheriffs of counties for the year ensuing. Amongst the rest old sir Edw. Coke, who had so vigorously distinguished himself against the minister and his measures, was nominated as above. This great lawyer demurred to the oath of a sheriff, and insisted that one part of it, which was to destroy and eradicate all heresies, commonly called Lollardies, was not to be taken. This produced an order of council, wherein that clause was left out of the oath, and established to continue so for the future: however, sir Edw. got himself returned, as knight of the shire, for another county; and this was the occasion of the king's message, and the debates in the house of commons which ensued upon it. Though all that the house did this day, in relation to the message, was to refer it to the committee of privileges and elections, to report their opinions of the law in these cases, and the usage of parliament, and to be the first heard.

Motion concerning Scandalous Ministers. Sir Benj. Rudyard got up and moved the house on account of Religion, "Whereof," he said, the king had given ample testimonies of his great care and concern, both by his maj.'s late proclamations, and the life given to the execution of the laws against them, by commissions and letters: but he thought there ought to be some care taken against scandalous Ministers, as well as scandalous Livings. "Said," That he knew two ministers in Lancashire, who were found to be unlicensed ale-house keepers." A Committee was ordered to consider thereof.

Mr. Pym moved, "That this committee might also consider of certain Articles, set down last parliament, but not put into their Petition, or any thing else concerning Religion." Upon which motions a large committee was appointed, and all that would come were to have voices, to consider of all points concerning Religion, and to present their opinions to the house.

Sir John Elliot proposed, first, in general, to consider of the State of the Country, and a Relief for Grievances, &c. For particulars; first, the consideration of the King's Revenue. Next, an account how the Subsidies and Fifteens, granted the 21. Jac. were expended; and therein to include the examination of the carriage and miscarriage of the last fleet: misgovernment; misemployment of the king's revenues; miscounselling, &c." and moved for a special committee to take consideration thereof. But happening, in his speech, to make use of the word 'Courtier,' he was called upon by sir Geo. Goring to explain it: which he did, but in what manner is not mentioned.

Feb. 21. After reading some petitions for payment of some monies disbursed for the maintenance of the English officers and forces, under count Mansfield, in the Low Countries, a grand Committee was appointed to consider of those things; and also of the three Subsidies and Fifteens formerly granted: to audit the accounts by a Sub-Committee, who were to prepare them ready for the other's inspection. Some of the succeeding days were taken up with reading of bills, of no great moment, the house being divided into different committees; amongst which, that on Grievances was busy in hearing complaints against the prime minister, and examining witnesses against him.

Feb. 27. Sir John Finch made a report from the committee of privileges and elections, what they had done in the Case of sir Edw. Coke aforementioned: wherein many cases were cited pro & contra, as to the nature of an high sheriff for one county being elected knight of the shire for another. On all which cases, he said, the committee would give no opinion; but desired that a search might be made amongst the records, for more precedents of the like nature. But the debate about this was put off to the 3d of March, and from thence to another day; from which time we hear no more of it. In all probability sir Edw. lost his seat in the house; for he is no way taken notice of as a speaker, or otherwise, throughout the whole course of this session afterwards, except on the day before the dissolution of this parliament; when, on the question, it was resolved; "That sir Edw. Coke, standing, de facto, returned a member of that house, should have privilege against a suit in chancery, commenced against him by the lady Clare."

Conduct of the Duke of Buckingham inquired into. Affairs of a higher nature now began to rise; and, what had been long hatching in the Commons, takes shape and life, and becomes very formidable against the minister and all his creatures. The recital of which not appearing in the Journals of either house, clear enough to distinguish rightly the particular movements of this grand attack, we shall not follow them, as usual, in die ad diem: but, in general, relate the source and ending of this great affair. The house of commons had been long busy in getting materials for exhibiting articles against the duke of Buckingham. Their committee on Grievances made several reports; That they had learned the reason why our merchant ships and goods were seized in France, was because our admirals had seized the goods of that nation in several ports of England, particularly in the ship called the Peter of Newhaven; which was brought into Plymouth by order of the duke, after the king and council had ordered it to be restored upon a just claim, and the court of admiralty had also released her : that 23 bags of silver and 8 bags of gold, taken out of this ship, were, by sir Francis Stewart, delivered to the lord duke : That till this action, the French did not begin to seize any English ships or goods ; and that the duke, having notice of it, said, he would justify the stay of the ship by an express order from the king.

The Commons examine the Council of War.]

The next thing we find, is, That the commons sent out a particular warrant, by their serjeant, to summon the whole Council of War before them, who were appointed to manage the business for the relief of the Palatinate, and this question was proposed unto them, "Whether their advice was followed, which they gave for the four ends, mentioned in the act of parl. 21. Jac. for which the money given by that act was to issue and be applied?" The names of this council of war were, the lords Carey, Brook, Vere, and Grandison, sir Rob. Maunsel, sir John Ogle, and sir Tho. Button. The first excused himself by the weakness and infirmities then upon him : The next, by his age, being 72, and having parted with his places : the lord Vere, the same, by his absence in the wars of the Low Countries : lord Grandison said, That since July last, they had seldom met, being dispersed by the sickness ; but desired leave, in a question of such consequence, to confer together before they answered : and this was also the request of the rest. Which was granted, with a special order of the house to deliver their answer personally, in 3 days time. But what they then delivered in, not appearing satisfactory to the house, they were ordered to be examined singly on the question ; but none of them appeared willing to gratify the house in that particular, except sir Rob. Maunsel.—It may not be improper, upon this occasion, to observe, That, for the better employment of the money to be expended in managing of the expected war, the Treasurers and the King's Council for the War, were required to make oath, viz. The Treasurers, "That none of those monies should issue out of their hands, without warrant from the said council of war : " and the other, "That they should make no warrants for the payment of any of those monies, but only of the ends above mentioned." And further, Should all be accountable for their doings and proceedings in that behalf, to the Commons in Parliament, when they, or any of them, should be thereunto required."—See Stat. at Large, 21 Jac. C. 34.

The King's Letter to the Speaker to hasten the Supply.] Whilst this affair was debating, the king sent a Letter to the Speaker, and a Message, by sir R. Weston, to the house ; which were as follows :

"Charles R. Trusty and well-beloved, &c.—Having assembled the parliament early in the beginning of the year, for the more timely help and advice of our people in our great and important affairs ; and having of late, not only by Message, but also of ourself, put our house of commons in mind of our pressing occasions, and of the present state of Christendom, wherein they have equal interest with us, as well in respect of their own former engagements, as of the common cause ; we shall not need to tell them with what care and patience we have, in the midst of our necessities, attended their resolutions ; but, because their unseasonable slowness may produce at home as ill effects as a denial, and hazard the whole estate of things abroad, we have thought fit, by you the Speaker, to let them know, That, without more loss of time, we look for a full and perfect Answer of what they will give for our Supply, according to our expectation and their promises ; wherein, as we press for nothing beyond the present state and condition of our subjects, so will we accept no less than is proportionable to the greatness and goodness of the cause ; neither do we press them to a present resolution in this, with a purpose to precipitate their counsels, much less to enter upon their privileges ; but to shew, that it is unfit to depend any longer upon uncertainties, whereby the whole weight of the affairs of Christendom may break in upon us on the sudden, to our dishonour, and the shame of this nation. And, for the business at home, we command you to promise them in our name, that, after they have satisfied us in this our reasonable demand, we shall not only continue them together at this time, so long as the season will permit, but call them shortly again to perfect those necessary businesses which shall be now left undone ; and now we shall willingly apply fit and seasonable remedies to such just Grievances, which they shall present unto us in a dutiful and mannerly way, without throwing an ill odor upon our present government, or upon the government, of our late blessed father. And if there be yet who desire to find fault, we shall think him the wisest reprehender of errors past, who, without reflecting backward, can give us counsel how to settle the present estate of things, and to provide for the future safety and honour of the kingdom."

The King's Message for hastening the Supply.]

The heads of the king's Message by the chancellor of the exchequer were these : 1. "That his maj.'s fleet being returned, and the victuals spent, the men must of necessity be discharged, and their wages paid, or else an assured mutiny will follow : which may be many ways dangerous at this time. 2. "That his maj. hath made ready about 40 ships, to be set forth on a second voyage, to hinder the enemy, which want only victuals and some men ; which, without present Supply of money, cannot be set forth and kept together. 3. "That the Army which is appointed in every coast must presently be disbanded, if they be not forthwith supplied with victuals and cloaths. 4. "That if the companies of Ireland, lately sent thither, be not provided for, instead of defending that country, they will prove the authors of rebellion. 5. That the season for providing healthful victuals will be past, if this month be neglected. And therefore his maj. commandeth me to tell you, that he desired to know, without further delay of time, what Supply you will give him for these his present occasions, that he may accordingly frame his course and counsel."

The Answer of the commons, and the king's Reply to it, are both preserved by Rushworth, in this form:—

Answer of the Commons.] "Most gracious sovereign; Your majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons now assembled in parliament, in all humility, present unto your royal wisdom this their loyal Answer to the Message which your majesty was pleased, by the chancellor of your exchequer, to send unto them, desiring to know, without any further deferring of time, what Supply they would give to your maj. for your present and extraordinary occasions, that you might accordingly frame your courses and counsels. First of all, they most humbly beseech your maj. to know and rest assured, That no king was ever dearer to his people than your maj. no people more zealous to maintain and advance the honour and greatness of their king than they; which, as upon all occasions they shall be ready to express, so especially in the support of that cause, wherein your maj. and your allies are now justly engaged. And because they cannot doubt, but your maj. in your great wisdom, even out of justice, and according to the example of your most famous predecessors, will be pleased graciously to accept the faithful and necessary information and advice of your parliament, which can have no end but the service of your maj. and safety of your realm, in discovering the causes, and proposing the remedies of these great evils, which have occasioned your maj.'s wants and your people's grief: They therefore, in confidence and full assurance of redress therein, do, with one consent, propose (tho', in former time, such course hath been unused) that they really intend to assist and supply your maj. in such a way, and in so ample a measure, as may make you safe at home, and feared abroad; for the dispatch whereof they will use such diligence, as your maj.'s pressing and present occasions shall require."

The King's Reply.] His maj. made this Reply to the Answer of the commons:—"Mr. Speaker, The Answer of the Commons delivered by you, I like well of, and do take it for a full and satisfactory Answer, and I thank them for it; and I hope you will, with all expedition, take a course for performance thereof, the which will turn to your own good, as well as mine: but for your clause therein, of presenting of Grievances, I take that but for a parenthesis in your speech, and not a condition; and yet for answer to that part, I will tell you, I will be as willing to hear your Grievances, as my predecessors have been, so that you will apply yourselves to redress grievances, and not to enquire after grievances. I must let you know, that I will not allow any of my servants to be questioned amongst you, much less such as are of eminent place, and near unto me. The old question was, What shall be done to the man whom the king will honour? But now it hath been the labour of some, to seek what may be done against him whom the king thinks fit to honour. I see you specially aim at the duke of Buckingham: I wonder what hath so altered your affections towards him. I do well remember, that in the last parliament in my father's time, when he was the instrument to break the Treaties, all of you (and yet I cannot say all, for I know some of you are changed, but yet the house of commons is always the same) did so much honour and respect him, that all the honour conferred on him was too little; and what he hath done since to alter and change your minds, I wot not; but can assure you, he hath not meddled, or done any thing concerning the public or common wealth, but by special directions and appointment, and as my servant; and is so far from gaining or improving his estate thereby, that I verily think he hath rather impaired the same. I wish you would hasten my Supply, or else it will be worse for yourselves; for, if any ill happen, I think I shall be the last that shall feel it."

Mr. Coke's Reflections on the Duke of Buckingham.] But the spirit raised against the minister could not be suppressed by any thing the king could do; and no Supply was to be expected till the duke was given up to public vengeance. The commons followed the chase very warmly against him; and, in some of their debates, very severe expressions were used against the court; particularly Mr. Clement Coke (son of sir Edward Coke), said, "that it was better to die by an enemy, than to suffer at home." And another member, Dr. Turner, a physician, proposed to the house the following Queries, against the duke, grounded upon public fame.

Dr. Turner's Queries against the D. of Buckingham.] 1. "Whether the duke, being admiral, be not the cause of the loss of the king's royalty in the narrow seas?" 2. Whether the unreasonable, exorbitant, and immense gifts of money and lands, on the duke and his relations, be not the cause of impairing the king's revenue, and impoverishing the crown?" 3. "Whether the multiplicity of offices conferred upon the duke, and others depending upon him, whereof they were not capable, be not the cause of the evil government of this kingdom?" 4. Whether Recusants, in general, by a kind of connivency, be not borne out and increased, by reason the duke's mother and father-in law were known papists? 5. Whether the sale of offices, honours, and places of judicature, with ecclesiastical livings and promotions, a scandal and hurt to the kingdom, be not thro' the duke? 6. Whether the duke's staying at home, being admiral and general in chief of the sea and land army, was not the cause of the bad success and overthrow of the late action; and whether he gave good direction for the conduct of that design?"

When Mr. Coke spoke those words, or when these Queries were delivered to the house, we are not told; but the Journals inform us, that, the 14th of March, the chancellor of the exchequer delivered a Message from the king to the house, both concerning the words spoken by Mr. Coke, and the six Articles proposed by Dr. Turner against the duke; yet they say no farther, than that Mr. Coke stood up to clear himself from any ill intention, tending to sedition, in the words; but Rushworth is fuller, and gives us the substance of the king's Message to the house, as well as Dr. Turner's Excuse and Letter thereupon. The Message was in these words:

"That his Maj. had taken notice of a seditious speech uttered in the house by Mr. Clement Coke: the words are said to be to this effect, 'That it were better to die by an enemy, than to suffer at home.' Yet his Maj. in his wisdom, hath forbore to take any course therein, or to send to the house about it, not doubting but the house would, in due time, correct such an insolence: But his maj. hath found, that his patience hath wrought to an ill effect, and hath emboldened one since to do a strange act, in a strange way, and unusual: That is Dr. Turner; who, on Saturday last, without any ground of knowledge in himself, or proof tendered to the house, made an enquiry of sundry Articles against the duke of Buckingham, as he pretended; but indeed against the honour and government of the king and his late father. This, his maj. saith, is such an example, that he can by no means suffer, though it were to make enquiry of the meanest of his servants, much less against one so near unto himself; and doth wonder at the foolish impudency of any man that can think he should be drawn, out of any end, to offer such a sacrifice, much unworthy the greatness of a king, and master of such a servant; and therefore his maj. can no longer use his wonted patience, but desireth the justice of the house against the delinquents; not doubting but such course will be taken, that he shall not be constrained to use his legal authority to right himself against these two persons."

Upon this Message, Dr. Turner made a short explanation of himself, desiring to know where-with he was charged. "What he said, he said, the house can witness; and what he said, he spake for the general good of the commonwealth, and not upon the least reflection of any in particular. This he thought a parliamentary way, warranted by antient precedents. To accuse upon Common Fame, he finds warranted, first, by the imperial Roman laws, and the canons of the church, which allowed common fame sufficient to accuse any man. And they that are learned amongst them give two reasons: first for greatness, next for cunning. Our ancestors, within these walls, have done the like, and that to a duke, the duke of Suffolk, in the time of Hen. 6. who was accused upon fame." See vol. 1. p. 387. "And, lastly, he said, Mr. chancellor himself did present the common undertakers upon particular fame; and why he should not have as ample privilege in this place, he knew no reason to the contrary."

Dr. Turner's Excuse.] The commons appointed another day for the debate of this business, and in the mean time, the following letter from Dr. Turner was received by the Speaker.

"Sir; These lines first petition you to signify to the hon. house of commons, That my desires are still the same to have made my personal appearance before you, but my ability and strength to perform it are not the same; and therefore that I humbly desire them to excuse me on that part, and to accept of this my answer unto the matter that I shall speak to. I do confess, that, on Saturday last, in the afternoon, I did deliver in certain accusations of common fame, into the house of parliament, against my lord admiral, and that out of so many, all bearing the signature of vox populi, I chose out some few, not because they were greater, or more known grievances, but because they did seem to direct us to find out the griever, or the first cause: For I did think it was then full time to agree the agent and the actions; and that it was time also to leave considering grievances in arbitration. I do now also agree unto you, that which has been reported to you by Mr. Wandesford; and by that, if you shall think fit, will put myself unto your censure; hoping, and assuring myself, that you will find my design to include nothing else within it, but duty and public service to my country; and also, that my addressing those accusations to the house of parliament, shall, by you, be found to be done by a mannerly and parliamentary way. But, howsoever, it becomes me to submit my cause to your wisdoms and equal judgments, which I do heartily; and whatsoever you shall please to appoint me, I shall dutifully satisfy. When God shall be pleased to restore me able to attend your service, I doubt not but to give you an honest account of all my actions herein. And, if I shall first go to my grave, I desire, if you find me clear, the reputation of an honest man, and an Englishman, may attend me thereunto. Thus I rest, Your dutiful and humble servant, SAMUEL TURNER."

Debate on Dr. Turner's Queries.] Notwithstanding the order for another hearing of this matter, there is no further mention made concerning it in the Journals, till April 22. when the house came to debate on the basis of Dr. Turner's Queries, "Whether common fame was a sufficient ground for accusation?"

Mr. Mallet began, and said, "That the question, 'Whether common Fame was a Ground sufficient for the Commons House of Parliament to proceed upon,' required great consideration. That he was against it, though he, confessed, he had seen few original precedents in the case. But the point, Whether an accusation upon common fame be to be entertained there, and from thence transmitted to the lords, he was against, for these reasons: 1. Because it would disadvantage the party accused; considering that he must answer the fame as well as the accusation. 2. Whosoever is accused here, and cleared, is, by the justice of this house, to have remedy against the accuser; which, by this course, he will want. In the 7th of Rd. 2. an accusation of Bribery was made against the chancellor, by Cavendish: the complaint being found false, he was adjudged to pay a fine of 3000 marks to be imprisoned, &c. In the 17th. Rd. 2. a complaint was made by the earl of Arundel against the duke of Lancaster. He was acquitted, and the duke ordered, in parliament, to have satisfaction from Arundel. That if this had been an use in parliament, it would, from thence, have been derived to other courts: whereas no temporal court hath ever used it, except in cases capital, as in that of M. de la Pole. So, in the case of Recusants, he thought it might be lawful; because the Recusant, though indicted, yet, conforming and taking the oaths, is freed from all penalties of the law. But this was not the case in question." If this was calculated to prevent a mischief, it might be tolerated; but, on the contrary, here, where it tends to judgment. This, he said, was not like the enquiry of a grand jury; yet no grand jury, except in the case of Recusants, proceedeth upon common fame, without other proof. He likened the resemblance of it to a double judgment on account; where the first judgment must be grounded on a verdict of confession. Doubted this precedent might be dangerous to inferior temporal courts, by way of imitation. That petitions to this house for a grievance are in writing, the petitioners present, and their hands unto it. Lastly, he said, he remembered the case of the bishop of Lincoln, 12. Jac. which, upon special reason, as concerning the honour of this house, and for which they could have no other ground of proof, was yet rejected, because it had no other ground." See vol. i. p. 1160.

Mr. Wyld, who quoted Bracton, said, "That all suspicions, grounded upon fame, were to be regarded. That some presumptions admit proof to the contrary, others not: but that this fame must arise amongst the better sort. All our law-books concur in this point, That an act must first be done, and the fame rise in the county where it was done. This is a good ground for arresting upon any felony; as murder, robbery, &c. and quoted several acts of parl. to prove it."

Mr. Littleton said, "That this was not a house of definitive judgment, but of information, denunciation, or presentment, for which common fame was sufficient. That there was a great difference between common fame and rumour: The general voice was common fame; vox populi, vox Dei. By the 14th Edw. 2. common fame was more than the saying of one man; for that it was the voice of many. That common fame was a good ground of imprisonment for treason or felony, by the 27th Eliz. but the person cannot then be said to be either a felon or a traitor. That, in other states, ancient and modern, men had been not only accused, but condemned, by common fame. He quoted precedents; of the duke of Suffolk's case, 28th Hen. 6. the duke of Somerset's, 29th Hen. 6. and the bishop of Lincoln's case, in the 12th of James. Concluded, That a man, accused by common fame, is to answer only to the accusation, and not the fame."

Mr. Browne argued, "That accusation was to be allowed, but not calumination; calumination is, in an unfit place, to lay an aspersion. That common fame was called, by civilians, semiplena probatio: arising out of apparent signs. If a private man accuse, and it be found false, he is liable to punishment; because he had nothing to do in it: but, where a member of this house does it, libere licet accusatio, if the place be proper for it: otherwise, not; therefore, an accusation in this house proper. That there was no subject, how great soever; but what is questionable here, if he be grievous to the common-wealth: So, in all former precedents; and this the only place in which to question great men."

Sir Tho. Wentworth said, "That if they could not present to the lords upon common fame, yet they might enquire and accuse, in that house, upon it. That this was the only safeguard for accusation of great men; whereas, in all others, no man dare accuse them for fear or danger. Men of evil fame were not bailable; but to be bound to good behaviour by act of parl. If common fame was sufficient for treason and felony, it was much more so in lesser offences. And scandalum magnatum lieth not, where a man can bring forth but one author."

Mr. Selden argued, "That the question was now only, Whether this house may proceed to transmit to the lords upon common fame; And surely they might, else no great man shall be accused, by any particular, for fear of danger: The faults of the Gods were not to be told, till the goddess Fame was born. "De eo male creditur," is put into indictments for murder. That this course of accusation was held in all the courts in Christendom. That these cases were to be ruled by the law of parliaments, and not either by the common or civil law. In the case of the duke of Suffolk, 28th Henry 6. there was a general rumour and noise of great offences done against the state. The commons, taking notice thereof, acquainted the lords with that general rumour, praying them he might be committed to the Tower; which the lords, upon consultation with the judges, refused; because the charge was only general: thereupon the commons instanced, in one particular, That the French king was ready to invade the kingdom through his default; whereupon he was presently committed. In the duke of Somerset's case, 29th Hen. 6. the like clamour upon common fame, and the parties complained of were removed from their offices."

Mr. Rolle said, "The commons may present a lord of the higher house to the lords; for he is not compellable to answer in this: And, if we cannot present upon common fame, he can never be drawn to answer. If the offence tend to felony or treason, the commons may pray to have him committed, in respect to the quality of the fact; but it is otherwise in smaller offences. In the 5th Hen. 4. a complaint was made against the king's confessor, and some others: Hereupon the lords ordered they should be removed from about the king. And the king, in parliament, though he knew no cause particularly, yet, because the lords and commons had thought them unfitting, he there commanded them to come no more near him; and that if there was any others, against whom the lords and commons had indignation, he would remove them also" See vol I. p. 291.

Mr. Sherland argued, 'That, in a case where there was probabilis causa litigandi, no damages were ever awarded. That common fame was allowed to be semiplena probatio. That the life and soul of the common-wealth was of greater respect than felony. He said, there was as well a real treason as a legal treason; the first tantamount to the other: therefore common fame was a sufficient ground in this case, as well as for felony.'

Mr. Noy said, "That men bound by recognizance were sometimes imprisoned on common fame. That this house could but enquire, they had no other jurisdiction: for they were no church wardens nor grand jury. And it was wrong, he said, that the fault should go unpunished, because no man durst accuse. The grounds for an enquiry were two; 1st. common fame; 2nd. whether that fame be true. That they ought not to transmit without the first be common; but without the particular enquiry they might: For it might happen they could not get witnesses; supposing the witnesses to be of the house of lords."

It is easy to see, by the course of this debate, that the duke had few advocates in the house of commons. We do not even find that the state-officers in that house said any thing in his favour; only we are told, that Mr. chancellor of the dutchy being asked his opinion, gave it against this proceeding by common fame. The question was put, "Whether common fame was a good ground of proceeding, either to enquire of it there, or transmit the complaint, if the house think fit, to the king or the lords;" and carried in the affirmative by a great majority.

This obstacle being removed, the commons proceeded with vigour against the duke. Several committees, appointed for particular enquiries into his conduct, brought in their reports, and many votes and resolutions were taken upon them; which we shall postpone till we come to the general charge against him. But, amongst the rest of the committees, there was one appointed to consider of a Supply to be granted to the king; and, March 27, sir D. Digges made the report from it. The same day it was resolved upon the question, "That 3 Subsidies and 3 Fifteens should be granted to his maj. in this session, payable at three separate times; the bill to be brought in, when they had presented their grievances, and received his answer to them."

The King commands the Attendance of both Houses. March 28. The King sent a Message to both houses to require their attendance on him, at Whitehall, the next day, at nine o'clock; and, in the mean time, all proceedings in the house and in committees were to cease: Accordingly the lords and commons went thither, to whom his majesty made the ensuing speech:

The King's Speech. "My lords and gentlemen; I have called you hither to-day, I mean both houses of parliament; but it is for several and distinct reasons. My lords, you of the upper house, to give you thanks for the care of the state of the kingdom now; and not only for the care of your own proceedings, but inciting your fellow-house of the commons to take that into their consideration: therefore, my lords, I must not only give you thanks, but I must also avow, That if this parliament do not redound to the good of this kingdom, (which I pray God it may) it is not your fault. And you, gentlemen of the house of commons, I am sorry that I may not justly give the same thanks to you; but that I must tell you, that I am come here to shew you your errors; and, as I may call it, unparliamentary proceedings in this parliament: but I do not despair, because you shall see your faults so clearly by the lord keeper, that you may so amend your proceeding, that this parliament shall end comfortably and happily, though at the beginning it hath had some rubs."

The Lord Keeper's Speech. Then the Lord Keeper, by the king's command, spoke next: viz. —

"My lords, and you knights, citizens, and burghesses of the house of commons; You are here assembled by his majesty's command, to receive a declaration of his royal pleasure; which, although it be intended only to the house of commons, yet his maj. hath thought meet, the matter being of great weight and importance, it should be delivered in the presence of both houses, and both houses make one general council. And his maj. is willing that the lords should be witnesses of the honour and justice of his resolutions. And therefore the errand which, by his maj.'s direction, I must deliver, hath relation to the house of commons. I must address myself therefore to you, Mr. Speaker, and the rest of that house.—And, first, his maj. would have you to understand, That there never was any king more loving to his people, or better affectioned to the right use of parliaments, than his maj. hath approved himself to be; not only by his long patience since the sitting down of this parliament, but by those mild and calm directions, which, from time to time, that house hath received by message and letter, and from his royal mouth, when the irregular humours of some particular persons wrought diversions and distractions there, to the disturbance of those great and weighty affairs, which the necessity of the times, the honour and safety of the king and kingdom, called upon: and therefore his maj. doth assure you, that when these great affairs are settled, and that his maj. hath received satisfaction of his reasonable demands, he will, as a just king, hear and answer your just grievances, which, in a dutiful way, shall be presented unto him; and this his maj. doth avow.—Next, his maj. would have you to know of a surety, That, as never any king was more loving to his people, nor better affectioned to the right use of parliaments; so never king was more jealous of his honour, nor more sensible of the neglect and contempt of his royal rights, which his maj. will by no means suffer to be violated by any pretended colour of parliamentary liberty; wherein his maj. doth not forget that the parliament is his council, and therefore ought to have the liberty of a council; but his maj. understands the difference betwixt council and controlling, and between liberty and the abuse of liberty.—This being set down in general, his maj. hath commanded me to relate some particular passages and proceedings, whereat he finds himself aggrieved.—1st. Whereas a seditious Speech was uttered amongst you by Mr. Coke, the house did not, as they ought to do, censure and correct him. And when his maj. understanding it, did, by a message, by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer delivered to the house, require justice of you; his maj. hath since found nothing but protracting and delays. This his maj. holds not agreeable to the wisdom and the duty which he expected from the house of commons.—2ndly, Whereas Dr. Turner, in a strange unparliamentary way, without any any ground of knowledge in himself, or offering any particular proof to the house, did take upon him to advise the house to enquire upon sundry Articles against the duke of Buckingham, as he pretended; but, in truth, to wound the honour and government of his maj. and of his renowned father: and his maj. first, by a message, and, after, by his own royal mouth, did declare, That that course of enquiry was an example, which by no way he could suffer, though it were against his meanest servant, much less against one so near him; and that his maj. did much wonder at the foolish insolency of any man that can think, that his maj. should be drawn, out of any end, to offer such a sacrifice, so unworthy of a king, or a good master; yet, for all this, you have been so far from correcting the insolency of Turner, that ever since that time, your committees have walked in the steps of Turner, and proceeded in an unparliamentary inquisition; running upon generals, and repeating that whereof you have made fame the ground-work. Here his

maj. hath cause to be exceeding sensible, that, upon every particular, he finds the honour of his father stained and blemished, and his own no less; and, withall, you have manifested a great forwardness rather to pluck out of his bosom those who are near about him, and whom his maj. hath cause to affect, than to trust his maj. with the future reformation of these things which you seem to aim at: and yet you cannot deny, but his majesty hath wrought a greater reformation in matters of Religion, Execution of the Laws, and concerning things of great importance, than the shortness of his reign (in which he hath been hindered, partly through sickness, and the distraction of things, which we could have wished had been otherwise) could produce.—Concerning the duke of Buckingham, his maj. hath commanded me to tell you, That himself doth better know than any man living the sincerity of the duke's proceedings; with what cautions of weight and discretion he hath been guided in his public employments from his maj. and his blessed father; what enemies he hath procured at home and abroad; what peril of his person, and hazard of his estate he ran into for the service of his maj. and his ever blessed father; and how forward he hath been in the service of this house many times since his return from Spain: and therefore his maj. cannot believe that the aim is at the duke of Buckingham; but findeth, that these proceedings do directly wound the honour and judgment of himself, and of his father. It is therefore his maj.'s express and final commandment, that you yield obedience unto those directions which you have formerly received, and cease this unparliamentary inquisition; and commit unto his maj.'s care, and wisdom, and justice, the future reformation of these things, which you suppose to be otherwise than they should be. And his maj. is resolved, that, before the end of this session, he will set such a course, both for the amending of any thing that may be found amiss, and for the settling of his own estate, as he doubteth not but will give you ample satisfaction and comfort.—Next to this, his maj. takes notice, That you have suffered the greatest Council of State to be censured and traduced in the house, by men whose years and education cannot attain to that depth: That foreign businesses have been entertained in the house, to the hindrance and disadvantage of his maj.'s negotiations: That the same year, yea, the first day of his maj.'s inauguration, you suffered his council, government, and servants to be paralyzed with the times of most exception: That your committees have presumed to examine the letters of secretaries of state, nay, his own; and sent a general warrant to his signet-office, and commanded his officers, not only to produce and shew the records, but their books and private notes, which they made for his maj.'s service. This his maj. holds as unsufferable, as it was in former times unusual.—Next I am to speak concerning your Supply of

8 Subsidies and 3 Fifteenths, which you have agreed to tender to his maj. You have been made acquainted with the greatness of his affairs, both at home and abroad; with the strong preparation of the enemy; with the importance of upholding his allies, strengthening and securing both England and Ireland; besides the encountering and annoying the enemy by a powerful Fleet at sea, and the charge of all: This having been calculated unto you, you have professed unto his maj. by the mouth of your Speaker, your carefulness to support the cause wherein his maj. and his allies are justly engaged; your unanimous consent and real intention to supply his maj. in such a measure as should make him safe at home, and feared abroad; and that, in the dispatch hereof, you would use such diligence, as his maj.'s pressing and present occasions did require.—And now his maj. having erected a proceeding suitable to this engagement, he doth observe, that, in two days only of twelve, this business was thought of; and not begun, till his maj. by a message, put you in mind of it: whilst your inquisition, against his maj.'s direction, proceeded day by day.—And, for the Measure of this Supply, his maj. findeth it so far from making himself safe at home, and feared abroad, as, contrariwise, it exposeth him both to danger and disesteem; for his maj. cannot expect, without better help, but that his allies must presently disband, and leave him alone to bear the fury of a provoked and powerful enemy; so as both he and you shall be unsafe at home, and ashamed and despised abroad. And for the Manner of the Supply, it is in itself very dishonourable, and full of distrust; for although you have avoided the literal word of a condition, whereof his maj. himself did warn you, when he told you of your parenthesis; yet you have put to it the effect of a condition, since the bill is not to come into your house, until your Grievances be both preferred and answered. No such thing was in that expression and engagement delivered by your Speaker, from which his maj. holdeth that you have receded both in matter and manner, to his great disadvantage and dishonour. And therefore his maj. commandeth, that you go together, and by Saturday next, return your final Answer, what further Supply you will add to this you have already agreed on; and that to be without condition, either directly or indirectly, for the Supply of these great and important Affairs of his maj. which, for the reasons formerly made known unto you, can endure no longer delay; and, if you shall not by that time resolve on a more ample Supply, his maj. cannot expect a Supply this way, nor promise you to sit longer together; otherwise, if you do it, his maj. is well content, that you shall sit so long as the season of the year will permit; and doth assure you, that the present addition to your Supply to set forward the work shall be no hindrance to your speedy access again.—His majesty hath commanded me to add this, That therein he doth expect your chearful obedience, which will put a happy issue to this meeting, and will enable his maj. not only to a defensive war, but to employ his subjects in foreign actions, whereby will be added to them both experience, safety and honour.—Last of all, his maj. hath commanded me, in explanation of the gracious goodness of his royal intention, to say unto you, That he doth well know, that there are among you many wise and well tempered men, well affected to the public, and to his maj.'s service; and that those that are willingly faulty are not many: and, for the rest, his maj. doubteth not, but, after his gracious admonition, they will, in due time, observe and follow the better sort; which, if they shall do, his maj. is most ready to forget whatsoever is past."

The King's further Speech.] Then his majesty spake again;—"I must withall put you in mind a little time of past; you may remember, that, in the time of my blessed father, you did, with your counsel and persuation, persuade both my father and me to break off the Treaty; I confess I was your instrument for two reasons; one was, the fitness of the time; the other, because I was seconded by so great and worthy a body as the whole body of parliament: then there was no body in so great favour with you, as this man whom you seem now to touch, but indeed, my father's government and mine. Now that you have all things according to your wishes, and that I am so far engaged that you think there is no retreat; now you begin to set the dice, and make your own game: but, I pray you be not deceived, it is not a parliamentary way, nor it is not a way to deal with a king. Mr. Coke told you, 'It was better to be eaten up by a foreign enemy, than to be destroyed at home.' Indeed I think it more honour for a king to be invaded, and almost destroyed by a foreign enemy, than to be despised by his own subjects. Remember, that parliaments are altogether in my power for their calling, sitting, and dissolution; therefore as I find the fruits of them good or evil, they are to continue, or not to be: and, remember, that, if in this time, instead of mending your errors, by delay you persist in your errors, you make them greater, and irreconcilable; whereas, on the other side, if you do go on chearfully to mend them, and look to the distressed State of Christendom, and the affairs of the Kingdom, as it lieth now by this great engagement; you will do yourselves honour, you shall encourage me to go on with parliaments, and, I hope, all Christendom shall feel the good of it."

The D. of Buckingham explains some Misapprehensions of the King's and the Lord Keeper's Speeches.] The king being, very soon after this, informed that some things in his own Speeches and others in the Lord Keeper's were subject to misunderstanding, was willing to have them explained. A Message from the lords was sent down to the lower house, March 30th, to desire a conference with them, immediately, in the Painted-Chamber. Which, being accepted of, the duke of Buckingham, as ordered by his maj. made the following Declaration :

"Whereas it is objected by some, who wish good correspondency betwixt the king and people, that to prefix a day to give or to break, was an unusual thing, and might express an inclination in the king to break; to remove this, as his maj. was free from such thoughts, he hath descended to make this explanation.—That as his maj. would not have you condition with him directly or indirectly, so he will not lie to a day, for giving further Supply; but it was the pressing occasion of Christendom that made him to pitch upon a day.—His maj. hath here a servant of the king of Denmark, and another from the duke of Weymer; and yesterday received a letter from his sister the queen of Bohemia, who signified that the king of Denmark hath sent an ambassador, with power to perfect the contract which was made at the Hague; so it was not the king, but time, and the things themselves that pressed a time.—Therefore his maj. is pleased to give longer time, hoping you will not give him cause to put you in mind of it again; so that you have a greater latitude, if the business require to think further of it.—I am commanded further to tell you, that if his maj. should accept of a less sum than will suffice, it will deceive your expectations, disappoint his allies, and consume the treasure of the kingdom; whereas, if you give largely now, the business being at the crisis, it comes so seasonably, it may give a turn to the Affairs of Christendom.—But while we delay and suffer the time to pass, others abroad will take advantage of it, as the king of Spain hath done, by concluding a peace, as it is thought, in Italy, for the Valtoline; whereby our work is become the greater, because there can be no diversion that way.—As it was a good rule to fear all things and nothing, and to be liberal was sometimes to be thrifty; so in this particular, if you give largely, you shall carry the war to the enemy's door, and keep that peace at home that hath been: whereas, on the contrary, if you draw the war home, it brings with it nothing but disturbance and fear, all courses of justice stopped, and each man's revenue lessened, and nothing that can be profitable.—Another explanation I am commanded to make, touching the Grievances; wherein his maj. means no way to interrupt your proceedings, but hopes you will proceed in the antient ways of your predecessors; and not so much seek faults, as the means to redress them.—I am further commanded to tell you, That his maj. intends to elect a committee of both houses, whom he will trust to take the view of his estate, the defects of which are not fit for the eyes of a multitude; and this committee will be for your ease, and may satisfy you, without casting any ill odour on his government, or laying open any weakness that may bring shame upon us abroad. That which is proposed is so little, that when the payment comes, it will bring him to a worse estate than now he is in; therefore wishes you to enlarge it, but leaves the augmentation to yourselves; but is sorry, and touched in conscience, that the burthen should lie on the poorest, who want too much already; yet he will not prescribe, but wish that you, who were the abettors and counsellors of this war, would take a greater part of the burthen to yourselves; and any man that can find out that way, shall shew himself best affected, and do the best service to the king and state."

The Duke of Buckingham vindicates himself.]
The duke then made his Address to them, in his own behalf, as follows :

"My lords and gentlemen; You were all witnesses yesterday how good and gracious a master I serve; and I shall likewise be glad that you be witnesses how thankful a heart I have. And, I protest, I have a heart as full of zeal to serve my master as any man; and it hath been my study to keep a good correspondency betwixt the king and his people; and, whatever thought hath been entertained of me, I shall not alien my heart from that intention, but shall add spurs to my endeavours and actions, to vindicate myself from ill opinion.—And however I lie under the burden of the same, it lies in your hands to make me happy or not; and, for my part, I wish my heart and actions were known to you all, then, I assure myself, you would resume me to your good opinions.—When I had, with some hazard, waited on my master into Spain, it is well known what testimony I gave of my religion; and no man that comes to a true and near view of my actions, can justly charge me. Let me be excused if I give account of this particular, when I should speak of the general; for this goes near my heart, and to dissemble with my conscience, no ends of fortunes in the world can make me do it: for, if I had any ill inclination, I had such offers made to me in Spain, as might have tempted me.—If I would have been converted myself, I might have had the Infanta put in my master's bed; and, if my discontent should have risen here, I might have had an army to have come with me: but I thought the offer foolish, ridiculous and scornful, in that point of religion.—I will now take the boldness to speak a little in the general business; and I call it boldness to speak so after one who did so well the other day: but I had rather suffer in my own particular, than not refresh your memories with that which is materially useful.—I shall not need to reflect so far back as to the beginning of those counsels which engaged my master into the war, they are all well known; only I will so far touch it, as to say, that the last year's preparations were not voluntary, or out of wantonness, but out of necessity.—My master had good intelligence that the king of Spain's eye was maliciously bent this way, which had been pursued accordingly, if the employment of the Low-Countrv-men to the Bay of Todos los Santos had not diverted it.—Now, for the

Counsel which was used in sending out the Fleets, I will refer you to the relation of the lord Conway; who, as well in this as other resolutions, can tell you, that nothing was carried with single counsels: and, for myself, I know, that in all those actions, no man can stand up against me, to say, that I ever did go with single counsels, or made breach of any; but have been an obedient servant and minister unto their resolutions: the proof whereof will appear in a Journal thereof, which my lord Conway keeps.—I confess all Counsels were not ever as yourselves would, nor have wished they should; if you had known them as my master did, in whom the former affairs of state had bred such affections, that the business being altered, they were not to be trusted with the change.—I will now give you an Account of all my Negotiations, since my being at Oxford, both at home and abroad; and because there it was charged, that those things were carried with single counsels, I was more careful to advise the king to have his council with him in the country, being to enter into war with an active king.—And, for my part, I did diligently wait upon the Council, left all recreations, all personal occasions, studying to serve my master, and to gain the good opinion of both houses. The Council of Woodstock generally advised the going out of the Fleet; and though it were objected, that the season were not fit, yet the action shewed the contrary, for they all arrived in safety. And for what was also objected, that the provision was not good, experience tells you the contrary; for the preparations were all good in quality and proportion.—And if the success were not such as any honest man could wish, I hope I shall not be blamed, not being there in person, though I made the greatest suit for it to my master, that ever I did for any thing: but his maj. thought my service more useful in the low countries, to comfort his sister, and to treat with the kings of Denmark, Sweden, and the States.—And though the success, (as I said) of the Fleet, were not answerable to the desires of honest men, yet it had these good effects; first, it put our enemy to great charge in fortifying his coasts. Secondly, they took so many ships as caused many of his merchants to break, whereby the army in Flanders suffered much: And, lastly, they could carry no treasure out to pay their forces in Flanders.—And for Omissions of what more might have been done, I leave that to its proper place and time, and let every man bear his own burden.—From Oxford the council went to Southampton, where the States Ambassadors did wait often on the king and council; and a league, offensive and defensive, betwixt us and them, was thought fit to be resolved on, whereof some reasons I will express, but not all. First, they are of our own religion. Secondly, they are our neighbours for situation so useful, as when they are in distress, it is policy in us to give them relief; therefore the king thought fit to do it in such a manner as might lay an obligation on them; which, if it had not been done, they had been pressed with a long war, and such a faction among themselves, as, if the king had not joined, and in a manner appeared their protector, they had broke among themselves. And in this the king's care was not only of them but of all Christendom, and of his own particular.—For, as before, he only assisted them; his maj.'s care now used arguments to draw them to contribution; so that they bear the fourth part of the charge of the war at sea, according to such conditions, as, by the lord Chamberlain, you have heard.—This league being perfected between the States and us, his maj. by advice of his Council, thought fit to send me to get such a league with the other princes as I could. The rendezvous was in the Low Countries, being in a manner the centre for repair for England, France, and Germany; I had latitude of commission to make the league with most advantage I could.—Now I had discovered from M. B., the French ambassador here, that a league, offensive and defensive, would be refused; and I found the king of Denmark shie, and loath to enter into such a league against the king of Spain; and so, partly out of necessity, and partly out of reasons of state, I was forced to conclude the league in general terms, for the restoring the liberty of Germany, without naming the king of Spain, or the emperor, that other princes might come in; and this to continue till everyone had satisfaction; and nothing to be treated of, debated, or concluded on, but by consent of all parties. It did appear that the charge was so great, that the kingdom could not endure it; and therefore I endeavoured, in the Low Countries, to lessen it, and so the sea-charge was helped; and the land-assistance given unto them, is to cease six months hence, which the lord Conway said was to end in September next.—Also, by this Treaty, it is conditioned with the king of Denmark, that when my master shall, by diversion, equal to this contribution with his own subjects, enter into action, then his charge to cease: or if the king of France may be drawn in, of which there is great hope (though he had now made peace in Italy) for that the policy of France may not give way unto the greatness of the house of Austria and ambition of Spain, whose dominions do grasp him in on every side, and, if the business be well carried, his engagement to the king of Denmark may draw him in; so there is great possibility of easing our charge.—But all is in the discreet taking of the time; for, if not, we may think the king of Denmark will take hold of those fair conditions which are each day offered him; and then the enemy's army will fall upon the right of Elve, and (the lord Conway added) upon East-Friesland, from whence they would make such progress, as (in my poor experience) would ruin the Low Countries.—And thus I think I have satisfied all of you, or at least given you an Account of my Negotiation in the Low Countries, with the king of Denmark, Sweden, and the rest.—I should be glad, before I end, to say somewhat of myself, but I shall request your favourable construction, for I have been too long already; but I fear I shall offend, and therefore I will restrain myself to generals.—If, in any of these employments, my errors may be shewed me, I shall take him for my best friend that will manifest them in particular. I have bent all my thoughts on nothing but my master's honour, the service of the state, and safety of them both. I never had any end of mine own, and that may be perceived and proved by the expence of mine own estate. I am ashamed to speak it, and it would become another man's tongue better than mine own.—My Journey into Spain was all at my own charge; my Journey into France was at my master's charge; my Journey into the Low Countries was all at my own charge. I am accused, by common Fame, to be the cause of the loss of the Narrow Seas, and the damage there sustained. What I can say, is this, since the war begun with Spain, I have always had 12 ships on the coasts, and allowance but for 4; the rest my own care supplied. And, for the office of Admiral, when I came first to it, I found the Navy weak, not neglected by my noble predecessor (for I cannot speak of him but with honour; and I shall desire to go to my grave with the honour he carried hence) but the not paying of monies in time, there were such defects his care could not prevent; that, if the war had then broken out, there would have been found but few ships, and those unserviceable. I was first prevailed on to take this office by persuasion of sir Robert Mansel; and, though I objected I was young, and unexperienced, yet he said, that, by my favour with my master, I might do more good in procuring payment for that charge; and, because I was young and unexperienced, I took advice, as I do in all things, and am not ashamed of it. I have desired my master to grant a commission as it were over me. I have found a great debt, the ships defective, and few in number; the yearly charge of 54,000*l.* which was brought to 30,000*l.* per ann.; we built every year 2 ships; and when so many were built as were requisite, we brought it to 22,000*l.* per ann. which comes not into my hands, but goes into its proper streams, and issues from the officers to that purpose deputed.—Now, if any can shew me a project, how to maintain a war against Spain, Flanders, and the Turkish pirates with less charge, he will do a great work, and good service. I have had sometimes 20, sometimes 30 ships, though sometimes disasted by tempest, which dispersed the Hollanders ships, and caused them to cut their masts and forsake their anchors. There are now 12 ships victualled for 2 months; and, though many reports have been, that they do not do their duty, yet I have advertised them thereof from time to time, and find no such fault in them.—There are 30 ships more at Plymouth, victualled for 6 months, and 10 more ready, so soon as they may be victualled.

I have been so frugal of making use of the old remains, that there is no need of ammunition, or other necessities.—Besides all these, there are 20 ships to come from the Low Countries; so you have 12, 20, 30, and 10 more, which I think you have not heard of.—And therefore, if any have blamed me, I do not blame him, but think he hath done well: but when you know the truth, and when all this shall appear, I hope I shall stand right in your opinions.—Gentlemen, it is no time to pick quarrels one with another; we have enemies enough already, and therefore more necessary to be well united at home. Follow not examples, at least not ill examples of Gondomar and Ynojosa, who would have had my head, when you thought me worthy of a salute. Now, though I confess there may be some errors, I will not justify myself; yet they are not such gross defects as the world would make them appear. I desire they may be admitted cum nota. They are no errors of wilfulness, nor of corruption; nor oppressing of the people, nor injustice, but contrary; and then may I say, for what good done by me do I suffer?—And now I might answer more particulars, but I have been long, and so will forbear; and will conclude, if your Supply answer not your promises and engagements to my master, you will make this place, which hath been in peace when others were in war, the seat of war when others are in peace.—Now gentlemen, you that were ancient parliament-men when this council was first given, strive to make good your own engagement, for the honour of your king, and your own safety. Let religion, in which I would be glad to be more watchful and more industrious than any, unite your hearts both at home and abroad; and you that are young men, may in these active times gain honour and reputation, which is almost sunk, and gain the ancient glory of your predecessors; and, remember, it is for restoring to her inheritance, the most virtuous lady, I think, in the world. I have nothing more, but to intreat your charitable opinion of me and my actions.

Lord Conway's Vindication of the D. of Buckingham.] For the further vindicating of the duke, the lord Conway stood up and said:—"That whereas divers jealousies have been raised in the house, that the monies have been expended unusefully, and without council; himself who was the only secretary, and had the hand in guiding the business, could best give an account of it. When king James, of glorious memory, at the request of both houses, had broken both the Treaties, he considered how to maintain the war; for he saw that the king of Spain was awaked, and that the Palatinate must be got by the sword, and that Spain would oppose it with all the power they could; and computing the Charges, found the Subsidies granted too short; for that it could not be done without an army of 25,000 foot, and 5000 horse, which would amount to 600,000*l.* for the armies yearly, and 300,000*l.*

for the navy; but, finding all his means short, and as the proverb is, Not knowing of what wood to make his arrows to hit the mark withall, count Mansfield stirred up by his own judgment, came over and made overture, That for 20,000*l.* a month he would raise an army of 30,000 men, and draw in the French king, Denmark, Sweden, Venice, Savoy, the Cantons of the Switzers, and, perhaps, some other German princes, and raise a war in Alsatia, of great consequence to make a diversion.—Now about this time the council of Austria resolved to call a diet, and exclude the count Palatine, and put in a Popish elector; and, for that end, offered a general peace in Germany, and so left not a crevice to look into for assistance; but if any of them should aid the count Palatine, he should be out of the peace.—The king accepts Mansfield's offer, conditionally, that he drew in the French king: so Mansfield went over into France; and the king, by advice of his council, sent ambassadors into France, Denmark, Venice, Savoy, and Cantons of the Switzers, from whom he received cold answers; for the king James had stood so long on terms of peace, as they doubted he would not be brought to enter into a war. But count Mansfield procured the king of France to contract or receive our troops, with promise to enter into the war, upon condition it might be regulated by the council of the French king and England. This favour to count Mansfield, That France agreed that his armies should join with the king's troops, wrought the princes of Germany to believe, that the king would enter into a war. Thereupon the Imperialists left their diet, and sent Tilly to Friedland; and to take up the river of Rhen; which, if he had obtained, they would have trampled the Low Countries under foot, and would have become governors of the sea. Upon this the king of Denmark sent to our king, and offered to raise an army of 30,000 men, if our king would allow 30,000*l.* a month, and said, He would admit no time of respite; for if Tilly had not been presently met and headed, all had been lost. Whereupon our king called a council, and appointed commissioners; and from that time all the warrants for the issuing of the monies, were all under the king's own hand to the council of war, and from them to the treasurers, and the warrants were from the lords of the council for the levying of men, and for coats and conduct money. Thereupon the duke asked the question, Whether any thing was done by single counsel? To which the lord Conway answered, "No: For the Treaty of Denmark, Project of count Mansfield's, Treaties with France, and the business of the Navy, were done all by the king himself; and who can say it was done by single council, when king James commanded it, whose council every man ought to reverence, especially in matters of war, whereunto that king was not hasty?"

The Commons Answer to the King's and the Lord Keeper's Speeches. After a report was made to the Commons of this Conference, by members appointed for that purpose, the house went upon framing a Remonstrance to the king, by way of Answer to his and the lord keeper's speeches. This being perfected, and approved on by the house: it was presented to his maj. April the 5th, by a select committee, and was as follows:

"Most gracious Sovereign: Whereas your maj. hath been pleased of late, at sundry times, and by several means, to impart unto us your royal pleasure, touching some passages and proceedings in this present parliament: We do first, with unspeakable joy and comfort, acknowledge your maj.'s grace and favour, in that it hath pleased you to cause it to be delivered unto us by the lord keeper of your great seal, in your own royal presence, and before both houses of parliament, That never king was more loving to his people, nor better affected to the right use of parliaments; withall professing your most gracious resolution to hear and redress our just grievances. And, with like comfort, we acknowledge your maj.'s goodness shining at the very entrance of your glorious reign, in commanding the execution of the laws established to preserve the true religion of Almighty God, in whose service consisteth the happiness of all kings and kingdoms.—Yet let it not displease your maj. that we also express some sense of just grief, intermixed with that great joy, to see the careful proceedings of our sincere intentions so mis-reported, as to have wrought effects unexpected, and, we hope, undeserved.—First, touching the Charge against us in the matter concerning Mr. Coke: We all sincerely protest, That neither the words mentioned in your maj.'s message, nor any other of seditious effect, were spoken by him, as hath been resolved by the house, without one negative voice. Howsoever, in a speech occasionally uttered, he did let fall some few words which might admit an ill construction; whereat the house being displeased at the delivery of them, as was expressed by a general and instant check, he forthwith so explained himself and his intention, that, for the present, we did forbear to take them into consideration, which since we have done: And the effect thereof had before this appeared, if by importunate business of your maj.'s service, we had not been interrupted.—The like interruption did also befall us in the Case of Dr. Turner; wherein the question being formally stated, a Resolution was ordered to have been taken that very day, on which we received your maj.'s command to attend you.—But for our own proceedings, we humbly beseech your maj. to be truly informed, that before that overture from Dr. Turner, (out of our great and necessary care for your honour and welfare of your realm) we had taken into serious consideration the evils which now afflict your people, and the causes of them, that we might apply ourselves unto the fittest remedies: In the pursuit whereof, our committees (whenever they might have done) have in no part could proceed otherwise, than either upon ground of knowledge in themselves, or proof by examination of witnesses, or other evidence. In which course of service for the public good, as we have not swerved from the parliamentary ways of our predecessors, so we conceive that the discovery and reforming of errors, is so far from laying an aspersion upon the present time and government, that it is rather a great honour and happiness to both, yielding matter to great princes, wherein to exercise and illustrate their noblest virtues.—And although the grievous Complaints of the Merchants from all parts, together with the common service of the subjects well affected to those who profess our religion, gave us occasion to debate some businesses that were partly foreign, and had relation to affairs of state; yet we beseech your maj. to rest assured, it was exceeding far from our intention, either to traduce your counsellors, or disadvantage your negotiations.—And the same examples of great and potent ministers or princes, heretofore questioned in parliament, have been alledged; yet was it without paralleling your maj.'s government, or councils, to any times at all, much less to times of exception.—Touching the Letter of your maj.'s secretary; it was first alledged by your advocate for his own justification, and after, by direction of the committee, produced to make good his allegation.—And for the Search of the Signet-Office; the copy of a letter being divulged, as in your maj.'s name, with pregnant cause of suspicion, both in the body and direction thereof, to be suppositions; the committee, out of desire to be cleared therein, did, by their order, send some of themselves to the signet-office, to search whether there were any records of letters of that nature, without warrant to the officer for any, much less for a general search.—But touching public Records, we have not forborn, as often as our businesses have required, to make search into them, wherein we have done nothing unwarranted by the laws of your realm and the constant usage of parliaments. And if, for the ease of their labours, any of our committees have desired the help of the officers secretaries, or brevians of direction, we conceive it is no more than any subject, in his own affairs, might have obtained for ordinary fees.—Now, concerning your maj.'s servants, and, namely the duke of Buckingham; we humbly beseech your maj. to be informed by us your faithful commons, who can have no private end but your maj.'s service, and the good of our country, That it hath been the ancient, constant, and undoubted right and usage of parliaments, to question and complain of all persons, of what degree soever, found grievous to the common-wealth, in abusing the power and trust committed to them by their sovereign. A course approved not only by the examples in your father's days, of famous memory, but by frequent precedents in the best, and most glorious reigns of your noble progenitors, appearing both in records and histories: without which liberty in parliament, no private man, no servant to a king, perhaps, no counsellor, without exposing himself to the hazard of great enmity and prejudice, can be a means to call great officers into question for their misdemeanors; but the common-wealth might languish under their pressures without redress: and whatsoever we shall do accordingly in this parliament, we doubt not but it shall redound to the honour of the crown, and welfare of your subjects.—Lastly, We most humbly beseech your maj. graciously to conceive, that though it hath been the long custom of parliaments to handle the matter of Supply with the last of their businesses; yet, at this time, out of extraordinary respect to your person, and care of your affairs, we have taken the same into more speedy consideration; and most happily, on the very day of your maj.'s inauguration, with great alacrity and unanimous consent, after a short debate, we grew to the resolution for a present Supply well known to your maj.—To which, if addition may be made of other great things for your service, yet in consultation amongst us, we doubt not but it will appear, That we have not receded from the truth of our first intention, so to supply you, as may make you safe at home, and feared abroad; especially if your maj. shall be pleased to look upon the way intended in our promise, as well as to the measure of the gift agreed.—With the like humility we beseech your maj. not to give ear to the officious reports of private persons for their own ends, which hath occasioned so much loss of time; nor to judge our proceedings whilst they are in agitation, but to be pleased to expect the issue and conclusion of our labours; which, we are confident, will manifest and justify to your maj. the sincerity and loyalty of our hearts, who shall ever place in a high degree of happiness the performing of that duty and service in parliament, which may most tend to your maj.'s honour and the good of your kingdom."

The Commons adjourn by the King's Desire.] After this Remonstrance was read to the king by Mr. secretary Cooke, his maj. said to the committee, "That he would not then give Answer to it; but expected and desired that the commons would adjourn, as the lords had done, until the 13th of the same month; and that then they would repair the time they had hitherto lost." On the report of this to the house, a debate arose, and the question being twice put, Whether to adjourn, or no? it was carried in the affirmative, on a division 150 against 120, and the house adjourned itself to Thursday in Easter week.

During this short recess, we shall look back into some Proceedings of the Lords in the course of this session; in order to pave the way for a full explanation of what was to be done against the duke of Buckingham, at the next meeting of the parliament.

The Lords consider the State of the Realm.] March 6. The house was put in mind that their lordships had now sat a month, and yet not considered of the State of the Realm as it then stood with a great and potent enemy, the Spaniard exasperated, and preparing great forces for an invasion: Therefore they were moved to appoint a committee to consider of the State of the Realm, in general; and in particular, of the Safeguard of the Seas; the Stores of Munition and Arms, and all things incident thereto; and of fortifying the Forts. A committee was appointed accordingly.—The next day the lord keeper signified to the house, “That his maj. took special notice of that committee, and, with great approbation thereof, commanded him to give their lordships very hearty thanks for their zeal therein, to his honour and the safeguard of the realm; and desired them to proceed in it with all speed and alacrity.”

The same day a report was made from this committee, “That the master of the ordnance had acquainted them with the great Want of Gunpowder in the Stores; which their lordships thought fit to be provided.” Also “That the said committee thought proper that the following particulars be offered to the consideration of the commons: 1. That a fleet be presently set out against the king of Spain, to annoy him and prevent an Invasion of this kingdom. 2. That another fleet be set out to defend our own coasts, and the merchants from pirates. 3. The Maintenance of the Armies under the king of Denmark and count Mansfield: 4. To acquaint the commons with the present State of this Kingdom and the Confederates thereof.” Upon this report the house resolved upon a conference with the commons; and a select committee of each house, consisting of 40 lords and a proper number of the commons, was appointed to meet at 3 that afternoon. The commons sat that afternoon, and the lords committees, being returned from the conference, reported, “That they had fully related to the commons the cause of that meeting: and that they had promised to deliver the same to their house.”

After the Report of this Conference was made to the commons, it was moved to consider what Answer was fit to be given to the lords, and then to go on with the business before them. Others moved to go on, as before, and give no Answer at all to them. On this, the question being put, Whether to answer or not? the house divided, and it was carried in the affirmative 226 against 166; and a committee was appointed to consider of and draw up an Answer to that purpose. But we cannot find, by either Journals, that ever any answer was returned to the lords about this business, the commons seeming more intent on redressing grievances at home, than troubling themselves about affairs abroad.

The lords, notwithstanding, went on with their committee for the Defence of the Realm, &c. and, on the 24th of March, the lord treasurer reported to the house, That the said committee had made several agreements with merchants for importing and making of Saltpetre and Gunpowder; also, with the Armourers and Gun-makers, in and about London, for providing a sufficient quantity of those warlike stores. But their care in these things was soon interrupted by affairs of a different nature, which took up all the attention of the house of lords.

The Case of Digby Earl of Bristol.] Digby, earl of Bristol, so much concerned in the late Negotiations in Spain, about the Match, &c. on his return from thence, had been committed prisoner to the Tower. This earl had been also examined by a committee of lords, appointed by the king, touching those affairs; and certain propositions were made to him in order to his release, and composing the differences between the duke of Buckingham and him. On his refusal, in some measure, to comply with the terms, the lord Conway, secretary of state, wrote to him the following letter, and received his Answer to it.

The Lord Conway to the Earl of Bristol.

“My lord; I received a letter from your lordship, dated the 4th of this month, written in answer to a former letter which I directed to your lordship, by his majesty's commandment. This last letter, according to my duty, I have shewed unto his maj. who hath perused it, and hath commanded me to write back to you again, that he finds himself nothing satisfied therewith. The question propounded to your lordship, from his maj. was plain and clear, Whether you did rather chuse to sit still without being questioned for any errors passed in your Negotiations in Spain, and enjoy the benefit of the late gracious pardon granted in parliament, whereof you may have the benefit: or whether, for the clearing of your innocency, (whereof yourself, and your friends and followers, are so confident) you will be content to waive the advantage of that pardon, and put yourself into a legal way of examination for the trial thereof. His majesty's purpose thereby, is not to prevent you of any favours the law hath given you; but if your assurance be such as your words and letters import, he conceives it stands not with that public and resolute profession of your integrity to decline your trial. His maj. leaves the choice to yourself, and requires from you a direct answer, without circumlocution or bargaining with him for future favours before hand; but if you have a desire to make use of that pardon which cannot be denied you, nor is any way desired to be taken from you, his maj. expects you should at the least forbear to magnify your service, and, out of an opinion of your innocency, cast an aspersion upon his majesty's justice, in not affording you that present fulness of liberty and favour which cannot be drawn from him but in his good time, and according to his good pleasure. Thus much I have in commandment to write to your lordship, and to require your answer clearly and plainly by this messenger, sent on purpose for it, and so remain

Your lordship's humble servant,
Whitehall, March 24, 1626. “CONWAY.”

The Earl of Bristol to the Lord Conway.

"My lord; I have received your letter of the 24th of March, the 28th, and I am infinitely grieved to understand, that my former answer to yours of the 4th of March hath not satisfied his maj. which I will endeavour to do to the best of my understanding; and, to that end, shall answer to the particular points of your present letter with the greatest clearness I am able. First, Whereas you say in your letter, That the question propounded to me was plain and clear, viz. Whether I would chuse to sit still without being questioned for any errors passed in my negotiations in Spain, and enjoy the benefit of the late gracious pardon, whereof I may take the benefit? Or whether, being content to waive the advantage of that pardon, I should put myself into a legal way of examination for the trial thereof? &c. 1st, Your lordship may be pleased to remember your last proposition was, Whether I desired to rest in the security I was in? which you now express, Whether I will chuse to sit still? 2ndly, Your proposition was, Whether I would acknowledge the gracious favour of his maj. that now is, who had been pleased not to question my actions? When it is best known to your lordship, That, by a commission of the lords, I was questioned upon 20 Articles, divers involving felony and treason: although it be true, That when I had so answered (as I am confident their lordships would have cleared me) I was so unhappy as their lordships never met more about that business.—But now your proposition is, Whether I will now chuse to sit still without being further questioned for errors passed? Whereas before it was required I should acknowledge that I have not been questioned at all; which is a different thing. But conferring both your letters together, and gathering the sense and meaning, by making the latter an explanation of the former, which I could have wished your lordship would have more clearly explained, I return unto your lordship this plain and direct answer. That I understand, by the security I am in, and sitting still, and not being further questioned, that I am restored to the bare freedom and liberty of a subject and peer: for if a man be called in question by his maj. yet afterwards his maj. shall be pleased, out of his goodness, that he rest quiet and secure, and that he shall not be further questioned; I conceive that it is not apparent that his liberty naturally revolveth unto him, when by his majesty's grace he is pleased to declare he shall not be further questioned, but may live in further security. So that, understanding your letter in this sort, (for no direct answer can be made, until the sense of the question be truly stated) I do most humbly acknowledge and accept his maj.'s grace and favour, and shall not waive any thing that shall come to me by the pardon of the 21 Jac. nor by the pardon of his maj.'s coronation. And am so far from bargaining, as you are pleased to express it, for future favour (though

I hope my humble and submissive courses of petitioning his maj. neither hath nor shall deserve so hard an expression) that I shall not presume so much as to press for any favour, until my dutiful and loyal behaviour may move his maj.'s royal and gracious heart thereunto; but receive, with all humbleness, this my freedom and liberty, the which I shall only make use of in such sort, as I shall judge may be most agreeable to his maj.'s pleasure.—As for the 2nd part of your letter, wherein you say, That if I desire to make use of that pardon, his maj. expects that I should at least forbear to magnify my services; or, out of an opinion of my own innocence, cast an aspersion upon his maj.'s justice; to this point I answer, That as I hope I shall never err in that sort of immodesty, of valuing my services, which I acknowledge to have been accompanied with infinite weakness and disabilities; so I trust it shall not displease, that I make use, to mine own comfort; and the honour of my posterity, of those many written testimonies, which my late most blessed master hath left me, of his gracious acceptance of my services for the space of 20 years: And likewise I hope the modest avowing of mine innocency will not be thought to cast any aspersion upon his majesty's honour or justice. I must freely confess unto your lordship, I am much afflicted to see inferences of this nature made, both in your lordship's last letter and in this. For if it shall be inferred; as a thing reflecting upon the king's honour, than a man questioned shall not endeavour to defend his own innocency before he be convicted, it will be impossible for any man to be safe; for the honour of his maj. is too sacred a thing for any subject, how innocent soever, to contest against. So likewise, God forbid that it should be brought into consequences, (as in your former letter) as a tax upon the government and justice of his late maj., and maj. that now is, that I should have suffered so long time, not being guilty. For as I never have been heard so much as to repine of injustice in their majesties, in all my sufferings, so I well know, that the long continuance of my troubles may well be attributed unto other causes, as to my own errors of passion, or other accidents; for your lordship may well remember, that my affairs were, almost two years since, upon the point of a happy accommodation, had it not been interrupted by the unfortunate mistaking of the speeches I used to Mr. Clark. I shall conclude by intreating your lordship's favour, that I may understand from you, as I hope for my comfort, that this letter hath given his maj. satisfaction; or if there should yet remain any scruple, that I may have a clear and plain signification of the king's pleasure; which I shall obey with all humility. Your Lordship's humble servant,
BRISTOL."

After this the earl petitioned the house of lords, and shewed, "That he, being a peer of this realm, had not received a summons to parliament, and desired their lordships to mediate with the king, that he might enjoy the liberty of a subject and the privilege of his peerage, after almost two years restraint without being brought to a trial: and, if any charge was brought against him, he prayed that he might be tried by parliament." Upon the receipt of this petition, the lords referred it to the committee of privileges: from whom the earl of Hertford reported, "That it was necessary for their lordships humbly to beseech his maj. to send a writ of summons to the earl of Bristol; as also to such other lords whose writs are stopped, except such as are made incapable to sit there by judgment of parliament, or some other legal course." Hereupon the duke of Buckingham signified to the house, That upon the earl's Petition to the king, his maj. had sent him his writ of summons; and, withal, shewed the lords a copy of a letter, wrote from the king to the said earl, dated Jan. 20, 1626, the tenor of which followeth:

"We have read your letter addressed unto us by Buckingham, and cannot but wonder that you should, through forgetfulness, make request to us of favour, as if you stood evenly capable of it, when you know what your behaviour in Spain deserved of us, which you are to examine by the observations we made, and know you well remember; how, at our first coming in Spain, taking upon you to be so wise, as to foresee our intention to change our religion, you were so far from dissuading us, that you offered your advice and secrecy to concur in it: and, in many other conferences, pressing to shew how convenient it was to be a Roman Catholic, it being impossible, in your opinion, to do any great action otherwise; and how much wrong, disadvantage, and disservice you did to the Treaty, and to the right and interest of our dear brother and sister, and their children; what disadvantage, inconvenience, and hazard you intangled us in by your artifices, putting off and delaying our return home; the great estimation you made of that state, and the low price you set this kingdom at; still maintaining, that we, under colour of friendship to Spain, did what was in our power against them, which they said you very well knew: And, last of all, your approving of those conditions, that our nephew should be brought up in the emperor's court; to which sir Walter Aston then said, That he durst not give his consent for fear of his head: Your replying unto him, That without some such great action, neither marriage nor peace could be had."

There is no Answer to this Letter in the Journals; but, instead of it, we find another Petition from the earl, addressed to the lords, on his receiving his writ of summons; to which he annexed the Lord Keeper's Letter and his Answer, and desired to be heard in Accusation of the Duke.

The Humble Petition of John Earl of Bristol.

"Humbly shewing unto your lordships, That he hath lately received his writ of summons to parliament, for which he returned unto your lordships most humble thanks; but jointly with it, a Letter from my Lord Keeper, commanding him, in his maj.'s name, to forbear his personal attendance; and although he shall ever obey the least intimation of his maj.'s pleasure, yet he most humbly offereth unto your lordships wise considerations, as too high a point for him, how far this may trench upon the liberty and safety of the peers, and the authority of their letters patents, to be in this sort discharged by a letter missive of any subject, without the king's hand; and, for your lordships due information, he hath annexed a copy of the said Lord Keeper's Letter, and his Answer therunto.—He further humbly petitioneth your lordships, That having been, for the space of two years, highly wronged in point of his liberty and of his honour, by many sinister aspersions which have been cast upon him, without being permitted to answer for himself; which hath been done by the power and industry of the duke of Buckingham, to keep him from the presence of his maj. and the parliament, lest he should discover many crimes concerning the said duke.—He therefore most humbly beseecheth, That he may be heard, both in the point of his wrong, and of his Accusation of the said duke: Wherein he will make it appear, how infinitely the said duke hath abused their majesties, the state, and both the houses of parliament. And this, he is most confident, will not be denied, since the court of parliament never refuseth to hear the poorest subject seeking for redress of wrongs, nor the accusation against any, be he never so powerful. And herein he beseecheth your lordships to mediate to his maj. for your suppliant's coming to the house, in such sort as you shall think fitting; assuring his maj. that all he shall say, shall not only tend to the service of his maj. and the state, but highly to the honour of his maj.'s royal person, and of his princely virtues: and your suppliant shall ever pray for your lordships prosperity.

Baileol."

The Lord Keeper to the Earl of Bristol;
dated Dorset-court, March 31, 1626.

My very good lord; By his maj.'s commandment, I herewith send unto your ldp. your writ of summons for the parliament; but withal signify his maj.'s pleasure herein further, That howsoever he gives way to the awarding of the writ, yet his meaning is thereby not to discharge any former directions for restraint of your lordship's coming hither; but that you continue under the same restriction as you did before; so as your ldp.'s personal attendance here is to be forborn. And herein I doubt not but your ldp. will readily give his maj. satisfaction: And so I commend my service very heartily unto your ldp. and remain,

Your ldp.'s assured friend and servant,
THOMAS COVENTRY, C. S."

The Earl of Bristol's Answer to the Lord Keeper; dated Sherborn, April 12, 1626.

"May it please your lordship; I have re-

clared your lordship's letter of the 31st of March, and with it, his maj.'s writ of summons for the parliament. In the one his maj. commandeth me; that all excuses set aside, upon my faith and allegiance I fail not to come and attend his maj.; and this under the great seal of England. In the other, as in a letter mis-sive, his maj.'s pleasure is intimated by your ldp. that my personal attendance should be forborn. I must crave leave ingenuously to confess unto your ldp. that I want judgment rightly to direct myself in this case; as likewise, that I am ignorant how far this may trench upon the privileges of the peers of this land, and upon mine and their safety hereafter: for if the writ be not obeyed, the law calleth it a misprison, and highly fineable, whereof we have had late examples; and a mis-sive letter being avowed or not, it is to be doubted would not be adjudged a sufficient discharge against the great seal of England: on the other side, if the letter be not obeyed, a peer may, de facto, be committed upon a contempt in the interim, and the question cleared afterwards: so that in this case it is above mine abilities. I can only answer your ldp. that I will most exactly obey; and to the end I may understand which obedience will be, in all kinds, most suitable to my duty, I will presently repair to my private lodging at London, and there remain, until, in this and other causes, I shall have petitioned his maj. and understand his farther pleasure. For the second part of your lordship's letter, where your ldp. saith, 'That his majesty's meaning is not thereby to discharge any former directions for restraint of your lordship's coming hither, but that you continue under the same restriction as before; so that your lordship's personal attendance here is to be forborn.' I conceive your ldp. intendeth this touching my coming to parliament only; for as touching my coming to London, I never had at any time one word of prohibition, or colourable pretence of restraint; but, on the contrary, having his late majesty's express leave to come to London to follow my affairs, out of my respect to his maj. then prince, and to the duke of Buckingham, I forbore to come, until I might know whether my coming would not be disagreeable unto them. Whereunto his maj. was pleased to answer, both under the hand of the duke, and of Mr. secretary Conway, That he took my respect unto him herein in very good part, and would wish me to make use of the leave the king had given me. Since which time I never received any letter or message of restraint, only his maj. by his letter bearing date in June last, commandeth me to remain as I was in the time of the king his father; which was with liberty to come to London to follow my own affairs as I pleased, as will appear unto your ldp. if you will afford me so much favour as to peruse it. I have writ thus much unto your ldp. because I would not, through misunderstanding, fall into displeasure by my coming up, and to interest your ldp. to inform his maj. thereof. And that my lord

Conway, by whose warrant I was only restrained in the late king's time, of famous memory, may produce any one word, that may have such as any colourable pretence of debaring my coming up to London. I beseech your ldp. to pardon my desire to have things clearly understood; for the want of that formerly hath caused all my troubles; and when any thing is misinformed concerning me, I have little or no means to clear it; so that my chief labour is to avoid misunderstanding. I shall conclude with beseeching your ldp. to do me this favour, To let his maj. understand, that my coming up is only rightly to understand his pleasure, whereunto I shall, in all things, most dutifully and humbly conform myself. And so, with my humble service to your ldp. I recommended you to God's holy protection, and remain,

Your lordship's most humble servant,
BRISTOL."

April 21. The Lord Keeper delivered this Message from the King to the house of lords.

"That his majesty hath heard of a Petition preferred unto this house by the earl of Bristol, so void of duty and respect to his maj. that he hath great cause to punish him: That he hath also heard with what duty and respectfulness to his maj. their lordships have proceeded therein, which his maj. conceiveth to have been upon the knowledge they have that he hath been restrained for matters of state; and his maj. doth therefore give their lordships thanks for the same, and is resolved to put the cause upon the honour and justice of their lordships and this house. And thereupon his maj. commanded him (the lord keeper) to signify to their lordships his royal pleasure, That the earl of Bristol be sent for as a delinquent, to answer in this house his offences committed in his Negotiations before his majesty's being in Spain, his offences whilst he was in Spain, and his offences since his majesty's coming from Spain; his scandalizing the duke of Buckingham immediately, and his majesty by reflection, with whose privacy, and by whose directions, the duke did guide his actions, and without which he did nothing. All which his maj. will cause to be charged against him before their lordships in this house."

The lords appointed a committee to attend the king, and to present their humble thanks to his majesty, for the trust and confidence he had placed in the honour and justice of their house.

During the recess of parliament the duke of Buckingham was taking great pains to ward off the blow intended against him by the commons, in which the king was his principal agent; but in vain, for that house was resolved to carry on the prosecution against him.

Resolution of the Commons against Dr. Montagu. April 18. The two houses met again, pursuant to adjournment. And, on the 17th, Mr. Pym reported the Business concerning Dr. Montagu's Books; and the Opinion of the committee on these 3 cases: 1. "That Montagu had disturbed the peace of the Church, contrary to the doctrine thereof, published in the 39 Articles, in 1582, and to the Book of Homilies; confirmed by parliament. 2. That in these Books were divers matters tending to sedition, by setting the king against the people, and the people one against another. 3. That the whole scope of the Books were to discountenance the true profession of religion here established, and so to draw the people to Popery, and reconcile them to the Church of Rome. That the committee were fully of opinion, Montagu stood convicted of all the three heads of the charge; and that, as a public offender against the peace of the church, he should, by this house, be presented to the lords, there to receive punishment according to his demerits."—The further debate and resolution about this affair was deferred to another day, and the committee were ordered to deliver their opinions to the house what was best to be done, for preventing the danger which may happen by other books of this kind. Some days after it was agreed to petition his maj. on this last article, and the Answer returned was, "That the king did not slightly pass over the Message; but questioned whether that house had power to examine the doctrine, or no. He expressed his dislike to Dr. Montagu's writings, and said, he would refer the doctrine in them to the convocation-house; and would, for the future, take special care for the examination of all books, which should be printed, for avoiding any matter of sedition, &c."—But we shall leave this affair for the present, and proceed to much greater matters, which engrossed the attention of both lords and commons.

The Commons resolve to proceed against the D. of Buckingham.] April 20. The Commons resolved upon the question, "That setting all other business aside, they would proceed in the great Affair of the duke of Buckingham, morning and afternoon, till it was done. To the end that they might next proceed to the consideration of satisfaction to his majesty's Message about the Supply.

The Earl of Bristol charged with High Treason.] But whilst the Commons were busy in carrying on, what is called in their Journals, 'The Cause of Causes,' and finishing their Articles against the Duke, the lords were employed in the Trial of the earl of Bristol. May 1. The usher of the black rod brought the said earl to the bar, where he was ordered to kneel, because he was accused of High Treason: when the lord keeper acquainted him, "That the king had commanded his attorney general to charge his ldp. with High Treason, and other offences and misdemeanors of a very high nature, that they might proceed in a legal course against him, according to the justice and usual proceedings of parliament. Then the attorney general, sir Robert Heath, exhibited the following Articles, as a Charge against the said earl.—But when he had begun to read the said Charge, the earl interrupted him, and said, "That he had exhibited his Petition to the house, that he might come up and be heard in his Accusation against the duke of Buckingham; and that, thereupon, he, being a peer of this realm, was charged with High Treason. That he had heretofore informed the late king, of blessed memory, of the unfaithful service of the said duke; and thereupon the duke laboured that he might be clapped up in the Tower, presently after his return out of Spain: and called upon the lord chamberlain to testify whether the lord marquis Hamilton had not told him as much. That the duke had, since, laboured to keep him from this king's presence, and now he was charged with Treason.—That he had been often employed, as ambassador, in weighty affairs, and never came home tainted; and, at his last coming out of Spain, he laboured the late king James, that he might be heard before himself, and his maj. promised it. I pray God, (said the earl) that promise did him no hurt, for he died soon after. For the said king's promise, he vouched the lord chamberlain; and earnestly desired their lordships to take all these into their considerations; and to consider, also, that this house is already possessed of his said Petition and his Accusation, of the said Duke; and required that their lordships would first receive his Charge against the lord Conway, and not to invalidate his testimony against them by the King's charge against him. He protested, that he spoke for the king; that he was a peer and a free man of the realm; and desired not to be impeached, until his Charge, which was of so high a nature, was first heard."—The earl then tendered to the house his Articles, in writing, against the lord Conway, which the lords received; and, being withdrawn, the Petition of the said earl presented to the house on the 19th of April, wherein he desired he might be heard in his Accusation against the duke, was read; and, after a long debate, it was agreed upon the question, That the king's Charge against the duke and against the lord Conway, should be presently read: all which were read by the attorney general, as follows:

"ARTICLES of several High Treasons, and other great and enormous Crimes, Offences, and Contempts, committed by John Earl of Bristol, against our late Sovereign Lord King James, of blessed memory, deceased, and our Sovereign Lord the King's Majesty, which now is; wherein the said Earl is charged, by his Majesty's Attorney General, on his Majesty's behalf, in the most High and Honourable Court of Parliament, before the King and his Lords there.

"OFFENCES done and committed by the Earl of Bristol, before his majesty's going into Spain when he was Prince.

I. "That the said earl being trusted and employed by the said late king as his ambas-dor to Ferdinando, then and now emperor of Germany; to Philip IV. then and now king of Spain, in Annis 1621, 2, and 3. And having commission, and particular and special direction, to treat with the said emperor and the king of Spain, for the plenary restoring of such parts of the dominions, territories, and possessions of the count Palatine of the Rhine, who married the most excellent lady Elizabeth his now royal consort, the only daughter of the late king James; which were then wrongfully, and in hostile manner taken, and possessed with and by the armies of the said emperor, and king of Spain, or any other; and for preserving and keeping such other parts thereof, as were not then lost but were then in the protection of the said late king James; and to the use of the said count Palatine and his children: and for the restoring of the electoral dignity unto them: and also to treat with the said king of Spain, for a Marriage to be had between the most high and excellent prince Charles, then Prince of Wales, the only son and heir apparent of the said king James, and now our most sovereign lord, and the most illustrious lady Donna Maria the Infanta of Spain, sister to the now king of Spain: he the said earl, contrary to his duty and allegiance, and contrary to the trust and duty of an ambassador, at Madrid in the kingdom of Spain, to advance and further the designs of the said king of Spain against our said sovereign lord, his children, friends, and allies; falsely, wilfully, and traitorously, and as a traitor to our said late sovereign lord the king, by sundry letters and other messages sent by the said earl from Madrid, in the years aforesaid, unto king James and his ministers of state of England, did confidently and resolutely inform, advise, and assure the said late king, that the said emperor and king of Spain would really, fully, and effectually make restitution and plenary restoration to the said count Palatine and his children, of the said dominions, territories, and possessions of the said count Palatine, and of the said electoral dignity: and that the said king of Spain did really, fully, and effectually intend the said Marriage between the said lady his sister, and the said prince our now sovereign lord, according to articles formerly propounded between the said kings: whereas in truth, the said emperor and king of Spain, or either of them, never really intended such restitution as aforesaid: and whereas the said king of Spain never really intended the marriage according to those articles propounded; but the said emperor and the king of Spain intended only by those Treaties, to gain time to compass their own ends and purposes, to the detriment of this kingdom; of all which, the said earl of Bristol neither was nor could be ignorant; and the said late king James by entertaining those Treaties, and continuing them upon those false assurances, given unto him by the said earl, as aforesaid, was made secure, and lost the opportunity of time; and thereby the said dominions, territories, and possessions of the said count

Palatine and the electoral dignity, became utterly lost; and some parts thereof were taken out of the actual possession of the said king James, unto whose protection and safe keeping they were put and committed by the said count Palatine; and the most excellent lady Elizabeth his wife, and their children, are now utterly dispossessed and bereaved thereof; to the high dishonour of our said late sovereign lord king James, to the dishonour of the said late king's children and their posterity of their ancient patrimony; and to the disanimating and discouraging of the rest of the princes of Germany, and other kings and princes in amity and league with his majesty."

II. "That the said earl of Bristol, being ambassador for his late maj. king James, as aforesaid, in the years aforesaid, and having received perfect, plain, and particular instructions and directions from his said late maj. that he should put the king of Spain to a speedy and punctual answer, touching the Treaties aforesaid: and the said earl well understanding the effect of those instructions and directions so given unto him, and taking precise knowledge thereof; and also knowing how much it concerned his late maj. in honour and safety (as his great affairs then stood) to put these Treaties to a speedy conclusion: yet nevertheless he the said earl, falsely, wilfully, and traitorously, contrary to his allegiance, and contrary to the trust and duty of an ambassador, continued those Treaties upon generalities, without effectual pressing the said king of Spain unto particular conclusions, according to his majesty's directions as aforesaid; and so the said earl intended to have continued the said Treaties upon generalities, and without reducing them to certainties and to direct conclusions, to the high dishonour of his said late maj. and to the extreme danger and detriment of his majesty's person, his crown and dominions, confederates and allies."

III. "That the said earl of Bristol, being ambassador for his said late majesty as aforesaid, in the years aforesaid, to the intent to discourage the said late king James from the taking up of arms, and entering into hostility with the said king of Spain, and for resisting him and his forces from attempting the invasion of his said late majesty's dominions, and the dominions of his said late maj.'s confederates, friends and allies; the said king of Spain having long thirsted after an universal monarchy in these western parts of the world: hath many times, both by words and letters to the said late king and his ministers, extolled and magnified the greatness and power of the said king of Spain; represented unto his said late maj. the supposed dangers which would ensue unto him, if a war should happen between them; and affirmed and insinuated unto his said late maj. That if such a war should ensue, his said late maj. during the rest of his life, must expect neither to hunt nor hawk, nor eat his meat in quiet: whereby the said earl of Bristol did, cunningly and traitorously strive to retard the resolutions of the said late king to declare himself an enemy to the said king of Spain (who under colour of Treaties and Alliances, had so much abused him) and to resist his arms and forces; to the loss of opportunity of time, which cannot be recalled or regained, and to the extreme danger, dishonour, and detriment of this kingdom."

IV. "That the said Earl of Bristol, upon his dispatch out of this realm of England, on his ambassage aforesaid, had communication with divers persons of London, within this realm of England before his going into Spain, in and about his ambassage concerning the said Treaty; for the negotiation whereof the said earl was purposely sent: and he the said earl being then told, that there was little probability that these Treaties would or could ever have any good success, he the said earl acknowledged as much; and yet, nevertheless, contrary to his duty and allegiance, and to the faith and trust of an ambassador, he the said earl said and affirmed, 'That he cared not what the success thereof would be; for he would take care to have his Instructions perfect, and pursue them punctually; and howsoever the business went, he would make his fortune thereby,' or used words at that time to such effect; whereby it plainly appeareth, That the said earl, from the beginning herein, intended not the service or honour of his late maj. but his own corrupt and sinister ends, and for his own advancement."

V. "That from the beginning of his Negotiation, and throughout the whole managing thereof by the said earl of Bristol, and during his said ambassage, he the said earl, contrary to his faith, and duty to God, the true Religion professed by the Church of England, and the peace of this Church and State, did intend and resolve, That if the said Marriage, so treated of as aforesaid, should by his ministry be effected, that thereby the Romish religion and professors thereof should be advanced within this realm, and other his maj.'s realms and dominions, and the true religion and professors thereof discouraged and discountenanced: and to that end and purpose, the said earl during the time aforesaid, by letters unto his late maj. and otherwise, often counselled and persuaded his said late maj. to set at liberty the Jesuits and Priests of the Romish religion: which, according to the good, religious, and politic laws of this kingdom, were imprisoned or restrained; and to grant and allow unto the Papists and Professors of the Romish religion free toleration, and silencing of all laws made, and standing in force, against them."

VI. "That by the false Informations and Intelligence of the said earl of Bristol, during the time aforesaid, unto his said late maj. and to his maj. that now is, being then prince, concerning the said Treaties, and by the assurances aforesaid given by the said earl; his said late maj. and the prince, his now maj. being put in hopes, and by the said long delay used, without producing any effect, their majesties being put into jealousies, and just suspicion that there was no such sincerity used towards them as they expected, though so many assurances from the earl on their part had been undertaken; the said prince, our now gracious sovereign, was informed, out of his love to his country, to his allies, friends, and confederates, and to the peace of Christendom, who all suffered by such intolerable delay, to undertake in his own person, his long and dangerous journey into Spain; that thereby he might either speedily conclude those treaties, or perfectly discover that, on the emperor's and the king of Spain's part, there was no true and real intention to bring the same to conclusion, upon any fit and honourable terms and conditions: and did accordingly and speedily break them off. By which journey, the person of the said prince, being then heir apparent to the crown of this realm, and in his person, the peace and safety of this kingdom did undergo such apparent and such inevitable danger, as at the very remembrance thereof, the hearts of all good subjects do even tremble.

OFFENCES done and committed by the said Earl, during the Time of the Prince's being in Spain.

VII. "That at the Prince's coming into Spain, during the time aforesaid, the earl of Bristol, cunningly, falsely, and traiterously, moved and persuaded the prince, being then in the power of a foreign king of the Romish religion, to change his religion, which was done in this manner. At the prince's first coming to the said earl, he asked the prince for what he came thither; the prince, at first not conceiving the earl's meaning, answered, 'You know as well as I.' The earl replied, 'Sir, servants can never serve their masters industriously, although they do it faithfully, unless they know their meanings fully. Give me leave therefore to tell you what they say in the town is the cause of your coming, That you mean to change your religion, and to declare it here.' And yet, cunningly to disguise it, the earl added further; 'Sir, I do not speak this that I will persuade you to do it, or that I will promise you to follow your example, though you will do it; but, as your faithful servant, if you will trust me with so great a secret, I will endeavour to carry it the discreetest way I can.' The prince being moved at this unexpected motion again, said unto him, 'I wonder what you have ever found in me, that you should conceive I would be so base and unworthy, as for a wife to change my religion.' The said earl replying, 'He desired the prince to pardon him, if he had offended him, it was but out of his desire to serve him.' Which persuasions of the said earl were the more dangerous, because the more subtle; whereas it had been the duty of a faithful servant to God and his master, if he had found the prince staggering in his religion, to have prevented so great an error, and to have persuaded him against it, so to have avoided the dangerous consequence thereof, to the true religion, and to the state, if such a thing should have happened."

VIII. "That afterwards, during the Prince's being in Spain, the said earl having conference with the said prince about the Romish religion, he endeavoured, falsely and traiterously, to persuade the prince to change his religion, and to become a Romish-Catholick, and to become obedient to the usurped authority of the Pope of Rome: and, to that end and purpose, the said earl traiterously used these words unto the said prince, 'That the state of England never did any great thing, but when they were under the obedience of the Pope of Rome, and that it was impossible they could do any thing of note otherwise.'"

IX. "That during the time of the Prince's being in Spain, the prince consulting and advising with the said earl and others, about a new Offer made by the king of Spain touching the Palatine's eldest son to marry with the emperor's daughter, but then he must be bred up in the emperor's court; the said earl delivered his opinion, That the proposition was reasonable; whereat, when sir Walter Aston, then present, falling into some passion, said, 'That he durst not for his head consent to it:' the earl of Bristol replied, That he saw no such great inconvenience in it; for that he might be bred up in the emperor's court in our religion. But when the extreme danger, and, in a manner, the impossibility thereof was pressed unto the said earl, he said again, "That without some great action, the peace of Christendom would never be had;" which was so dangerous, and so desperate a counsel, that one near the crown of England should be poisoned in his religion, and put into the power of a foreign prince and an unfriend to our state, that the consequences thereof, both for the present and future times, were infinitely dangerous; and yet hereunto did his disaffection to our religion, and blindness in his judgement, misled by his sinister respects and the too much regard he had to the house of Austria, lead him."

OFFENCES done and committed by the said Earl, after the Prince's coming from Spain.

X. "That when the Prince had clearly found himself and his father deluded in these Treaties, and hereupon resolved to return from the court of Spain; yet, because it behoved him to part fairly, he left the powers of the desponsories with the earl of Bristol, to be delivered upon the return of the dispensation from Rome, which the king of Spain insisted upon; and without which, as he pretended, he would not conclude the Marriage. The prince foreseeing and fearing lest after the desponsories, the Infanta, that should then be his wife, might be put into a monastery, wrote a letter back to the said earl from Segovia; thereby commanding him not to make use of the said powers, until he could give him assurance, that a monastery should not rob him of his wife; which letter the said earl received, and with speed returned an answer thereto into England, persuading against this direction, yet promising obedience thereunto. Shortly after which, the prince sent another letter to the said earl into Spain, discharging him of his former command. But his late majesty, by the same messenger, sent him a more express direction, not to dispatch the desponsories, until a full conclusion were had of the other Treaty of the Palatinate, with this of the Marriage; for his maj. said, 'That he would not have one daughter to laugh, and leave the other daughter weeping.' In which dispatch, although there were some mistaking, yet in the next following, the same was corrected, and the earl of Bristol tied to the same restriction; which himself confessed in one of his dispatches afterwards, and promised to obey punctually the king's command therein; yet, nevertheless, contrary to his duty and allegiance, in another letter sent immediately after, he declared, 'That he had set a day for the desponsories,' but without any assurance, or so much as a treating of those things which were commanded to him as restrictions; and that so short a day, that if extraordinary diligence, with good success in the journey, had not concurred, the prince's hands might have been bound up; and yet he neither sure of a wife, nor any assurances given of the temporal articles. All which, in his high presumption, he adventured to do, being an express breach of his instructions; and, if the same had not been prevented by his late majesty's vigilancy, it might have turned to the infinite dishonour and prejudice of his maj."

XI. "Lastly, That he hath offended in a high and contemptuous manner, in preferring a scandalous Petition to this honourable house, to the dishonour of his maj. of blessed memory deceased, and of his sacred maj. that now is, which are no way sufferable in a subject towards his sovereign; and in one Article of that Petition specially, wherein he gives his now maj. the lie, in denying and offering to falsify that relation which his maj. affirmed, and thereunto added many things of his own remembrance to both houses of Parliament.

ROBERT HEATH."

ARTICLES of the Earl of Bristol, whereby he chargeth the Duke of Buckingham, bearing date the first day of May, 1626.

I. "That the duke of Buckingham did secretly combine and conspire with the conde of Gondomar, ambassador from the king of Spain, before his, the said ambassador's, last return into Spain, in the summer 1622, to carry his maj. (then Prince) into Spain, to the end he might be instructed in the Roman religion, and thereby have perverted the prince, and subverted the true religion established in England: From which misery this kingdom (next under God's mercy) hath, by the wise, religious, and constant carriage of his maj., been almost miraculously delivered, considering the many bold and subtile attempts of the said duke in that kind."

II. "That Mr. Porter was made acquainted therewith, and sent into Spain; and such messages at his return framed, as might serve for a ground to set on foot this conspiracy; the which was done accordingly, and thereby the king and prince highly abused, and their consents thereby first gotten to the said journey; that is to say, after the return of the said Mr. Porter, which was about the end of Dec. or the beginning of Jan. 1622, whereas the said duke had plotted it many months before."

III. "That the said duke, at his arrival in Spain nourished the Spanish ministers, not only in the belief of his own being Popishly affected, but did (both by absenting himself from all exercises of religion constantly used in the earl of Bristol's house, and frequented by all other Protestant English, and by conforming himself to please the Spaniards in divers rites of their religion, even so far as to kneel and adore their sacrament) from time to time give the Spaniards hope of the Prince's conversion; the which conversion he endeavoured to procure by all means possible; and thereby caused the Spanish ministers to propound far worse conditions for religion, than had been formerly, by the earl of Bristol and sir Walter Aston, settled and signed under his maj.'s hand; with a clause in the king of Spain's Answer of Dec. 12, 1622, that they held the Articles agreed upon sufficient, and such as ought to induce the Pope to the granting of the dispensation."

IV. "That the D. of Buckingham having several times, in the presence of the earl of Bristol, moved and pressed his late maj. at the instance of the conde of Gondomar, to write a letter to the Pope; and to that purpose, having once brought a letter ready drawn, wherewith the earl of Bristol, by his maj. being made acquainted, he did so strongly oppose the writing of any such letter, that during the abode of the said earl of Bristol in England, the said duke could not obtain it; yet, not long after the earl was gone, he procured such a letter to be written from his said late maj. unto the Pope, and to have him stiled Sanctissime Pater."

V. "That the Pope, being informed of the duke of Buckingham's inclination and intention in point of religion, sent unto the said duke a particular bull in parchment, for to persuade and encourage him in the perversion of his maj. then prince."

VI. "That the said duke's behaviour in Spain was such, that he thereby so incensed the king of Spain and his ministers, as they would admit of no reconciliation, nor further dealing with him. Whereupon the said duke seeing that the Match would be now to his disadvantage, he endeavoured to break it, not for any service to the kingdom, nor dislike of the Match in itself, nor for that he found (as since he hath pretended) that the Spaniards did not really intend the said Match, but out of his particular ends and his indignation."

VII. "That after he intended to cross the Marriage, he put in practice divers undue courses; as namely, making use of the letters of his maj. (then prince) to his own ends, and not to what they were intended; as likewise concealing divers things of high importance from his late maj. and thereby overthrew his maj.'s purposes, and advanced his own ends."

VIII. "That the said duke, as he had with his skill and artifices formerly abused their majesties; so to the same end, he afterwards abused both houses of parliament by his sinister relation of the carriage of affairs, as shall be made appear almost in every particular that he spake unto the said houses."

IX. "As for scandal given by his personal behaviour, as also the employing of his power with the king of Spain for the procuring of favours and offices, which he bestowed upon base and unworthy persons for the recompence and hire of his lust: these things, as neither fit for the earl of Bristol to speak, nor indeed for the house to hear, he leaveth to your lordships wisdom, how far you will be pleased to have them examined; it having been, indeed, a great infamy and dishonour to this nation, that a person of the duke's great quality and employments, a privy-counsellor, an ambassador, eminent in his master's favour, and solely trusted with the person of the prince, should leave behind him, in a foreign court, so much scandal as he did by his ill behaviour."

X. "That the duke hath been, in great part, the cause of the ruin and misfortune of the prince Palatine and his estates, in as much as those affairs had relation unto this kingdom."

XI. "That the D. of Buckingham hath, in his relations to both houses of parliament, wronged the earl of Bristol, in point of his honour, by many sinister aspersions which he hath laid upon him, and in point of his liberty, by many undue courses through his power and practices."

XII. "That the earl of Bristol did reveal unto his late maj. both by word and letter, in what sort the said duke had deserved him and abused his trust: and that the king, by several ways, sent him word, 'That he should rest assured he would hear the said earl, but that he should leave it to him to take his own time.' And thereupon, a few days before his sickness, he sent the earl word, 'That he would hear him against the said duke, as well as he had heard the said duke against him.' Which the duke himself heard; and not long after his blessed maj. sickened and died, having been, in the interim, much vexed and pressed by the said duke.

BRISTOL."

ARTICLES of the Earl of Bristol against the Lord Conway, bearing date May 1, 1626.

I. "That the lord Conway is so great a servant of the D. of Buckingham's, that he hath not stuck to send the earl of Bristol plain word, 'That if business could not be accommodated betwixt him and the duke, he must then adhere and declare himself for the said duke;' and therefore is unfit to be a judge in any thing that concerneth the duke or the earl."

II. "That the said lord Conway professeth himself to be a secretary of the D. of Buckingham's creation, and so acknowledgeth it under his own hand: and although he be the king's secretary of state, and a privy-counsellor, he usually beginneth his letters to the duke, Most gracious Patron."

III. "That as a creature of the said duke's, the said lord Conway hath been made the instrument of keeping the earl of Bristol from the king's presence, and of imprisoning of him by warrants under his own hand only; for which he cannot (as the earl conceiveth) produce any sufficient warrant."

IV. "That by the space of 12 months last past, the said lord Conway hath been the cause of the earl's restraint, only by misinforming his maj. and procuring a letter of restraint upon undue grounds: and when it was made apparent unto him, that the said earl was restored to his liberty, freely to follow his own affairs, by his late maj. of blessed memory: he replied, That that liberty given him by his maj. expired with the king's death."

V. "That the earl of Bristol's mother lying sick upon her death-bed, desired, for her comfort, to see her son, and to give him her last blessing: Whereupon the earl writ to the lord Conway, to desire him to move the king for his leave; which he putting off from day to day, told the person employed, 'That, by reason of the duke's sickness, he could not find opportunity to get the duke's leave to move the king; and, having spoken with the duke, he made a negative answer in the king's name.' Whereupon the earl acquainting the king by some of his bedchamber, his maj. was in very great anger, swearing the secretary had never moved him, and that to deny the said earl leave was a barbarous part; and thereupon sent him presently free leave, which the secretary hearing of, sent afterwards a letter of leave, but with divers clauses and limitations differing from the leave sent him from the king's own mouth."

VI. "That he having the businesses of the earl of Bristol in his own hands, and the earl being commanded by the king to address himself in his occasions unto his ldp. he would never deliver any message from the said earl, without first acquainting the said duke, and receiving his directions, and in a noble manner of freeness stuck not to send him word."

VII. "That the earl of Bristol having received from the lord Conway 20 Interrogatories in his late maj.'s name, drawn up by a commission of the lords appointed to search into the proceedings and employments of the said earl, in which search there was more than two months spent, divers of the said interrogatories involving felony and treason: and his maj. having been pleased to assure the said earl, both by message and letters, that, upon satisfaction given to himself and the commissioners by his answers, he would presently put an end to the earl of Bristol's business; the earl of Bristol having so fully answered as would admit of no reply; and that many of the commissioners declared themselves to be fully satisfied: the said lord Conway, (being the secretary in the commission, to whom it properly belonged to call the lords to assemble) perceiving the earl of Bristol was like to be cleared, never moved for any further meeting, neither have they ever been permitted to meet until this day; whereby the troubles of the earl of Bristol have been kept on foot till this present, and the said earl's imprisonment hath been increased 20 months. And by the artifices of the said duke of Buckingham and the said lord Conway (as shall be made appear) the said earl hath been insensibly involved and stalked into the troubles he is now in, which he doubteth not but your lordships will judge to be a very considerable case."

VIII. "That for a colour of keeping the earl from his late maj.'s presence, it being pretended after the Answer to the 20 Interrogatories, that there were some few questions more to be added, whereunto when he should have answered, his maj. swore solemnly, that without any delay, he should be admitted to his presence, and that within 2 or 3 days he should have the said questions sent unto him; the lord Conway, notwithstanding he acknowledged under his hand, that he had received his maj.'s directions for the sending of the said Articles, and was often thereunto solicited on the behalf of the said earl, would never send the said questions; and at last answered, That he had no more to do with the earl's business."

IX. "That the earl of Bristol being set free by his late maj. to come to London, to follow his own affairs as he pleased, and thereupon having his writ of parliament sent unto him, without any letters of prohibition; yet the earl of Bristol, out of his great desire to conform all his actions to that which he should understand would best please his maj. sent to know, 'Whether his coming or stay would be most agreeable unto his maj.?' Who was pleased to answer by a letter from my lord duke of Buckingham, 'That he took in very good part the said earl's respect unto him: but wished him to make some excuse for the present.' The which accordingly he did, and moved, 'That he might have a letter under the king's hand, to warrant his absence;' but under colour of this letter of leave, upon the earl of Bristol's own motion and desire, the lord Conway sent a letter from his maj. absolutely forbidding his coming to parliament; and therein likewise was inserted a clause, 'That the earl should remain restrained as he was in the time of his late maj. and so thereby a colour of restraint, under his maj.'s hand, was gotten, which could never be procured in his late maj.'s time; whereby the earl of Bristol hath been unduly restrained ever since, without being able to procure any redress, or to make the lord Conway willing to understand his case, although he sent him all the papers, whereby he might clearly see, that the earl was not under restraint in his late maj.'s time; but never other answer could be proce-

red from him, but, 'That he judged the said earl to be under restraint, and that his liberty was expired by the late king's death, as is aforesaid.'

X. "That the lord Conway, knowing that the Match for the marrying of the king of Bohemia's eldest son with the emperor's daughter, and being bred in the emperor's court, was allowed and propounded by his late maj.: and that his maj. by his letters to his son-in-law, declareth, 'That he thinketh it the fairest and clearest way for the accommodation of his affairs, and that he will take sufficient care of his breeding in true religion.' And notwithstanding that the said earl received a copy of the said letter by the said late king's order, with other papers, setting down all that had been done in the said business, and his maj.'s assent thereunto from the lord Conway himself; yet hath he suffered it to be charged as, a crime against the earl of Bristol, both in the 20th Interrogatory and in his maj.'s last letter, that he should consent to the breeding of the young prince in the emperor's court. And, further in the Interrogatory, he alledged it as an aggravation against the said earl, That the breeding of the said prince in the emperor's court, referred to the perversion of his religion, when he knew that his said breeding was never thought nor spoken of by the king, nor any other, but with that express clause and condition, 'That he should be bred in his own religion, and have such tutors and servants as his father should appoint.'

XI. "That the lord Conway hath been the cause of all the earl of Bristol's troubles, by his dubious and intrapping dispatches, and inferring, That the said earl hath failed in his directions, when it shall be made appear, that his dispatches contained no such directions as he hath alledged were given." BRISTOL."

After the reading of these very different accusations, the house not being satisfied to commit the earl to the Tower, let him remain where he was before, with the gentleman usher; and further ordered, 'That the king's Charge against the earl of Bristol be first heard, and then the Charge of the said earl against the duke: yet so that the earl's testimony against the duke be not prevented, prejudiced, nor impeached.'

The King's Message concerning the Earl of Bristol's Charge against the Duke.] May 2. The lord-keeper delivered a Message from the King to the lords: viz.

"That his majesty taketh notice of the Articles exhibited against the duke of Bucks by the earl of Bristol; and he observeth, That many of them are such, as himself is able to say more of his own knowledge than any man, for the duke's sincere carriage in them: that one of them, touching the Narrative made in parliament in the one-and-twentieth of king James, trencheth as far upon himself, as the duke; for that his maj. went as far as the duke in that declaration: and that all of them have been closed in the earl's own breast, now for these two years, contrary to his duty, if he had known any crime of that nature by the duke; and now he vents it by way of recrimination against the duke, whom he knows to be a principal witness to prove his majesty's Charge.—And therefore, That his maj. gave them thanks, that they gave no way to the earl of Bristol's unreasonable motion, of putting the duke under the same restraint that they had put the earl; thereby eschewing what the earl aimeth at, to alter their dutiful proceedings toward his maj. so often in this parliament expressed. That thereby they had made his maj. confident, that as they have, so they will put a difference between his majesty's Charge against one that appeareth as a delinquent, and the recrimination of the earl of Bristol against his majesty's witness; and not to equal them by a proceeding pari passu; nor to match the imprisonment of the one with the other, as the earl of Bristol desired; the ground being so different and unequal."

The Earl of Bristol's Defence.] May 6. The earl of Bristol was again brought to the bar of the house of lords, when the attorney-general read the foregoing Charge unto him. The earl, being permitted to speak for himself, first craved pardon of their lordships for his earnest speeches there the other day; confessing that he spoke in a passion; saying, 'That an unexpected accusation of high-treason would warm any honest heart, and I like my heart never the worse for it; but he would hereafter mend that fault.' Then he rendered all their lordships most humble thanks for this manner of proceeding against him; and desired to know, from Mr. Attorney, Whether that was his whole Charge, or no? Mr. Attorney answered, 'That he had commandment to open no more against him; perhaps, upon some incidents of his Answer, some other particulars may arise, and be urged; but no new matter should.' Then the earl desired to know and understand who was his Accuser? Mr. Attorney answered, 'The king himself, out of his own mouth, had given directions for the Charge against him, and corrected and added many things to it.' Then the earl made the following speech;

"I will not contest with the king, neither doth it beseech me so to do: neither esteem I my life or my fortunes so much as to save them by contesting with my sovereign; and therefore I would make no reply nor answer, were it not that my honour and religion were jointly questioned with my life; but they being to descend to my posterity, for their sake I am an humble suitor to his maj. that he would not take indignation at my own just defence; yet I will be ready to make any humble submission to his maj.; and I heartily desire that some means may be made, that I may make it personally unto himself, wherein I will submit myself most willingly to any act of humiliation and submission (not wronging my innocence) that ever subject did towards his sovereign: and I also desire that his maj. would be pleased to set himself here on his throne of justice, and declare, That out of his royal justice he leaves the duke of Buckingham and me upon equal terras; and that neither of our causes shall be advanced before the other. These my humble petitions, I beseech your lordships to present unto his maj. on my behalf; and withal, what a disservice it will be to his maj. hereafter, in embassages, if my accuser shall be my judge, his own witness, and have my confiscation.—As touching the Charge itself, I have once answered it all (except to that of my Petition) and I doubt not but to clear myself of every particular thereof. I expected not to have heard of these again. I expected a remonstrance of some practice with Spain, against the state; or to be charged with the receipt of 10 or 20,000 pounds, for the perswading and procuring the delivering up of some town, that the crown was in possession of, as might be the Brill or Flushing, or the like; or for being the means of the delivery of the king's ships to serve a foreign nation against those of our own religion; or for the revealing of his majesty's highest secrets, which none but two or three did know of; or for treating of the greatest affairs, as it were by my own authority, without formal instructions in the point; or as the law calls it, to have committed some overt act of disloyalty, and not to be charged, after seven embassages, with discouragements and inferences. I desire your lordships that I may have a copy of my Charge, in writing, and time for my Answer, and counsel assigned me.—There is a great difference between the duke of Buckingham and me. The duke is accused of treason, and yet at large, and in the king's favour; and I, being accused but of that which I had long since answered, am a prisoner; and, therefore, I beseech your lordships, that we may be put into equal condition. And, forasmuch as I have exhibited Articles against the lord Conway; I humbly desire that his ldp. may not meddle in this particular business, nor use the king's name against me, ex officio, as secretary of state; and that your lordships would be suitors unto his maj. on my behalf, that all the particular dispatches of my own embassages, and sir Walter Aston's, may be brought hither, and I to make use of them for my defence as my evidences.—And sithe his late maj. hath heretofore in the presence of many lords here present, affirmed, That I had neither committed treason nor felony in my late embassages, and permitted divers of his servants to come unto me; and his maj. that now is then said, That he thought me an honest man; and hath lately said, That my faults were little criminal, in the presence of divers of your lordships and others; and that the lord Conway did lately offer me to come to my trial, but he thought the coronation-pardon would free me; and yet now my offences are made high treason; and for that when I saw I could get no address from his maj. by means of the duke of Buckingham, I did address my Petition unto this house concerning his (the duke's) cunning who hath made the king a party against me: and for my accusation of him I am made a traitor, and he a judge to vote against me. I do therefore humbly beseech your lordships to distinguish of this. And although I have been too tedious already, to suffer me to proceed and present my case unto you.—This being granted, he went on thus, "At the prince's coming out of Spain I was in favour with his highness, and with the late king also at his return into England. But I having acquainted the prince (at his being in Spain) with my letters which I wrote unto the late king, of the duke's unfaithful dealing, which letter his highness forbade me to send; and the duke, at his return, having got a sight of those letters (hinc ille lachrymæ) he laboured with the duke of Richmond and the marquis Hamilton, for my commitment to the Tower, so soon as I should return into England; and he moved the marquis to deal with my lord chamberlain for my commitment, though but for a time, until things were settled, lest my coming to the king should disturb all. I desire the lord chamberlain, who is here present, to deliver his knowledge herein.—Then the duke accused me in the parliament, of the prince's dangerous journey into Spain, which I will prove to have been plotted by the duke himself aforehand, with conde de Gondomar the Spanish ambassador. And I will also make it appear unto your lordships, that there are very many contrarieties in the duke's Relation to both houses. I hearing of this, and the many dangers threatened me, offered to come home presently, but my letters were answered that I might stay and come at leisure; yet I came with as much speed as conveniently I could, considering my long journey, and that I brought up my wife and family with me; and being at Calais with above 40,000 pounds worth of the king's jewels, I could not procure shipping from thence to pass me over, but was enforced to enter in a boat with six oars, I making haste to come before the parliament should end; and the duke using all the means he could to put off my coming until the parliament was ended.—At my coming to land a single letter was sent of some six lines, from the lord Conway, of his majesty's pleasure not to come to the court, but to remain in my own lodgings; being there I petitioned the king that I might answer in the parliament, and his maj. said that the parliament was so incensed against me, that it was not safe for me to be brought thither, but in a few days I should have an end of my troubles.—At last I had Articles sent me, by commissioners appointed to enquire of my proceedings, which Articles contained the substance of this Charge, and I fully answered them in writing; and the late king read them all, and was so well satisfied therewith, that he sent me word that he would see me; whereupon the duke of Buckingham desired his maj. that I might first answer some four other questions; which being delayed, and I petitioning the king for them to be sent me, his maj. gave orders to have them presently sent; yet they came not; divers delays were sought, and at last the lord Conway wrote me a letter, that they were ready, but he thought it better I did accommodate the business.—Though I often solicited the lord Conway, yet his ldp. perceiving I should be cleared by the commissioners, would never send those questions, nor suffer the commissioners once to meet; and at last answered, He had no more to do with me.—Then the late king sent me a message, to write but a fair letter unto Buckingham for a reconciliation, and that I should leave the rest unto him; the duke hereupon sent one Mr. Clark unto me: What fair propositions I should make were these, only to retire into the country and not come to the court, but permit his grace to dispose of the vice-chamberlain's place. And I shewing Mr. Clark, by way of private conference, what papers I had to produce against the duke, his grace then required a retraction, which I denied; and so all reconciliation broke off. Afterwards the duke sent me a certain proposition in a letter, which I should acknowledge; and the preface of that proposition saith, 'It is not granted that the earl of Bristol hath by his Answer satisfied either the king, the prince, or me, of his innocence;' (a strange conjunction of a subject!) and the duke would not be satisfied with less than a direct acknowledgment.—Upon this I petitioned the late king, that I might be at liberty to follow my affairs freely, which his maj. condescended unto, and signified his pleasure by the duke, that he was satisfied, and that therefore I had my freedom: but when I had an intent to come to my lodging at Whitehall, and made the duke acquainted therewith, he seemed much displeased thereat, and moved his maj., that I might first make an acknowledgment of my fault, which his maj. refused to compel me unto; saying, He might then be thought a tyrant to force a man to acknowledge that which he was not guilty of. And his maj. sent me word, that I should make no acknowledgment unless I would freely confess myself guilty. Yet the duke caused a message to be sent me, that his maj. expected that I should make the acknowledgment and confess myself guilty. And thus it stood with me when the late king (my blessed master) sickened and died.—When his maj. that now is came to the crown, he was pleased to send me a gracious message upon the occasion of a great sickness I had, and my writ of parliament was freely sent me; but, out of respect, I desired to know what would best please the king, my coming or my stay from the parliament; and the duke of Buckingham did write unto me, that his maj. took that respect very well at my hands, but would have me excuse my coming; for which I craved a letter of licence from the parliament, instead whereof I received from the lord Conway a letter of prohibition, and restraint, and confinement, under the king's own hand, whereas before I was restrained only by the lord Conway.—After this I continued quiet almost a year in the country until the coronation, and then I wrote a most humble letter unto his maj. and to the D. of Buckingham: but received a letter from his maj. written in a great Roman hand, inclosed in one from the duke, so differing from those gracious messages his maj. had formerly sent me, and several professions he had made to my wife and others, that I knew not what judgment to make of the said letters; and divers copies of them were divulged abroad.—Then my writ of parliament being denied, I several times caused the lord keeper to be moved for it, but could procure no redress; and when I petitioned the house for my writ, the duke thereupon took occasion (to my great disgrace) to read the above specify'd letter in the open house; and a letter of prohibition was sent me (with my writ) to stay me from the parliament. (See p. 76.) Upon this I petitioned the house for redress against the duke of Buckingham's wrongs unto me, and accused him of divers crimes. And since the house was possessed of this my Petition I have been charged with treason, having been offered from his maj. but few days before, to rest in security, and not to be questioned: but I, thinking it fit for the clearing of mine honour, to have recourse unto this house, do find myself a restrained man, and the duke at liberty, sitting as one of my judges; which I hope your lordships will speedily redress. And I humbly desire your lordships to take my cause unto your lordships consideration, having put myself wholly into your hands."

This being spoken by the earl of Bristol, he was withdrawn.—Then the lord chamberlain being required by the house to deliver his knowledge of that which the earl had vowed of him, he said, "The marquis Hamilton told me, in a speech which he the said marquis had with the duke of Buckingham, that the duke told him, that his niceness, the duke of Richmond's and mine, in not giving way to the earl of Bristol's commitment to the Tower, would prejudice the cause; for if he came to the king, he would put new hopes into his maj. whereby the breach of Treaties with Spain, touching the Marriage and the Palatinate, would be hindered."

The house having debated and agreed, how far to allow of the earl's requests, he was brought to the bar again, and the lord keeper signified unto him, That their lordships require him the said earl to put in writing the short heads of those Petitions, which he desires this house to present unto the king on his behalf, and of what else he will desire their lordships to be mediators for him to his maj.; which the earl promised to do on Monday next. The lord keeper further told him, "That the house had granted him a copy of the king's Charge against him, and that he should have counsel allowed him to plead his cause. And that he is to let their lordships know at what time he shall be ready to make his Answer." The earl desired to have time till this day se'nnight, for that many of his dispatches are in the country, which he would send for up in all speed.

Mr. Attorney signified to their lordships (being demanded from what time he would charge the said earl) that he had directions to charge him no further than with the dispatches of 1621, and downwards; whereupon the earl besought their lordships, that on Monday next he might signify when he may be ready to make his Answer, which being granted by the house, he rendered their lordships most humble and hearty thanks for their honourable proceedings; and so he was withdrawn."

May 8. The lord keeper delivered a Message from the King to this effect, viz. "Whereas the earl of Bristol hath made request unto the house for counsel to be allowed to plead his cause; his maj. understands that the not using of counsel for a defendant, in cases of treason and felony, is an antient and fundamental law of this kingdom: and therefore his maj. desires, That forasmuch as he hath committed this cause to the honour and justice of this house, that your lordships would proceed with all caution, that this antient and fundamental law may receive no prejudice or blemish."

The Duke of Buckingham's Speech against the Earl of Bristol.] The duke of Buckingham moved the house, That the lord chamberlain might again declare his knowledge of that which the earl of Bristol had vouched him for. Whereupon the lord chamberlain, by command of the house, did again declare his knowledge therein, to the same effect he had on Saturday last; and the duke presently spake as followeth.

"My Lords; I can do no less on the behalf of this noble lord, of whom I will not leave it uncertain in your lordships opinions, that he hath alleged any thing of a friend that is dead, that he might not very well say; nor suffer my dead friend, who cannot answer for himself, to be thought that he had in the least kind broken the trust I reposed in him; but to acknowledge, on the behalf of them both, that I have often said unto him and others, (not under the seal of secrecy) That if the earl of Bristol have access unto his maj. with new hopes, he would go near to alter the resolution taken by advice of both houses. And I added thus much farther, (not out of any malice unto his person) That if the earl of Bristol had been my brother, considering his carriage in this business, I should have thought the Tower the fittest lodging for him."

The Earl of Bristol's Petition that the Duke and he may be put upon equal terms.] Then a Petition of the earl of Bristol was read, in hæc verba; viz.

"To the right hon. the lords of the higher house of Parliament.

"The humble Petition of John Earl of Bristol, Humbly sheweth unto your lordships, That whereas it appeareth by the title of the Charge exhibited against the earl of Bristol, in this hon. house, that the earl of Bristol is to answer before his maj. and the peers; and that his maj. is his judge, and by Mr. Attorney's confession, this Charge is by his maj.'s relation, and so he standeth by his maj. accused: And that several points of the said Charge are grounded only upon private conferences with his maj. so that his maj. by his testimony, becometh a witness: And in case the said earl should be convict, his confiscation cometh to the crown. For this regard and divers others, he humbly beseecheth your lordships to take into consideration of what consequence such a precedent may be; and therein most humbly to move his maj. for the declining, at least, of his maj.'s accusation and testimony, in such sort as you in your high wisdoms shall think fit; wherunto the said earl doth most willingly submit himself. And forasmuch as the said earl is so unhappy, as he understandeth, to have fallen into his maj.'s high displeasure, for which he is most heartily sorry; and the duke of Buckingham against whom he contesteth, standeth so eminent in his maj.'s favour, whereat the earl presumeth not in the least measure to repine; but boldeth most just, that his maj. should, according to his affectionate and good pleasure of his own royal heart, favour, prefer, or make difference of persons, in all points of grace and favour, and mediation. Yet in a case of justice, wherein two peers of the realm; two that have been privy-counsellors, and ambassadors employed in the same affairs, and thereupon do now contest in point of honour and their loyalty. He most humbly beseecheth your lordships to be intercessors unto his maj. that their causes may, by his maj. be equally referred to the justice of this honourable house, and their persons remain in equal condition. Further, he humbly beseecheth your lordships, so far to favour him as to present unto his maj. the true sorrow and grief of his heart, for having ever offended his maj. and to make offer unto his maj. on the said earl's behalf, of all the acts of humiliation and submission (not tending to the wronging of his innocency) that ever subject made unto his sovereign; and that your lordships would be earnest mediators herein, for him, to his maj. That your lordships would be pleased to move his maj. to give leave that all the dispatches concerning the Negotiations of the years 1621, 2, and 3, may be brought into this high court, and that he may make use of them as his evidence. That his maj. may be moved that my lord Conway may not use his maj.'s name, ex officio, in any thing that may concern the earl of Bristol or his Cause. And he shall pray, &c.

Bristol.

Unto this Petition was also annexed as follows, viz. "The Names of such Counsel as the earl of Bristol humbly desireth may be assigned to him; Mr. Serj. Hedley, Mr. Serj. Bramston, Mr. Serj. Crawley, Mr. Anthony Lowe.—The Earl of Bristol, concerning the time of putting in his Answer, saith, That though the Charge looketh no further back than 1621, yet the inferences thereof are drawn from his dispatches of far antienter date, so that he is constrained to send post for some of them to his house in the country, which he hath done; and therefore desired the space of 8 days, assuring your lordships, that if in shorter time (as he nothing doubteth) he shall be able to finish it, he will presently advertise your lordships thereof. The said earl further prayeth, That being in custody of Mr. Maxwell, gentleman usher of this house, and there being many things that in the interim may happen wherein he may need your lordships further order, that your lordships would be pleased now to order, that Mr. Maxwell may present unto your lordships such further petitions or requests, on the behalf of the said earl, as he shall have occasion to prefer unto your lordships.

BRISTOL."

Hereupon it was ordered, That Mr. Maxwell may present unto the house any Petition which the earl shall have occasion to make hereafter. Then the house was put into a committee, that their lordships might the more freely debate the contents of this Petition; and the petitions were read in parts, and each part considered of by itself; but before any conclusion was had thereof, a Message came from the commons, whereupon their lordships proceeded no further herein at this time, and the house was resumed.

The Commons desire a Conference.] Message from the commons, by Mr. vice-chamberlain and others, "That the commons desire a conference between a committee of both houses, if it shall so please their lordships, and at such time after this morning as their lordships shall appoint." Answer. "A committee of this whole house will meet a committee of the whole house of commons at 2 this afternoon, in the Painted Chamber, to receive what shall be propounded to their lordships." The messengers being departed, the house appointed these lords to report what the commons should propound at this committee, viz. The Lord President; the Lord Chamberlain; the earls of Dorset, Bridgewater, Devonshire, Clare; lord visc. Say and Seale; lord bp. of Norwich. And it was agreed, that these 8 lords should have the first and most convenient places at this committee.—We shall now go back a little, in order to take a view of the duke of Buckingham's Affair in the house of commons.

The Commons give the D. of Buckingham Notice of their Charge against him.] April 22. The commons had perfected their Charge against the duke, and sent him notice of it by sir John Hippeley and Mr. Giffard, two of their members. The heads of it, from the clerk's books, they were allowed to deliver to him, verbatim, but to leave no notes of them with him. His Answer was also required in two days time, before them, if he pleased.

The Duke's Answer.] April 24. The gentlemen, sent to the duke, made this report to the house, "That they had acquainted the duke with the Message, who told them he could not give Answer to it, till he had informed the lords about it. That this forenoon having asked leave of the lords, they would by no means consent to it. However, he dictated some Answer to them, which being put into writing was read to the house, as follows:

"That he should, with great care, make all due acknowledgment of your respect and favours in giving him this notice; which though it do invite him to render unto you such a satisfaction that, he hopes, may acquit and restore him to your good opinion, and might prevent your proceedings, which otherwise by a parliamentary course are like to follow: yet according to his duty, he moved the lords of the upper house, upon your notice given him, who would by no means, as things now stand, give him leave to answer, in regard he is not ignorant you are presently to enter into consideration of his maj.'s Message; and that by a delay therein your own purposes will be in some sort disappointed, and the affairs of Christendom much prejudiced; but for that, upon a resolution, you have deferred and respited that service until those things depending against him be first determined, he, out of fear that his necessary defence would spin out a great deal of time, which is more precious, is the willing to obey their lordships; that so he might hasten, without obstacle or interruption given unto him, to keep day with his maj.; and this he doth, as he conceives, to his own infinite prejudice, knowing how grievous it is to be transmitted as a grievance by the voice of this house; but he doth profess he will rather hazard the safety of his fortune, reputation and himself, than to be the least occasion of any thing that may work disaffection or misunderstanding between the king and his people: and it is his protestation, that whatsoever interpretation is made of his actions, his endeavours shall be, as long as he hath any favour with his gracious master, to take opportunity of doing good offices to this house, and of rendering all that he can be able for the safety of the state, and the general good of the common-wealth. And this he saith you may the easier believe, because his maj. can witness that he hazarded in his father's time the loss of the best affection of the best of masters to obtain for them their desire. In this zeal he was desirous to have appeared unto you ever since the beginning of this parliament, and in this zeal he doth now present himself unto you. But to return to the main point, he, lest we should be mistaken, gave us occasion, in plain words, to remember you, that it is not he that doth refuse to answer, but the lords commanded him not to answer; which he the cheerfuller obeyed, in respect of his fidelity to prefer the universal weal before his own particular; and, in the mean time, he desireth the charitable opinion of this noble house, until he be convinced that he shall appear not worthy of it, which his own innocency maketh him confident that he shall not."

Notwithstanding this complaisant Message of the duke's, the house proceeded to several resolutions and votes against his administration.

Motion for a further Supply.] April 25.

The commons went upon the Supply, according to an order made for that purpose. It was first moved for by sir Benj. Rudyard, who also desired the house to take into their consideration the fall of Subsidies. That other rents, since the 1st of Eliz. had been generally improved; but the king's had wasted, except what is paid by the nobility and clergy. That one great cause of this fall, was the multiplicity of commissioners, who are the assessors of themselves; with certificates, &c. He moved that a search might be made into former schedules of Subsidies; and that the 4s. a pound rate on lands, and the number of subsidies, may be increased by this grant. Lastly, That some forts might be erected, and some ships maintained, for the defence of the kingdom, &c. at the country's charge. This motion was seconded by sir Geo. Moore, who said, That to help the decrease of Subsidies, they ought to give one Subsidy and one Fifteenth more, payable after the three now agreed on were come in.—On another motion, a grand committee was appointed to go upon his immediately; but what was done at it is not now mentioned in the Journals. A bill for a grant of Tonnage and Poundage was also preparing by the house; and a Remonstrance to the king ordered to be drawn up concerning his taking those duties without grant of parliament.—Some days after, the addition of a fourth Subsidy, to what was already voted, was agreed unto by the house, to be rated and paid after the usual manner, the last day of July come twelvemonth. When the account of the whole grant was signified to the king, he said, "That he accepted it in very good part, but desired such speed might be used in it that it might do him good."

A further Charge against the D. of Buckingham.] April 27. A new matter was started against the duke of Buckingham, concerning a plaister and a posset given to the late king James, in his last sickness. Mr. Glanville made the report of it from the committee of examinations into the duke's conduct; and said, That the sworn physicians had testified before them, that they had agreed upon certain directions in the king's sickness, particularly that he should have neither meat nor drink for some hours before his fit. That upon this and other matters, the committee were of opinion this should be annexed to the duke's Charge, as a transcendent presumption of dangerous consequence. On this a debate arose, and the house divided on the question, Whether the grand committee of the whole house should now sit, to take consideration of this business? And it was carried in the affirmative, by 191 against 160.

April 28. Mr. Wandesford reported from the grand committee, concerning the duke of Buckingham, a general agreement amongst all the king's sworn physicians, that nothing should be administered to the king without the joint consent of them all, &c. Upon question, it was resolved, '1. That a plaister was applied, and a drink given, to the late king, in the time of his last sickness, without the advice of his sworn physicians, and not made by his sworn apothecaries or surgeons, contrary to the general directions of the physicians, and after being particularly disliked by them. 2. That the application of the plaister and giving of the drink to the late king, as agreed upon in the last question, was an act of transcendent presumption, and of dangerous consequence. 3. That this drink was given to the late king by the duke, and the plaister applied to him by the duke's direction. 4. That this shall be annexed to the rest of the duke's Charge."

April 29th. The king sent a message to the house, by the chancellor of the exchequer, intimating, 'That he having given way to their enquiries about the duke of Buckingham; and hearing there is new matter intended to be brought in; in respect of the season of the year, and the affairs of state, desireth the house will avoid loss of time therein; and leaveth them to their own way, either by presenting the complaint to himself or to the lords.' Thanks was ordered to be returned, by the said chancellor and others, to the king for his gracious Message.

Eight Managers appointed to conduct the Impeachment of the D. of Buckingham.] The commons having now entirely finished all their Articles against the duke, and agreed upon the members who should defend each of them; on the 8th of May they sent a message to the lords, desiring a conference with them concerning the Impeachment and Accusation of a great peer of that house, with as much convenient speed as their occasions would permit. Accordingly, at the time appointed, the commons went up with their Impeachment, which was to be managed by 8 of their members, and 10 others as assistants to them. The names of the eight chief managers were, sir Dudley Diggs, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Selden, Mr. Glanville, Mr. Whitby, Mr. Pym, Mr. Wandesford, and sir John Elliot.—The next day, upon a question, 'That the house do move the lords, that the duke of Buckingham may be committed to prison,' the house divided, Ayes 225; Noes 106. The Commons Journals inform us, That the Noes would have yielded; but the Yeas would not accept it, desiring to be numbered. A committee of 20 members was also nominated to consider of the manner how the commitment should be prayed.

May 9. The duke of Buckingham moved the lords, "That forasmuch as the business, which the committee of the commons had begun the day before to declare unto a committee of this house, was not then finished, that their lordships would give them a speedy meeting again this morning concerning the same." This motion was agreed to, and a message was sent to the commons accordingly. To which this answer was returned: "That at the meeting or both houses yesterday, the committee of the commons did impeach a great lord of divers crimes and misdemeanors, which could not then be finished for want of time; and the gentleman who was appointed to proceed in the next part of the charge, is so visited with sickness, that the commons are enforced to make use of one of his assistants. Therefore they desired that their lordships would appoint any time they pleased, for the next meeting, after this morning." Answer, "The lords do appoint 8 o'clock the next morning, in the former place for the purpose; and then either the aforesaid gentleman may be recovered, or his assistant better provided to perform the same."

Questions proposed to the Judges relating to the E. of Bristol.] The same day the lord keeper put the house in mind of the earl of Bristol's last Petition to them, appointed to be heard as to day? when, the Judges being sent for, the following Questions were agreed upon to be put to them and left to their considerations. 1. "Whether, in case of treason or felony, the king's testimony was to be admitted or not." 2. "Whether words spoken to the prince, who is after king, makes any alteration in this case?" The Judges were ordered to deliver their opinions herein on the 13th inst.

The King takes Offence at the Managers Behaviour, and commits two of them to the Tower.] May 11. Early in the morning, the king came to the house of lords, and, being seated on the throne, made the following speech to them:

"My Lords; The cause, and only cause of my coming to you this day, is to express the sense I have of all your honours; for he that toucheth any of you, toucheth me in a very great measure. I have thought fit to take order for punishing some insolent speeches spoken to you yesterday, by way of digression. I have been too remiss heretofore in punishing such speeches as concern myself; not that I was greedy of their monies, but for that Buckingham, through his importunity, would not suffer me to take notice of them, lest he might be thought to have set me on, and that he might come the forwarder to his trial to approve his innocency. For as touching the occasions against him, I myself can be a witness to clear him in every one of them. I speak not this to take any thing out of your hands; but to shew the reason why I have not hitherto punished those insolent speeches against myself. And now I hope ye will be as tender of my honour, when time shall serve, as I have been sensible of yours."—After which his maj. departed. The king's coming to the house and making this speech, was occasioned by the behaviour of two of the Managers for the Commons against the duke; who, in their speeches had let fall some expressions, as was reported, that were highly resented by his majesty; and he had, accordingly, committed them both to the Tower. The consequence of which will fall better in another place.

The Commons desire the D. of Buckingham may be committed to safe Custody.] The same day a Message came from the Commons, brought by sir Nath. Rich and others, which was to this purport:—"The knights, citizens, and burgesses of the commons house of parliament, taking into their serious consideration the main mischiefs and inconveniences which this renowned kingdom doth now suffer, threatening apparent danger to the king and commonwealth, have by search and disquisition into the causes thereof, found that they do principally flow from the exorbitant power and abusive carriage of the duke of Buckingham; whereof he hath in this parliament been impeached before their lordships by the commons, besides an accusation of a peer in their own house, who hath charged him (as they are informed) of high treason: They therefore with one voice make an entire declaration, That they hold it a thing of dangerous consequence both for the present and future times, that a man of so great eminence, power, and authority, being impeached and accused of such high crimes and offences, should yet enjoy his liberty, hold so great a part of the strength of the kingdom in his hands, sit as a peer in parliament, and be acquainted with the counsels thereof, whereby inevitable mischief may suddenly fall upon the kingdom. Wherefore they have thought it their duty to recommend this their unanimous desire to their lordships, as agreeable to law and reason, That they would be pleased forthwith to commit the person of the said duke to safe custody."

The D. of Buckingham's Defence.] The reply the lords made to the messengers was, That they would take their message into consideration, and return an Answer to it in convenient time. And, after the commons were withdrawn, the duke of Buckingham got up and spake as follows:

"My Lords; If I hold my peace, it will argue guilt, and if I should speak, it may argue boldness; being so foully accused. Your lordships see what complaints are made against me, by the house of commons; how well I stood in their opinions, not long since, your lordships know; and, what I have done since to lose their good opinion, I protest, I know not.—I cannot so distrust my own innocency and heart, which abhors guilt, as to offer to decline any course or court of justice: and, had they not brought my cause to your lordships, I so much trust in the justice and equity of this house, that it should have been my work to have done it. So as in this, only, they have done me a favour, to deliver me out of their hands into your lordships.—And now, my lords, whilst I protest mine innocency, I do not justify myself from all errors, as if I was an angel amongst men; I know, very well, that offices and places of high trust and eminence, may be discharged by men whose abilities are better than the best of mine, and still the management of them may lay open to exceptions.—The king and the state shall have few to serve them, if for their favour, if for their reward of service, if for every particular that may happen in the success of things, or for doing things better than some could wish, for refusing to do all they wish, they shall be given up, in the time of their master's wants, for a grievance, or a sacrifice. But, for this I shall confidently speak, from such crimes as truly deserve punishment from the state, I hope I shall ever prove myself free, either in intention or act. My lords, I speak not this arrogantly; nor will I speak any thing else to cast dirt at those who have taken pains to make me so foul; but, to protest mine innocence, in that measure, which I shall ever hope to prove, nay, am confident of, being before such just judges.—I humbly beseech your lordships to be sensible of me in this point, what dishonour I have sustained, not only at home but abroad; wherefore, I humbly desire your lordships to hasten my trial, as soon as may be, that I may no longer suffer than I must needs; and yet I further desire of your lordships that no such precipitation may be used, as may disadvantage or may prejudice my cause.—And here, my lords, I had a purpose to offer unto your lordships my voluntary absence from this place, even now in the beginning of the handling of my cause; as your lordships may perceive in part, by my former carriage towards the earl of Bristol. For, doubting lest my presence might any way disturb him and put him into passion, or any other way disadvantage him in his cause, I did voluntarily, as your lordships saw, absent myself. But, now that my accusers have, not only, been content to make my process, but to prescribe to your lordships the manner of my judgment, and to judge me before I am heard; I shall not give way, in my own particular, to any of their unjust demands; but yet, I do submit myself in this, and in all things else, to your lordships consideration."

The lords took no further notice of the message that day; and only ordered that the eight lords, appointed to report what was delivered by the commons, against the duke, at the conference, should do it fully and entirely. And, to that end, if they pleased, they were to read the same out of their notes; and it was further agreed that each lord is and ought to report all to the house, not to qualify the same in any part; and that nothing, so spoken and delivered, should be imputed to the reporter. Also, that they might help their memories with the gentlemen of the house of commons, who spoke at that conference.

The Judges forbid by the King to give their Opinions in the Earl of Bristol's Case.] May 13. An order of the house was read, concerning the Judges Opinions, on the two Questions in the earl of Bristol's Case before-mentioned; whereupon they were called on for that purpose. When the Lord Chief Justice said:

"May it please your lordships; According to your commands, we appointed a time to have taken into our consideration the two Questions propounded by your lordships, 1st, 'Whether in case of treason and of felony the king's testimony is to be admitted?' 2ndly, 'Whether words spoken to the prince, being afterwards king, made any difference in the case? But, before our meeting, Mr. Attorney General, to whom it belongs, according to the duty of his place, to have an eye of care and vigilancy in cases concerning the king, desired to know the time of our meeting, and we told him accordingly. But, before that time, he brought unto us a message from the king, signifying his pleasure to this effect: That his maj. was resolved, in this and all other causes, to proceed justly and with that moderation as became a just and gracious king. And that his maj. was so sensible of his honour, that he would not suffer the right of his crown, which may justly be preserved, to be diminished in his time. Therefore, his maj.'s pleasure was, That in any particular case or question, which may arise in the Cause of the earl of Bristol, and wherein the lords desired our opinions, that, upon mature deliberation, we should deliver the same according to our consciences. His maj. assuring himself, that in all things we will deliver ourselves, with that justice and evenness, between the king and his people, as shall be worthy of our places. That to these general Questions, of which his maj. could not discern the consequence which might happen to the prejudice of his crown, each particular case varying according to circumstances, so as it was very hard and dangerous to give a general rule, according to the latitude of those Questions; his maj.'s pleasure was, therefore, that we should forbear to give an answer thereto."

The Report of the Charge against the Duke of Buckingham.] The house next proceeded to hear the Report of the duke of Buckingham's Charge, which was to be made this day by the 8 lords appointed for that purpose. The several Speeches made by the Managers of the house of commons in enforcing the Charges against the duke, are preserved in the lords journals. From their extreme length we are under the necessity of omitting them, and must content ourselves with preserving the Articles of Impeachment, which were as follow:—

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT EXHIBITED BY THE COMMONS AGAINST THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM.

"For the speedy redress of great evils and mischiefs, and of the chief cause of these evils and mischiefs, which this kingdom of England now grievously suffereth, and of late years hath suffered; and to the honour and safety of our sovereign lord the king, and of his crown and dignity; and to the good and welfare of his people: The commons in this present parliament, by the authority of our said sovereign lord the king, assembled, do, by this their bill, shew and declare against George, duke, marquis, and earl of Buckingham, earl of Coventry, visc. Villiers; baron of Whaddon; great admiral of the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and of the principality of Wales, and of the dominions and islands of the same, of the town of Calais and of the Marches of the same, and of Normandy, Gascoign, and Guienne; general governor of the seas and ships of the said kingdoms; lieut. general, admiral, capt. general and governor of his maj.'s royal fleet and army lately set forth; master of the horse of our sovereign lord the king; lord warden, chancellor, and admiral of the Cinque-Ports, and of the members thereof; constable of Dover Castle; justice in Eyre of the Forests and Chases on this side the river Trent; constable of the castle of Windsor; gentleman of his maj.'s bed chamber: one of his maj.'s most hon. privy-council in his realms both in England, Scotland, and Ireland; and Knight of the most noble Order of the Garter; the misdemeanors, misprisions, offences, crimes, and other matters, comprised in the Articles following; and him the said duke do accuse and impeach of the said misdemeanors, misprisions, offences and crimes."

Plurality of Offices.

"I. That whereas the great offices expressed in the said duke's stile and title, heretofore have been the singular preferments of several persons, eminent in wisdom and trust, and fully able for the weighty service, and greatest employments of the state; whereby the said offices were both carefully and sufficiently executed by several persons, of such wisdom, trust, and ability: and others also, that were employed by the royal progenitors of our sovereign lord the king in places of less dignity, were much encouraged with the hopes of advancement. And whereas divers of the said places, severally of themselves, and necessarily, require the whole care, industry, and attendance of a most provident, and most able person: He the said duke, being young and unexperienced, hath, of late years, with exorbitant ambition, and for his own profit and advantage, procured and ingrossed into his own hands the said several offices; both to the danger of the state, the prejudice of that service which should have been performed in them, and to the great discouragement of others; who, by this procuring and ingrossing of the said offices, are precluded from such hopes, as their virtues, abilities, and public employments might otherwise have given them."

Buying the Admiral's Place.

"II. Whereas, by the laws and statutes of this kingdom of England, if any person whatsoever, give or pay any sum of money, fee, or reward, directly or indirectly, for any office or offices, which in any wise touch or concern the administration or execution of justice, or the keeping of any of the king's maj.'s towns, castles, or fortresses, being used, occupied, or appointed for places of strength and defence: the same person is immediately, upon the same fee, money, or reward given, or paid, to be adjudged a disabled person in law, to all intents and purposes, to have, occupy, or enjoy the said office or offices, for the which he so giveth or payeth any sum of money, fee, or reward: yet he the said duke did, in or about the month of Jan. in the 16th year of the late king James of famous memory, give and pay to the right hon. Charles, then earl of Nottingham, for the office of great admiral of England and Ireland, and the principality of Wales, and for the office of general governor of the seas and ships of the said kingdoms, and for the surrender of the said offices, then made to the said king by the said earl of Nottingham, being then great admiral of the said kingdoms and principality of Wales, and general governor of the seas and ships; to the intent the said duke might obtain the said offices to his own use, the sum of 3000*l.* of lawful money of England: and did also about the same time procure from the said king a further reward, for the surrender of the said office to the said earl, of an annuity of 1000*l.* per ann. for and during the life of the said earl; and by the procurement of the said duke, the late king, of famous memory, did, by his letters patents, dated the 27th of Jan. in the said 16th year of his reign, under the great seal of England, grant to the said earl the said annuity, which he, the said earl, accordingly had and enjoyed, during his life, and by reason of the said sum of money so as aforesaid paid by the said duke. And on this the said duke's procurement of the said annuity, the said earl of Nottingham did, in the same month, surrender unto the said late king his said offices, and his patents of them; and thereupon, and by reason of the premises, the said offices were obtained by the duke for his life, from the said king, of famous memory, by letters patents made to the said duke, of the same offices, under the great seal of England, dated the 28th of Jan. in the said 16th year of the said late king. And the said offices of great admiral and governor, as aforesaid, are offices that highly touch and concern the administration and execution of justice, within the provision of the said laws and statutes of this kingdom; which notwithstanding, the said duke hath unlawfully, ever since the first unlawful obtaining of the said grant of the said offices, retained them in his hands, and exercised them against the laws and statutes aforesaid."

Buying the Wardenship of the Cinque Ports.

"III. The said duke did likewise, in or about the beginning of the month of Dec. in the 22nd year of the said late king James, of famous memory, give and pay to the right hon. Edward, late lord Zouch, lord warden of the cinque-ports and of the members thereof, and constable of the castle of Dover, for the said offices, and for the surrender of the said offices of lord warden of the cinque-ports, and constable of the said castle of Dover, to be made to the said late king of famous memory, the sum of 1000*l.* of lawful money of England; and then also granted an annuity of 500*l.* per ann. to the said lord Zouch, for the life of the said lord Zouch; to the intent that he the said duke might thereby obtain the said offices to his own use. And for and by reason of the said sum of money, so paid by the said duke, and of the said annuity so granted to the said lord Zouch, he the said lord Zouch, on the 4th of Dec. in the year aforesaid, did surrender his said office, and his letters patent of them, to the said late king; and thereupon, and by reason of the premises, he the said duke obtained the said offices for his life, of the said late king, by his letters patents under the great seal of England, dated the 6th of Dec. in the aforesaid year. And the said office of lord warden of the cinque-ports, and of the members thereof, is an office that doth highly touch and concern administration and execution of justice; and the said office of constable of the castle of Dover, is an office that highly concerneth the keeping and defence of the town and port, and of the said castle of Dover, which is, and hath ever been esteemed for a most eminent place of strength and defence of this kingdom; the which notwithstanding, the said duke hath unlawfully ever since the first unlawful obtaining of the said office, retained them in his hands, and exercised them against the laws and statutes aforesaid."

His not guarding the Seas.

"IV. Whereas the said duke, by reason of his said offices of great admiral of the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and of the principality of Wales, and of the admiral of the cinque ports, and general governor of the seas and ships of the said kingdoms, and by reason of the trust thereunto belonging, ought at all times, since the said offices obtained, to have safely guarded, kept, and preserved the said seas, and the dominion of them; and ought also, whensoever they wanted either men, ships, munition, or other strength whatsoever, that might conduce to the better safeguard of them, to have used, from time to time, his utmost endeavour for the supply of such wants, to the right hon. the lords and others of the privy council, and by procuring such supply from his sovereign, or otherwise: He the said duke hath, ever since the dissolution of the two Treaties mentioned in the act of subsidies of the 21st of the late king James, of famous memory, (that is to say the space of three years last past) neglected the just performance of his said office and duty, and broken the said trust therewith committed unto him; and hath not, according to his said offices, during the time aforesaid, safely kept the said seas: insomuch that by reason of his neglect and default therein, not only the trade and strength of this kingdom of England hath been, during the said time, much decayed; but the same seas also have been, during the same time, ignominiously infested by pirates and enemies, to the loss both of very many ships and goods, and of many of the subjects of our sovereign lord the king; and the dominion of the said seas, being the ancient and undoubted patrimony of the kings of England, is thereby also in most imminent danger to be utterly lost."

His unjust Stay of the Ship of Newhaven, called St. Peter, after Sentence.

"V. Whereas about Michaelmas last past, a ship called the St. Peter of Newhaven, (whereof John Malleran was master) laden with diverse goods, merchandize, monies, jewels, and commodities, to the value of 40,000*l.* or thereabouts, for the proper account of M. de Villiers, the then governor of Newhaven, and other subjects of the French king, being in perfect amity and league with our sovereign lord the king, was taken at sea by some of the ships of his maj.'s late fleet, set forth under the command of the said duke, as well by direction from him the said duke as great admiral of England, as by the authority of the extraordinary commission which he then had for the command of the said fleet, and was by them, together with her said goods and lading, brought into the port of Plymouth, as a prize among many others, upon probabilities that the said ship or goods belonged to the subjects of the king of Spain: And that divers parcels of the said goods and lading were there taken out of the said ship St. Peter; that is to say, 16 barrels of cochineal, 8 bags of gold, 28 bags of silver, 2 boxes of pearl and emeralds, a chain of gold, jewels, monies, and commodities, to the value of 20,000*l.* or thereabouts; and by the said duke were delivered into the private custody of one Gabriel Marsh, servant to the said duke; and that the said ship, with the residue of her goods and lading, was from thence sent up into the river of Thames, and there detained; whereupon there was an arrest at Newhaven in the kingdom of France, on the 7th of Dec. last, of two English merchant ships trading thither, as was alledged in certain petitions exhibited by some English merchants trading into France, to the lords and others of his maj.'s most hon. privy-council; after which, that is to say, on the 28th of the said month, his maj. was pleased to order, with the advice of his privy-council, That the said ship and goods, belonging to the subjects of the French king, should be re-delivered to such as should reclaim them; and accordingly intimation was given to his maj.'s advocate in the chief court of admiralty, by the right hon. Sir John Cook, knt. one of his maj.'s principal secretaries of state, for the freeing and discharging the said ship and goods in the said court of admiralty: And afterwards, that is to say, on the 26th of Jan. last, it was decreed in the said court by the judge thereof, with the consent of the said advocate, That the said ship with whatsoever goods so seized on or taken in her, (except 300 Mexico hides, 16 sacks of ginger, one box of gilded beads, 5 sacks of ginger more, mentioned in the said decree) should be clearly released from farther detention, and delivered to the master; and thereupon a commission under seal was in that behalf duly sent out of the said court to sir Allen Appesly, sir John Wolstenholme, and others, for the due execution thereof: The said duke, notwithstanding the said order, commission and decree, detained still to his own use the said gold, silver, pearls, emeralds, jewels, monies, and commodities, so taken out of the said ship as aforesaid: And for his own singular avail and covetousness, on the 6th of Feb. last, having no information of any new proof, without any legal proceeding, by colour of his said office, unjustly caused the said ship and goods to be again arrested and detained, in public violation and contempt of the laws and justice of this land, to the great disturbance of trade, and prejudice of the merchants."

"VI. Whereas the honour, wealth, and strength of this realm of England is much increased by the traffick, chiefly, of such merchants as employ and build great warlike ships; a consideration that should move all counsellors of state, especially the lord admiral, to cherish and maintain such merchants; The said duke abusing the lords of the parliament, in the 21st year of the late king James, of famous memory, with pretence of serving the state, did oppress the East-India merchants, and extorted from them 10,000*l.* in the subtil and unlawful manner following, viz. About Feb. in the year aforesaid, he the said duke, hearing some good success that those merchants had at Ormus, in the parts beyond the seas; by his agents cunningly, in or about the month aforesaid, in the same year of the said late king, endeavoured to draw from them some great sum of money; which their poverty, and no gain by that success at Ormus, made those merchants absolutely to deny: whereupon he the said duke perceiving that the said merchants were then setting forth, in the course of their trade, 4 ships, and 2 pinnaces, laden with goods and merchandize of very great value, like to lose their voyage if they should not speedily depart: The said duke on the 1st of March then following, in the said year of the said late king, did move the lords then assembled in the said parliament, whether he should make stay of any ships which were then in the ports, (as being high admiral he might) and namely, those ships prepared for the East-India voyage, which were of great burthen, and well furnished; which motion being approved by their lordships, the duke did stay those ships accordingly: But the 5th of March following, when the deputy of that company, with other of those merchants, did make suit to the said duke for the release of those ships and pinnaces; he the said duke said, He had not been the occasion of their staying, but that having heard the motion with much earnestness in the lords house of parliament, he could do no less than give the order they had done; and therefore he willed them to set down the reasons of their suit, which he would acquaint the house withal; yet in the mean time gave them leave to let their said ships and pinnaces fall down as low as Tilbury. And the 10th of March following, an unusual joint action was, by his procurement, entered in the chief court of admiralty, in the name of the said late king and of the lord admiral, against them, for 15,000*l.* taken piratically by some captains of the said merchant ships, and pretended to be in the hands of the East-India Company; and thereupon the king's advocate, in the name of advocate for the late king and the said lord admiral, moved and obtained one attachment, which, by the serjeant of the said court of admiralty, was served on the said merchants in their court, the 16th of March following: Whereupon the said merchants, though there was no cause for their molestation by the lord admiral, yet the next day they were urged in the said court of admiralty to bring in the 15,000*l.* or go to prison. Wherefore immediately the company of the said merchants did again send the deputy aforesaid, and some others, to make new suit unto the said duke, for the release of the said ships and pinnaces; who unjustly endeavouring to extort money from the said merchants, protested, That the ships should not go, except they compounded with him; and when they urged many more reasons for the release of the said ships and pinnaces, the answer of the said duke was, That the then parliament must first be moved. The said merchants therefore being in this perplexity, and in their consultation, the 23d of that month, even ready to give over that trade, yet considering that they should lose more than was demanded by unlading their ships, besides their voyage, they resolved to give the said duke 10,000*l.* for his unjust demands. And he the said duke, by the undue means aforesaid, and under colour of his office, and upon false pretence of rights, unjustly did exact and extort from the said merchants the 10,000*l.* and received the same about the 28th of April following the discharge of those ships, which were not released by him, till they the said merchants had yielded to give him the said duke the 10,000*l.* for the said release, and for the false pretence of rights made by the said duke, as aforesaid."

His putting some ships into the hands of the French.

"VII. Whereas the Ships of our sovereign lord the king, and of his kingdoms aforesaid, are the principal strength and defence of the said kingdoms, and ought therefore to be always preserved, and safely kept, under the command, and for the service, of our sovereign lord the king, no less than any the fortresses and castles of the said kingdoms: and whereas no subject of this realm ought to be dispossessed of any his goods or chattels without order of justice, or his own consent first duly had and obtained: the said duke, being great admiral of England, gov.-general and keeper of the said ships and seas, and who therefore ought to have and take a special and continual care and diligence how to preserve the same; did nevertheless, in or about the end of July last, in the 1st year of our sovereign lord the king, under colour of the said office of great admiral of England, and by indirect and subtle means and practices, procure one of the principal ships, of his majoe-ty's navy-royal, called the Vanguard, then under the command of capt. John Pennington, and 6 other merchant ships of great burthen and value, belonging to several persons inhabiting in London, the natural subjects of his majesty, to be conveyed over, with all their ordnance, munition, tackle and apparel, into the ports of the kingdom of France; to the end that, being there, they might the more easily be put into the hands of the French king, his ministers and subjects, and taken into their possession, command and power: and accordingly the said duke, by his ministers and agents, with menaces, and other ill means and practices, did there, without order of justice, and without the consent of the said masters and owners, unduly compel and enforce the said masters and owners of the said 6 merchant-ships, to deliver the said ships into the said possession, command and power of the said French king, his ministers and subjects: and by reason of his compulsion, and under the pretext of his power as aforesaid, and by his indirect practices as aforesaid, the said ships aforesaid, as well the said ship royal of his maj. as the others belonging to the said merchants, were there delivered into the hands and command of the said French king, his ministers and subjects, without either sufficient security or assurance for re-delivery, or other necessary caution in that behalf taken and provided, either by the said duke himself, or otherwise by his direction; contrary to the duty of the said offices of great admiral, governor-general, and keeper of the said ships and seas, and to the faith and trust in that behalf reposed, and contrary to the duty which he oweth to our sovereign lord the king in his place of privy-counsellor; to the apparent weakening of the naval strength of this kingdom, to the great loss and prejudice of the said merchants, and against the liberty of those subjects of our sovereign lord the king that are under the jurisdiction of the admiralty."

His practice for the employment of them against Rochelle.

"VIII. The said duke, contrary to the purpose of our sovereign lord the king, and his majesty's known zeal for the maintenance and advancement of the true religion established in the Church of England, knowing that the said ships were intended to be employed by the said French king against those of the same religion at Rochelle, and elsewhere, in the kingdom of France, did procure the said ship royal, and compel, as aforesaid, the said 6 other ships to be delivered unto the said French king, his ministers and subjects, as aforesaid; to the end the said ships might be used and employed, by the said French king, in his intended war against those of the said religion in the said town of Rochelle, and elsewhere within the kingdom of France: and the said ships were, and have been since, so used and employed by the said French king, his ministers and subjects, against them. And this the said duke did, as aforesaid, in great and most apparent prejudice of the said religion, contrary to the purpose and intention of our sovereign lord the king, and against his duty in that behalf, being sworn counsellor to his maj., and to the great scandal and dishonour of this nation. And notwithstanding the delivery of the said ships by his procurement and compulsion, as aforesaid, to be employed, as aforesaid, the said duke, in cunning and cautelous manner, to mask his ill intentions, did, at the parliament held at Oxford in Aug. last, before the committee of both houses of parl. intimate and declare, that the said ships were not, nor should they be so used and employed against those of the said religion, as aforesaid; in contempt of our sovereign lord the king, and in abuse of the said houses of parl. and in violation of that truth which every man should profess."

His compelling Lord Roberts of Truro to buy his Title of Honour.

"IX. Whereas the Titles of Honour of this kingdom of England were wont to be conferred, as great rewards, upon such virtuous and industrious persons as had merited them by their faithful service; the said duke, by his importunate and subtle procurement, hath not only perverted that antient and honourable way, but also unduly, for his own particular gain, he hath enforced some that were rich (though unwilling) to purchase Honour; as the lord Roberts, baron of Truro, who, by practice of the said duke and his agents, was drawn up to London, in or about Oct. in the 22nd year of the reign of the late king James of famous memory, and there so threatened and dealt withal, that by reason thereof he yielded to give, and accordingly did pay the sum of 10,000*l.* to the said duke, and to his use; for which said sum, the said duke in the month of Jan. in the 22nd year of the said late king, procured the title of baron Roberts of Truro, to the said lord Roberts. In which practice, as the said lord Roberts was much wronged in this particular, so the example thereof tendeth to the prejudice of the gentry, and dishonour of the nobility of this kingdom."

His selling Places of Judicature.

"X. Whereas no Place of Judicature in the courts of justice of our sovereign lord the king, nor other like preferments given by the Kings of this realm, ought to be procured by any subject whatsoever for any reward, bribe, or gift; he the said duke in or about the month of Dec. in the 18th year of the reign of the late king James of famous memory, did procure of the said king, the office of high treasurer of England to the lord viscount Mandeville, now earl of Manchester; which office, at his procurement, was given and granted accordingly to the lord visc. Mandeville: and, as a reward for the said procurement of the same grant, he the said duke did then receive to his own use, of and from the said lord visc. Mandeville, the sum of 20,000*l.* of lawful money of England. And also in or about the month of Jan. in the 16th year of the reign of the said late king, did procure of the said late king, of famous memory, the office of master of the wards and liveries to and for sir L. Cranfield, afterwards earl of Middlesex, which office was, upon the same procurement, given and granted to the said sir L. Cranfield: and, as a reward for the same procurement, he, the said duke, had, to his own use, or to the use of some other person by him appointed, of the said sir L. Cranfield, the sum of 6000*l.* of lawful money of England, contrary to the dignity of our sovereign lord the king, and against the duty that should have been performed by the said duke unto him."

His procuring Honours for his poor Kindred.

"XI. That he the said duke hath, within these ten years last past, procured divers Titles of Honour to his mother, brothers, kindred and allies; as, the title of countess of Buckingham to his mother, while she was sir Tho. Compton's wife; the title of earl of Anglesy to his younger brother, Christ. Villiers; the titles of baron of Newnham Padocks; viscount Fielding, and earl of Denbigh, to his sister's husband, sir Wm. Fielding; the titles of baron of Stoak and visc. Purbeck, to sir John Villiers, elder brother unto the said duke; and divers more of the like kind to his kindred and allies; whereby the noble barons of England, so well deserving in themselves, and in their ancestors, have been much prejudiced, and the crown disabled to reward extraordinary virtues in future times with honour, while the poor estates of those for whom such unnecessary advancement hath been procured, are apparently likely to be more and more burthensome to the king, notwithstanding such annuities, pensions, and grants of lands annexed to the crown, of great value, which the said duke hath procured for those his kindred, to support these their dignities."

His exhausting, intercepting, and misemploying the King's Revenue.

"XII. He the said duke, not contented with the great advancement formerly received from the late king, of famous memory, did, by his procurement and practice, in the 14th year of the said king, for the support of the many places, honours and dignities conferred on him, obtain a grant of divers manors, parcel of the revenue of the crown, and of the duchy of Lancaster, to the yearly value of 1697*l.* 2*s.* 0*d.* of old rent, with all woods, timber, trees, and advowsons; part whereof amounting to the annual sum of 747*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* was rated at the sum of only 320*l.* tho', in truth, of so far greater value. And likewise, in the 16th year of the same king's reign, did procure divers other manors, annexed to the crown, of the yearly value, at the old rent, of 1338*l.* or thereabouts, according as in a schedule hereunto annexed appeareth. In the warrant for passing of which lands, he, by his great favour, procured divers unusual clauses to be inserted, viz. That no perquisites of courts should be valued, and that all bailiff-fees should be repressed in the particulars upon which those lands were rated; whereby a precedent hath been introduced, which all those who, since that time, have obtained any lands from the crown, have pursued to the damage of his late maj. and of our sovereign lord the king that now is, to an exceeding great value. And afterwards he surrendered to his said maj. divers manors and lands, parcel of those lands formerly granted unto him, to the value of 723*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.* per ann.; in consideration of which surrender, he procured divers other lands of the said late king to be sold and contracted for, by his own servants and agents, and thereupon hath obtained grants of the same to pass from his late maj. to several persons of this kingdom; and hath caused tallies to be stricken for the money, being the consideration mentioned in those grants in the receipt of the exchequer, as if such monies had really come to his maj.'s coffers; whereas the duke (or some other by his appointment) hath indeed received the same sums, and expended them upon his own occasions. And notwithstanding the great and inestimable gain made by him, by the sale of offices, honours, and by other suits by him obtained from his maj. and for the countenancing of divers projects, and other courses, burthensome to his maj.'s realms, both of England and Ireland; the said duke hath likewise, by his procurement and practice, received into his hands, and disbursed to his own use, exceeding great sums that were the monies of the late king, of famous memory, as appeareth also in the said schedule hereunto annexed: and, the better to colour his doings in that behalf, hath obtained several privy-seals from his late maj. and his maj. that now is, warranting the payment of great sums to persons by him named, causing it to be recited in such privy-seals, as if those sums were directed for secret services concerning the state, which were, notwithstanding, disposed of to his own use; and other privy-seals have been procured by him for the discharge of those persons without account; and by the like fraud and practice, under colour of free gifts from his maj. he hath gotten into his hands great sums which were intended by his maj. to be disbursed for the preparing, furnishing and victualling of his royal navy; by which secret and colourable devices the constant and ordinary course of the exchequer hath been broken, there being no means, by matter of record, to charge either the treasurer or victualler of the navy with those sums which ought to have come to their hands, and to be accounted for to his maj.: and such a confusion and mixture hath been made between the king's estates and the duke's, as cannot be cleared by the legal entries and records, which ought to be truly and faithfully made and kept, both for the safety of his maj.'s treasure, and for the indemnity of his officers and subjects whom it doth concern. And also in the 16th and 20th years of the said king, he did procure to himself several releases from the said king, of divers great sums of money of the said king, by him privately received, and which he procured, that he might detain the same for the support of his places, honours, and dignities. And these things, and divers others of the like kind, as appeareth in the schedule annexed, hath he done, to the exceeding diminution of the revenue of the crown, and in deceit both of our sovereign lord the king that now is, and of the late king James, of famous memory, and to the detriment of the whole kingdom."

His transcendent Presumption in giving Physick to the King.

"XIII. Whereas special care and order hath been taken by the laws of the realm, to restrain and prevent the unskilful administration of physick, whereby the health and life of man may be much endangered: and whereas most especially, the royal persons of the kings of the realm, in whom we their loyal subjects humbly challenge a great interest, are, and always have been esteemed by us, so sacred, that nothing ought to be prepared for them, or administered unto them, in the way of physick or dyet, in the times of their sickness, without the consent and direction of some of their sworn physicians, apothecaries, or surgeons: and the boldness of such (how near soever to them in place and favour) who have forgotten their duties so far as to presume to offer any thing unto them beyond their experience, hath been always ranked in the number of high offences and misdemeanors. And whereas the sworn physicians of our late sovereign lord king James, of blessed memory, attending on his majesty in the month of March, in the 22nd year of his most glorious reign, in the times of his sickness, being an ague, did, in due and necessary care of, and for the recovery of his health, and preservation of his person, upon and after several mature consultations in that behalf had and holden, at several times in the same month, resolve and give directions, that nothing should be applied or given unto his highness, by way of physick or diet, during his said sickness, but by and upon their general advice and consents, and after good deliberation thereof first had; more especially by their like care, and upon like consultations, did justly resolve, and publicly give warning to, and for all the other gentlemen, and other servants and officers of his said late maj.'s bed-chamber, that no meat or drink whatsoever should be given unto him, within 2 or 3 hours next before the usual time of, and for the coming of his fit in the said ague, nor during the continuance thereof, nor afterwards, until his cold fit was past: the said duke of Buckingham, being a sworn servant of his said late maj. of and in his maj.'s said bed-chamber, contrary to his duty, and the tender respects which he ought to have had of his majesty's most sacred person, and after the consultations, resolutions, directions, and warning aforesaid, did, nevertheless, without any sufficient warrant in that behalf, unduly cause and procure certain plaisters, and a certain drink or potion to be provided for the use of his said majesty, without the direction or privity of his said late majesty's physicians, not prepared by any of his sworn apothecaries or surgeons, but compounded of several ingredients to them unknown: notwithstanding the same plaisters, or some plaster like thereunto, having been formerly administered unto his said maj. did produce such ill effects, as that some of the said sworn physicians did altogether disallow thereof, and utterly refused to meddle any further with his said maj. until these plaisters were removed, as being hurtful and prejudicial to the health of his maj.; yet, nevertheless, the same plaisters, as also a drink or potion, was provided by him the said duke; which he, the said duke, by colour of some insufficient and slight pretences, did, upon Monday the 21st day of March, in the 22nd year aforesaid, when his maj. by the judgment of his said physicians, was in the declination of his disease, cause and procure the said plaisters to be applied to the breast and wrists of his said late maj. And then also, at and in his maj.'s fit of the said ague, the said Monday, and at several times within two hours before the coming of the said fit, and before his majesty's then cold fit was passed, did deliver, and cause to be delivered, several quantities of the said drink or potion to his said late majesty; who thereupon, at the same times, within the seasons in that behalf prohibited by his majesty's physicians, as aforesaid, did, by the means and procurement of the said duke, drink, and take divers quantities of the said drink or potion.—After which said plaisters, and drink or potion, applied and given unto, and taken and received by his said maj. as aforesaid, great distempers and divers ill symptoms appeared upon his said maj. insomuch that the said physicians finding his maj. the next morning much worse in the estate of his health, and holding consultation thereabout, did, by joint consent, send to the said duke, praying him not to adventure to minister to his maj. any more physick, without their allowance and approbation. And his said maj. finding himself much diseased and affected with pain and sickness, after his then fit, when by the course of his disease he expected intermission and ease, did attribute the cause of such his trouble unto the said plaster and drink, which the said duke had so given, and caused to be administered unto him. Which said adventurous act, by a person obliged in duty and thankfulness, done to the person or so great a king, after so ill success of the like formerly administered, contrary to such directions as aforesaid, and accompanied with so unhappy event, to the great grief and discomfort of all his majesty's subjects in general, is an offence and misdemeanor of so high a nature, as may justly be called, and is, by the said commons deemed to be, an act of transcendent presumption, and of dangerous consequence."

Conclusion.

"And the said commons, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said duke, and also of replying to the Answers that the said duke shall make unto the said Articles or to any of them, and of offering further proof also of the premisses, or of any of them, as the case shall (according to the course of parliament) require, do pray, that the said duke may be put to answer all and every the premisses; and that such proceeding, examination, tryal and judgment, may be upon every of them had and used, as is agreeable to law and justice."

The Duke of Buckingham charges sir D. Diggs with treasonable Words at the foregoing Conference.] After the Report of the duke's Charge was made to the lords, his grace rose up and affirmed to the house, "That some words were spoken at the late conference by sir Dudley Diggs, which so far trench on the king's honour, that they were interpreted treasonable. And that, had he not been restrained by the order of the house, he would have reprehended him for them. He, therefore, earnestly desired, because that divers constructions had been made of those words and variously reported, that the eight lords would be pleased to produce their notes taken at the said conference."—This motion occasioned a long debate, the house being often put into a committee and resumed again, till, at last, 30 lay-lords and 6 bishops, though there was no order for it, made a voluntary protestation, upon their honours, "That the said sir Dudley Diggs did not speak any thing at the said conference, which did or might trench upon the king's honour; and, if he had, they would presently have reprehended him for it."—The lord president, the earl of Manchester, affirmed, That he had reported the words in the same sense they were delivered unto him by the party himself; and, though the dislocation of them required to be explained, yet he agreed with the rest of the lords for the party's good meaning, and made the same protestation. Some other lords affirmed, They did not hear them at all; others said, They would make no protestation until they were commanded by order; and only one, the earl of Holland, thought the words were fit to be explained and the party questioned about them.—This is all that is said, in the Lords Journals, relating to sir Dudley Diggs's Case; for sir John Elliot's did not come before them. We shall now return to the Proceedings of the Commons, and learn how this business went on there.

The Commons resent the Imprisonment of Sir D. Diggs, and Sir J. Elliot.] The commons highly resented the imprisonment of their two members; and, May 12th, actually resolved, "Not to do any more business till they were righted in their Privileges." Sir Dudley Carton, vico-chamberlain of the household, observing a sullen silence, as he termed it, in the house, began a speech in order to bring them to better temper. The heads of this speech are entered in the Commons Journals of this day. Mr. Rushworth hath given it at length, in these words.

Sir Dudley Carlton's Speech on that Occasion.]

"I find, by a great silence in this house, that it is a fit time to be heard, if you please to give me the patience. I may very fitly compare the heaviness of this house unto some of my misfortunes by sea in my travels: For as we were bound unto Marseilles, by oversight of the mariners we mistook our course, and by ill fortune met with a sand: That was no sooner overpast, but we fell on another; and having escaped this likewise, we met with a third, and in that we stuck fast. All of the passengers being much dismayed by this disaster, as now we are here in this house for the loss of those two members; at last an old experienced mariner, upon consultation, affirmed, That the speediest way to come out from the sands, was to know how we came there: So, well looking and beholding the compass, he found by going in upon such a point we were brought into that strait; wherefore we must take a new point to rectify and bring us out of danger.—This house of parliament may be compared to the ship; the sands to our messages; and the commitment to the sands that the ship did stick fast in; and lastly the compass, to the table where the book of orders doth lie. Then I beseech you let us look into the book where the orders are, whether the gentlemen did go no further than the order did warrant them. If they did not, it is fit that we should defend them whom we employed in our behests. But if they have exceeded their commission, and delivered that which they had not warrant for, it is just that we let them suffer for this presumption; and this our course will bring us from these rocks. I beseech you gentlemen, move not his majesty with trenching upon his prerogatives, lest you bring him out of love with parliaments. You have heard his majesty's often messages to you, to put you forward in a course that will be most convenient. In those messages he told you, That if there were not correspondency between him and you, he should be enforced to use new counsels. Now I pray you consider what these new counsels are, and may be: I fear to declare those that I conceive. In all christian kingdoms you know that parliaments were in use antiently, by which their kingdoms were governed in a most flourishing manner, until the monarchs began to know their own strength; and seeing the turbulent spirit of their parliaments, at length they, by little and little, began to stand upon their prerogatives, and at last overthrew the parliaments throughout Christendom, except here only with us.—And indeed you would count it a great misery, if you knew the subjects in foreign countries as well as myself, to see them look not like our nation, with store of flesh on their backs, but like so many ghosts.

and not men, being nothing but skin and bones, with some thin cover to their nakedness, and wearing only wooden shoes on their feet: so that they cannot eat meat, or wear good clothes, but they must pay and be taxed unto the king for it. This is a misery beyond expression, and that which yet we are free from. Let us be careful then to preserve the king's good opinion of parliaments, which bringeth this happiness to this nation, and makes us envied of all others, while there is this sweetness between his maj. and his commons; lest we lose the repute of a free-born nation, by turbulency in parliament. For, in my opinion, the greatest and wisest part of a parliament are those that use the greatest silence, so as it be not opinative, or sullen, as now we are by the loss of these our members that are committed.—This good correspondence being kept between the king and his people, will so join their love and favour to his maj. with liking of parliaments, that his prerogative shall be preserved entire to himself, without our trenching upon it; and also the privilege of the subject (which is our happiness) inviolated, and both be maintained to the support of each other. And I told you, if you would hear me patiently, I would tell you what exception his maj. doth take at those gentlemen that are committed. You know that eight members were chosen to deliver the Charge against the duke, but there were only 6 employed for that purpose; and to these there was no exception. As for sir D. Diggs's part, that was the prologue; and in that his maj. doth conceive that he went too far beyond his commission, in pressing the death of his ever-blessed father in these words, 'That he was commanded by the house to say concerning the plaister applied to the king, 'That he did forbear to speak further in regard of the king's honour,' or words to that effect. This his maj. conceiveth to be to his dishonour, as if there had been any underhand dealing by his maj., in applying of the plaister; and this may make his subjects jealous of his doings: In this point his maj. is assured that the house did not warrant him. Now for that which is excepted against sir John Elliot, his over bitterness in the aggravation upon the whole Charge, and specially upon some of the heads of it, as I never heard the like in parliament before; but I have indeed heard the like when a criminal was indicted, or accused at a bar. For if you please to remember, when I moved for putting of the St. Peter of Newhaven out of the Charge against the duke, and shewed my reasons for that purpose, you know how tender sir J. Elliot was of it, as if it had been a child of his own; and so careful in the handling thereof by a stranger, that he would not suffer it to be touched, though with never so tender a hand, for fear it might prove a changeling; which did manifest, how specious soever his pretences were, that he had oculus in cauda. And I must confess, I was heartily sorry, when he delivered his aggravation to the lords, to see his tartness against the duke; when he had occasion to name him, he only gave him the title of 'This Man,' and 'The Man;' whereas the others observed more respect and modesty in their Charges against so great a person as the duke is, considering that then he was not convicted, but stood rectus in curia. Lastly, for pressing the death of his late maj. you know that the sense of the house concluded, 'That it was only an act of presumption; nay, some of them expressly said, 'Nay, God forbid, that I should lay the death of the king to his charge.' If he, without warrant from the house, insisted upon the composition of the plaister, as if there were aliquid latet quod non patet; this was beyond his commission from our house, and this is that which his maj. doth except against: and this, I say, drew his maj. with other insolent invectives, to use his regal authority in committing them to the Tower. I move therefore, for a grand committee to consider of the best remedy to get us out of this strait."

The Commons' Protestation relating to sir D. Diggs.] May 13. Mr. Rolles, from the committee appointed by the house, reported, "That the words spoken by sir D. Diggs, against which his maj. had taken exception, were, 'That he should say, by the command of the house, on the particular of the plaister applied to the body of the late king, 'That he did forbear to speak any further, in regard of the king's honour,' or words to that effect.'" And that the committee had resolved, "That a solemn protestation should be made by every member of the house, absent or present, against their giving consent to the speaking of any such words. The form of which was as followeth: 'I protest, before Almighty God and this house of parliament, that I never gave consent that sir D. Diggs should speak those words which he is now charged withal, or any words to that effect; and I have not affirmed to any that he did speak such words, or any to that effect.'"

The two Members are discharged by the King.] But the king having been better satisfied of sir D. Diggs's innocence in this respect, released him from the Tower; and the day after he took his seat in the house. He there made a protestation, 'That the words charged on him were so far from being his words, that they never came into his thoughts; what had led the king into this error, was common report;' and afterwards sending for 5^e or 6 note-books, they seemed to confirm it. But the case of sir John Elliot was somewhat different; though this gentleman was released from his confinement nearly as soon as the former.

Debate on the Releasement of sir J. Elliot.] May 16. The chancellor of the exchequer delivered a message from the king to the house, 'That the king was very careful not to enter upon their privileges, good testimony of which he had given by his proceedings with sir D. Diggs. But that the business of sir J. Elliot was of another nature; and although his maj. by the information given him, disliked the whole manner of his delivery of that which he had commandment from the house to speak, yet the king charged sir J. Elliot with things extrajudicial to that authority. He therefore wished they would proceed on cheerfully with the business of the house, resting upon this, that the king would, by no means, violate any of their privileges.—But it being desired by some, That the word extrajudicial might be explained, Mr. chancellor said, 'It was the king's own word, and therefore he could not do it, without his maj.'s leave. But he would move the king for it, and then willingly satisfy the house about it.' The consideration of this message was deferred to the next day; and, by general voice, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Selden, Mr. Glanville, Mr. Sherland, Mr. Pym, and Mr. Wandesford, were cleared from having exceeded their commission, given them by the house, in any thing which passed from them in the late conference with the lords.

May 20. A motion was made in the house concerning sir J. Elliot, whether he should come and sit there, having been charged with high crimes extrajudicial to that house. The ministers allowed of his coming; and accordingly sir John having taken his place,

Mr. Vice-Chamberlain stood up and said, "That he did not charge him with crimes, but only gave him an occasion to discharge himself of whatsoever might be objected against him, for any thing which passed from him at the conference. That all the other 7 managers used respective words against the duke; but for the manner of his speech, it was thought to be too harsh and tart towards the person of his grace. First, in the matter; representing a character of the duke of Buckingham's mind, comparatively with a strange beast called Stellionatus; which was not in the Charge against him. Next, in saying something contrary to the mind of the house; as his not knowing of the return of the ships out of France, 'They say they are come, but I know it not.' Which might be conceived to be a doubt of the house; since he said, That in obedience to the house he spoke it. His phrase of 'That man,' in all languages is accounted base, and a great indignity to be used to persons of honour. That his offence sounded very ill abroad in making historical comparisons. As of Sejanus; of the bishop of Ely; that he was audax, superbus, adulator; and, speaking of Sejanus, said, he would not touch his venefices and veneries; wherein he was conceived to aim at the duke. In the main, That he cut off the words of the last Charge, with a quotation out of Cicero; as if some things were in the charge covered, which were not yet discovered. And all this contrary to his directions from the house."—To this accusation,

Sir John Elliot replied, "That he gave thanks to Mr. vice-chamberlain, for his plain dealing with him, and ministring occasion for him to clear himself. He desired that the complaints against him might be particularly charged, that he might answer them one by one distinctly. And moved, that if any other in the house could charge him further; they would now do it, that he might answer themselves. 1. For the word Stellionatus: that for his honours, offices, &c. he sailed with his ambition; but for his deceit and fraud, because no word could decypher it, he used the word Stellionatus; which is a beast of so many colours, as, one beholding of it cannot tell what colour it is. The instances herein were, his fraud, in drawing money from the merchants: his getting them to send their ships into France there to be trapped: to abuse the king therein, and also the parliament: all these under the word Stellionatus. 2. For his saying, 'he knew not that the ships were come, and that in obedience to the house;' he confessed he did not know, though he did hear they were returned; for it was true, he heard it in that house; but neither then, nor now, knoweth it certainly. 3. For the words, 'The man;' he said he spoke not by the book, but suddenly. That he did oft give the duke his titles, but for brevity's sake, he used the words, 'the man;' which is used in all languages, as ille & ipse. He thought it not fit at all times to reiterate his titles; and yet thinketh him not to be a God. 4. For Sejanus and the bishop of Ely; for the first he had paralleled him in four particulars. Nor did he apply the veneries and venefices of Sejanus to him, but excluded them. If applied by the duke to himself, he prayed, that his misapplication might not make that, which he never intended, to be his fault. To the bishop he compared him for the exhausting and luxurious employing of the king's revenue; conferring honours upon obscure persons, his boldness; & percat ne omnes percant. But he protested that in none of these examples, he meant to parallel times to these, nor any other person but to the duke. For the cutting off the last Charge in the words of Cicero, he said, this fell not from him in the conclusion; to evince which, he related the particulars, and, as he remembered, the very syllables of what he had then said. For the manner of his speech; as having too much vigour and strength; he said, he could not excuse his natural defects; but he then endeavoured, and ever did in this house, to avoid passion; and only desired to do his duty with the best life he could. And, for exceeding his commission; he desired to understand the particulars wherein, and then he would give an answer."

After sir John Elliot had ended his justification, he withdrew, of himself, the house refusing to order it. And it was resolved upon the question, "That sir John Elliot had not exceeded the commission given him by the house, in any thing which passed from him in the late conference with the lords." The like was done for sir D. Digges; and both without one negative.

We shall now return to the Proceedings of the Lords in the beginning of this parliament, in order to take notice of the imprisonment of a Peer, which occasioned a general ferment at that time, and created much disturbance in that house.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS RELATIVE TO THE IMPRISONMENT OF THE EARL OF ARUNDEL DURING THE SESSION.

On the 14th of March the king had committed the earl of Arundel to the Tower, but the cause of his commitment was not expressed.* The lords were highly discontented at his commitment in time of parliament; and thereupon resolved 'to take the same into their consideration; and so to proceed therein, as to give no just cause of offence to his majesty, and yet preserve the privileges of parliament.' This gave occasion to the following Messages, Petitions, Answers, and Replies; which, as an affair of so great consequence to the peerage, we shall give in a regular series, without the intervention of any other matters.

March 24. The lord keeper signified to the house, that he was commanded to deliver this Message from his maj. unto their lordships, viz. "That the earl of Arundel was restrained for a misdemeanor which was personal to his maj. and lay in the proper knowledge of his maj. and had no relation to matters of parliament." Hereupon the house was put into a committee; and being resumed, the lords sub-committees for privileges, &c. were appointed to search for precedents concerning the commitment of a peer of this realm, during the time of parliament: and the lord chief justice (sir Randolph Crew) Mr. Justice Dolderige, and Mr. Justice Yelverton, were appointed to attend their lordships in that behalf.

March 15. The lord treasurer delivered a Message from the king, in hæc verba: "Whereas, upon a motion made by one of your lordships, the lord keeper did yesterday deliver a Message from his maj. That the earl of Arundel was restrained for a misdemeanor which was personal to his maj. and lay in the proper knowledge of his maj. and had no relation to matters of parliament: his maj. hath now commanded me to signify to your lordships, that he doth avow the Message in sort as it was delivered, to have been done punctually, according to his majesty's own direction; and he knoweth that he hath therein done justly, and not diminished the privileges of that house." And, because the committee appointed to search for precedents, &c. had not yet made any report to the house, therefore the decision of this business was suspended for that time.

April 5. The earl of Hertford made Report to the house, 'That the lords committees for privileges had met; and that the first question that arose among them was, Whether those proxies were of any validity which are deputed to any peer, who sitteth not himself in parliament? And it was conceived that those votes were lost: whereupon the committee found this house to be deprived of 5 suffrages by the absence of the earl of Arundel, unto whom they were intrusted: and the committee finding by the Journal-Book, that the sub-committee, which was appointed to search precedents for privileges concerning the commitment of a peer in the time of parliament, had not yet made report to the house: and then considering together their notes of precedents whereof they made search, found that no one peer had been committed, the parliament sitting, without trial of judgment of the peers in parliament; and that one only precedent of the bishop of Winchester, in the book-case, in the reign of Edw. 3. which was here urged, cannot be proved to be in parliament-time; and this the lords of the grand committee thought fit to offer to the consideration of the house."—Hereupon the house was moved to give power to the lords sub-committees for privileges, &c. to proceed in the search of precedents of the commitment of a peer of this realm during the time of parliament; and that the king's counsel might shew them such precedents as they have of the said commitment: and that the said sub-committee may make the report unto the house at the next access. All which was agreed unto, and these lords were called unto the said sub-committee, viz. the lord treasurer, lord president, d. of Buckingham, earls of Dorset, Devon, and Clare, visc. Wallingford, visc. Mansfield, and lord North; the king's counsel were also appointed to attend these lords.

April 28. The lord president reported the proceedings of the said sub-committees for privileges, &c. upon commitment of the earl of Arundel, viz. "That the king's counsel had searched and acquainted the lords sub-committees with all that they had found in records, chronicles and stories, concerning this matter: unto which the said lords sub-committees had given full answer, and also shewn such precedents as did maintain their own rights."—The precedents being read, it was resolved upon the question, by the whole house, nem. diss. That the privilege of this house is, That no lord of parliament, the parliament sitting, or within the usual time of privileges of parliament, is to be imprisoned or restrained without sentence or order of the house, unless it be for treason or felony, or refusing to give surety of the peace." And it was thereupon ordered, That the said lords sub-committees for privileges, &c. or any 5 of them, shall meet this afternoon, to consider of a Remonstrance and Petition of the peers concerning the claim of their privileges from arrests and imprisonments during the parliament: which was conceived by the lords sub-committees for privileges, according to the order of the house, and was read openly, viz.

"May it please your majesty: We the peers of this your realm, assembled in parliament,

* Mr. Rushworth tells us, 'It was conceived to be about the marriage of the lord Maltravers, the earl's eldest son, to the young duke of Lenox's sister, which was brought about by the contrivance of the countess of Arundel and the old dutchess of Lenox.'

finding the earl of Arundel absent from his place, that sometimes in this parl. sat amongst us, his presence was therefore called for: but thereupon a Message was delivered unto us, from your maj. by the lord keeper, that the earl of Arundel was restrained for a misdemeanor which was personal to your maj. and had no relation to matters of parliament. This Message occasioned us to inquire into the acts of our ancestors, and what in like cases they had done; that so we might not err in any dutiful respect to your maj. and yet preserve our right and privilege of parliament. And after diligent search both of all stories, statutes and records, that might inform us in this case, we find it to be an undoubted right and constant privilege of parliament, That no lord of parliament, the parliament sitting, or within the usual times of privilege of parliament, is to be imprisoned or restrained, without sentence or order of the house, unless it be for treason or felony, or for refusing to give surety for the peace. And to satisfy ourselves the better, we have heard all that could be alledged by your maj.'s counsel learned at law, that might any way weaken or infringe this claim of the peers; and to all that can be shewed or alledged, so full satisfaction hath been given, as that all the peers of parliament, upon the question made of this privilege, have, una voce, consented, That this is the undoubted right of the peers, and hath invariably been enjoyed by them. Therefore we, your maj.'s loyal subjects, and humble servants, the whole body of the peers now in parliament assembled, most humbly beseech your maj. that the earl of Arundel, a member of this body, may presently be admitted with your gracious favour to come, sit, and serve your maj. and the common-wealth in the great affairs of this parliament. And we shall pray, &c."

This Remonstrance and Petition to the king was approved by the whole house, who agreed, that it should be presented by the whole house to his maj.; and it was further agreed, that the lord president, the lord steward, the earl of Cambridge, and the lord great-chamberlain, should presently go to the king to know his majesty's pleasure when they shall attend him. These lords returning, the lord president reported, that his maj. had appointed the next day for the whole house to attend him with the said Remonstrance and Petition, in the chamber of presence at Whitehall. And it was agreed, That the lord keeper should then read the same to the king, and present it to his majesty.

April 20. The lord keeper reported the king's Answer accordingly, viz. "My lords, ye have spent some time in this business, and it being of some consequence, I should be thought rash if I should give a sudden Answer thereto; and therefore I will advise of it, and give you a full Answer in convenient time."

April 21. It was ordered that the house should be called over on the 24th, which was done accordingly; and the earl of Arundel's name being called, the lord keeper signified unto the house, that his maj. had taken into consideration the petition exhibited by their lordships on the 19th, concerning the earl, and will return an Answer thereunto with all expedition.

May 2. It was ordered that the lord keeper should move his maj. from the house, for a speedy and gracious Answer unto their Petition on the earl of Arundel's behalf: and on the 4th the lord keeper signified unto their lordships, that according to the said order, he had moved his maj. from the house on the behalf of the said earl, who answered, "That it is a cause wherein he hath had a great deal of care, and is willing to give their lordships satisfaction, and hath it in his consideration how to do it; and hath been interrupted by other business, wherein Mr. Attorney hath had occasion of much conference with him (as their lordships are acquainted): but will with all convenienty give their lordships satisfaction, and return them an Answer."

May 9. The house being again moved to petition the king touching the earl of Arundel, certain lords were appointed to set down the form of the said Petition; who reported the same in writing, viz. "May it please your majesty; Whereas the whole body of the peers now assembled in parliament, did, the 19th day of April, exhibit to your maj. an humble Remonstrance and Petition concerning the Privilege of the Peers in Parliament, and in particular touching the earl of Arundel; whereupon we received a gracious Answer, that in convenient time, we should receive a full Answer, which we have long and dutifully attended: and now at this time, so great a business being in handling in the house, we are pressed by that business, to be humble suitors to your maj. for a gracious and present Answer."—This being read, was approved of by the house, and the said committee appointed to present the same unto his maj. from the house, at such time as the lord chamberlain shall signify unto them, that his maj. is pleased to admit them to his presence.

May 11. The lord president reported the king's Answer to the said Petition, viz. "I did little look for such a message from the house; I have been of the house, and did never know such a message from the one house unto the other: therefore when I receive a message fit to come from you to your sovereign, you shall receive an Answer." The lord president further reported, That the lords committees appointed to deliver the Petition to the king, did thereupon withdraw, and require him humbly to desire his maj. to be pleased to let them know unto what point of the said petition he takes this exception; and that his maj. willed him to say this of himself, viz. "The exception the king taketh, is at the peremptoriness of the term, to have a present Answer; and the king wonders at their impatience, since he hath promised them an Answer in convenient time." Hereupon the house altered their former Petition, leaving out the word 'present,' and appointed the former committee humbly to deliver the same to his majesty.

May 13. The lord president reported the king's Answer to the Petition, viz. "It is true your word 'present,' was somewhat strange unto me, because you do not use it from one house to another; but now, that I know your meaning, you shall know this from me, that you shall have my Answer so soon as conveniently I can; and this I will assure you, it shall be such an Answer as you shall see I will not trench upon the privileges of your house."

May 17. Their lordships being moved to renew their humble Petition to the king in favour of the earl of Arundel, a Committee was accordingly appointed to draw up the same, which was as follows:—

"May it please your majesty; The cause that moves us now humbly to attend your maj. in our whole body, as at first we did, is because we observe that the house of commons have speedily received a member of theirs being committed.* We the peers being ambitious to deserve of your maj. and to appear to the eye of the world as much respected in our rights and privileges as any peers or commons have ever been, acknowledging you a king of as much goodness as ever king was; do now again humbly beseech that the earl of Arundel, a member of our house, may be restored to us; it so much concerning us in point of privilege, that we all suffer in what he suffers in this his restraint."—The above Petition was ordered to be presented at such time, as the lord chamberlain should signify his majesty's pleasure to admit their lordships to his presence.

May 19. The Lord Chamberlain signified to their lordships, that his maj. being acquainted therewith, is pleased that this house attend him at 2 this afternoon, at Whitehall. The next day the king returned this Answer:—"My lords; I see that in your Petition you acknowledge me a king of as much goodness as ever was; for which I thank you, and I will endeavour, by the grace of God, never to deserve other: but in this I observe you contradict yourselves; for if you believe me to be such as you say I am, you have no reason to mistrust the sincerity of my promises: for, whereas upon often petitions made by you unto me concerning this business, I have promised to give you a full Answer with 'all convenient speed: by thus again importuning of me, you seem to mistrust my former promises; but it may be said there is an emergent cause, for that I have delivered a member of the lower house. In this, my lords, by your favours, you are mistaken, for the causes do no way agree; for that he that was committed of the h. of commons, was committed for words spoken before both houses; which being such as I had just cause to commit him, yet, because I found they might be words only misplaced, and not ill meant, and were so conceived by many honest men, I was content, upon this interpretation, to release him, without any suit from the lower house; whereas my lord of Arundel's fault was directly against myself, having no relation to the parliament; yet because I see you are so impatient, I will make you a fuller Answer than yet I have done; not doubting but that you will rest contented therewith. It is true I committed him for a cause which most of you know; and, though it had been no more, I had reason to do it; yet, my lords, I assure you that I have things of far greater importance to lay to his charge, which you must excuse me for not telling you at this time, because it is not yet ripe, and it would much prejudice my service to do it. And this, by the word of a king, I do not speak out of a desire to delay you, but, as soon as it is possible, you shall know the cause, which is such as I know you will not judge to be any breach of your privilege; for, my lords, by this I do not mean to shew the power of a king by diminishing your privileges."

This Answer being read again, it was ordered, "That the committee for privileges should meet, and consider how to proceed farther, with dutiful respect to his maj.; and yet so as it may be for the preservation of the privileges of the peers of this land, and the liberties of the house of parliament."

May 24. The lord president reported the Petition agreed on by the lords committees for privileges, &c. in hæc verba:—"May it please your most excellent majesty; Whatever our care or desire is to preserve our right of peerage, yet it is far from our thoughts either to distrust, or press any thing that stands not with the affection and duty of most dutiful, loyal, and loving subjects: and therefore in all humility we cast ourselves before your maj. assuring ourselves in that sacred word of a king, that with all possible conveniency, your maj. will please either to restore the peer to his place in parliament, or express such a cause as may not infringe our privilege."—This Petition was generally approved, and ordered to be presented to his maj. by the whole house; and the earl of Carlisle and the lord Conway were sent to know the king's pleasure when they shall attend his maj. Who, being returned, reported, "That his maj. had appointed that afternoon for the same."

May 25. The lord keeper delivered the king's Answer as follows:—"My lords; Your often coming to me, about this business, made me somewhat doubt lest ye did mistrust me; but now since I see ye rely wholly on me, I assure ye it shall prevail more upon me than all importunities: and if ye had done this at first, I should have given ye content. And now I assure ye, I will use all possible speed to give ye satisfaction, and at the furthest before the end of this session of parliament."—This being read the 2nd time, the house was moved, "That all business might be laid aside, and that consideration might be had how their privileges may be preserved to posterity. And the house was put into a committee for the freer debate thereof, and afterwards resumed; and it was ordered, That the house be adjourned till to-morrow, and all business to cease.

* Sir Dudley Diggs. See p. 122.
Vol. II.

May 26. The lord keeper delivered this Message from the king, viz. "That his maj. hath willed him to signify unto their lordships, that he doth marvel his meaning in his last Answer should be mistaken: and for the better clearing of his intention, hath commanded him to signify unto their lordships his further Answer, which is, That their lordships last Petition was so acceptable to his maj. that his intent was then, and is still, to satisfy their lordships fully in what they then desired."—Hereupon it was ordered, That all business be adjourned till that day se'nnight. At the same time the duke of Buckingham signified unto their lordships his desire to have the king's counsel allowed him to plead his Cause: but the lords would not hear him, because they would entertain no business: and so the house was adjourned to the second of June.

June 2. The lord keeper delivered this Message from the king, viz. "His maj. hath commanded me to deliver unto your ldsps. a Message touching the earl of Arundel: that his maj. hath thought of that business, and hath advised of his great and pressing affairs, which are such as make him unwilling to enter into dispute of things doubtful: and therefore, to give you clear satisfaction touching that cause, whereby you may more cheerfully proceed in the business of the house, he hath endeavoured, as much as may be, to ripen it, but cannot yet effect it; but is resolved, that at the farthest, by Wednesday se'nnight, he will either declare the cause or admit him to the house. And addeth further, upon the word of a king; That if it shall be sooner ripe, which he hath good cause to expect, he will declare it at the soonest. And further, that if the occasion doth enforce to stay to the time prefixed, yet he doth not purpose to set such a short end to the parliament, but that there shall be an ample and good space between that and the end of the session, to dispatch affairs." This Message being delivered, the house was adjourned ad libitum, and put into a committee; and being resumed, it was agreed, That all business should cease, but this of the earl of Arundel's concerning the privileges of the house; and the house to meet thereon to-morrow morning, and to be put into a committee to consider thereof.

June 3. The lord keeper delivered this Message from the king, viz. "That in the matter concerning the earl of Arundel, his maj. hath been very careful and desirous, to avoid all jealousy of violating the privileges of this house; that he continueth still of the same mind, and doth much desire to find out some expedient, which may satisfy their lordships in point of privilege, and yet not hinder his maj.'s service in that particular. But, because this will require some time, his maj. though his great affairs are urgent and pressing, is unwilling to urge their lordships to go on therewith, till his maj. hath thought on the other: and therefore hath commanded him to signify his pleasure, That his maj. is contented their lordships adjourn the house till Thursday next; and in the mean time his maj. will take this particular business into further consideration." Hereupon the lords agreed, That the lord keeper do render unto his maj. from the house, their humble thanks for his gracious respect unto their privileges; and adjourned accordingly.

June 8. The lord keeper delivered this Message to the lords from his maj. viz.—"That on Saturday last his maj. sent word to the house, That by this day he would send them such an Answer concerning the earl of Arundel, as should satisfy them in point of privilege. And therefore to take away all dispute, and that that their privileges may be in the same estate as they were when the parliament began, his maj. hath taken off the restraint of the said act, whereby he hath liberty to come to the house. The earl of Arundel being returned to the house, did render his humble thanks unto his maj. for his gracious favour towards him; and gave their lordships also most hearty thanks for their often intercessions for him unto the king, and protested his loyalty and faithful service unto his maj.—Having thus fully related the proceedings of both houses, on this important point of privilege, the imprisonment or restraint of their members, we return to the affair of the earl of Bristol.

The Answer of the Lords to the King's Message concerning allowing Counsel to the Earl of Bristol.] May 15th. The lords took into consideration the king's Message, sent to them the 8th, about allowing the earl of Bristol counsel in his trial. And, upon some former orders of the house being read, it was agreed upon the question, That the lord keeper should deliver an humble Answer from their lordships to the king concerning the said Message, which was to this effect:—"Whereas his maj. hath lately sent to them a Message concerning the allowance of Counsel to the earl of Bristol, the lordships had with all duty advised of that business, and thereupon did humbly signify to his maj. that the allowance of counsel to the earl of Bristol was ordered before his maj.'s message to them. And that order, as they conceive, did not prejudice any fundamental law of the realm; for, the parliament of the 22nd of his maj.'s blessed father, a general order was made touching the allowance of counsel to delinquents questioned in parliament; at the voting whereof his maj. then prince, was present; and that order extended further than this late one for the earl of Bristol."

The King's Reply.] May 17. The lord keeper brought a reply from the king to the said Answer, viz.—"That his maj. had advised of, and as he considered that himself had recommended this cause to their honour and justice, although he knew that by the fundamental laws of the land, or custom and use of parliaments, counsel was not to be allowed to a person accused of high treason; yet, since he

maj. might at his own pleasure descend from his own right and prerogative; and that it may appear to all the world that his maj. in his gracious goodness, is pleased to allow the earl of Bristol all ways of defence, in a more ample measure than is due unto him by law; he is content, and doth hereby give full licence, that, in this particular case, the earl of Bristol may have counsel, both to advise him, and to speak and plead for him. But whereas their lordships message put his maj. in mind of a general order, made the 22nd of his blessed father's reign; he remembered that upon the occasion of the earl of Middlesex's cause, which was only criminal and not capital, an order was made in the house, which his maj. never, until now, conceived to extend unto causes capital; and he is well assured, that neither the judges were advised with in making that order, nor his late maj.'s learned counsel heard for him; therefore his maj. was not satisfied about that general order, nor that counsel should be allowed in cases capital, without his licence; and would advise further thereof, and then would send again to their lordships touching the general.—Upon the hearing of this answer from the king, the lords ordered that Mr. Serj. Hedley, Serj. Bramston, Serj. Crawley, and Mr. Anthony Low, should be allowed as Counsel, to speak and plead for the earl of Bristol.

Orders relating to the Duke of Buckingham's Trial.] The same day the duke of Buckingham moved the house, to know whether he should answer the whole Charge, exhibited by the Commons against him, or such parts thereof only as their lordships should appoint: also, whether he should answer the Aggravations of the commons, reported to this house? which he was desirous to do, that he might clear all matters therein.—Upon consideration of this, the lords ordered, "That those Aggravations should be delivered to the clerk, to be kept by him close from all except the members of this house; and no copies to be given to any but them. Likewise, That the duke of Buckingham should answer the engrossed Articles of the Charge sent up by the commons, but not the Aggravations; unless, upon perusal thereof, he should find any thing fit to be answered, or that the house think proper for that purpose, and, for expedition's sake, the duke to have the use of the original Aggravations."

The E. of Bristol brought to the Bar; where he delivered his Answer to the Articles against him.] May 19. The earl of Bristol was brought again to the bar of the lords; when the duke of Buckingham desired that he might leave to retire, lest his presence should give some distaste to the earl; and he withdrew himself accordingly. Then the lord keeper told the earl, That their lordships did expect his Answer unto Mr. Attorney's Charge (see p. 80.) Upon which he said, "That he had brought his Answer, but desired they would excuse the length thereof; and, as to the Charge, he said, he did not see any direct treason in it, that was laid to his charge; only two points came near it by circumstances, viz. That he is ill-affected to our religion, and well-affected to Spain. For clearing of which he made a large remonstrance of zeal to the true religion, here established, even from his youth to this day; and of his constant and faithful services to the present king, his father of blessed memory, and to the state."—Then he delivered in his Answer, written on paper, but desired that it might be engrossed on parchment, which he said had been done but for want of time. He also desired that no advantage might be taken of any illegal form thereof; and further, that his own counsel might read his Answer, which the house was pleased to allow of; the earl sitting by on a stool all the while, and explaining or enforcing any part thereof.

"The ANSWER of JOHN EARL of BRISTOL to the ARTICLES of several HIGH TREASONS, and other great and enormous Crimes, Offences, and Contempts, supposed to be committed by him against our late sovereign lord king James of blessed memory, deceased; and our sovereign lord the king's maj. that now is; wherewith the said Earl is charged by his maj.'s Attorney General, on his maj.'s behalf, in the most high and honourable Court of Parliament, before the king and the lords there."

"The said earl not acknowledging any of the supposed treasons, crimes, offences, or contempts, wherewith he is charged in and by the said Articles, to be true; and saving to himself all advantage and benefit of exception, to the uncertainty and insufficiency of the said Articles, and several Charges in them contained: and humbly praying that his cause may not suffer for want of legal form, wherunto he hath not been inured; but may be adjudged according to such real and effectual grounds and proofs, as may be expected from an ambassador, the ground of the charge growing thence: and that he may have leave to explain himself and his own meaning, in any thing that may seem to admit of a doubtful construction, for Answer saith as followeth:

I. To the First Article he saith, "That he did not advance or further the design of the king of Spain against our late sovereign lord the king, his children, friends, and allies; or traiterously, falsely, wilfully, or as a traitor to our late sovereign lord the king, by any letters, or other messages, sent in the years 1621, 2, 3, or at any other time, inform, advise, or assure the said late king, that the emperor and king of Spain, or either of them, would really, fully, or effectually make restitution, or plenary restoration, to the count Palatine and his children, of the dominions, territories, and possessions of the said count or of the electoral dignity; or that the king of Spain did really, fully, or effectually intend the Marriage between the lady his sister, and the prince our said sovereign lord, according to the articles formerly propounded between the said two kings, as by the said Articles is alleged; neither does or did he, the said earl, know that the emperor and king of Spain, or either of them, never really intended such restitution or restoration as aforesaid, or that the king of Spain never really intended the said Marriage, as by the said Article is alleged; nor doth he the said earl know that the emperor or king of Spain, or either of them, intended by the said Treaties, in the Article mentioned, to give time for compassing their own ends or purposes, to the detriment of this kingdom, as by the said Articles is also alleged; neither was the said late king James made secure upon any such false assurances given unto him by the said earl, or thereby lost the opportunity of time; nor were the dominions, territories, and possessions of the count Palatine, or the electoral dignity, thereby lost, or any part thereof taken out of the possession of the said king James; nor the said count Palatine, the lady Elizabeth his wife, or their children, dispossessed, disinherited, or bereaved thereof, or of any part thereof, by any act or default of him the said earl; nor did, nor was he, the said earl, the cause of any thing to the dishonour of our said late sovereign lord king James, or to the dishonour of the said late king's children, or their posterity; to the disanimating or discouraging of any of the rest of the princes of Germany, nor any other kings or princes in amity and league with his said late maj.; nor did any thing in or concerning the same contrary to his duty and allegiance, or contrary to the trust and duty of an ambassador, or falsely, wilfully, or traitorously, or as a traitor to our said sovereign lord the king, in any such sort, or by any such means, ways, or inducements, as by the said Article is supposed, or by any other ways or means whatsoever: but the said earl dealt therein, and in all his said trusts as an ambassador, carefully, faithfully, and honestly, and as became a faithful and loyal subject, servant, counsellor, and ambassador. And for a clear demonstration of the truth and manner of his proceedings, touching the matter contained in the said Article, the same consisting of several parts, viz. the loss of the said Palatinate, and the Match with the said lady of Spain, and of his several employments; as of one extraordinary Ambassage to the emperor, of another to the king of Spain, in the years 1621, 2, and 3, aforesaid, he humbly craveth leave of this most high and honourable court to separate the business, and to distinguish the times."

"And, beginning with the Palatinate first, to give an Account of his Ambassage to the Emperor; and so to make as brief a deduction as he can of his whole carriage in that business, from the beginning of his employment to the time he left it. In this ambassage to the emperor he propounded all things faithfully according to his instructions; and the answers which he returned to his late maj. were the very same, and none other, than such as were given him by the emperor, under his hand and the imperial seal; the which, according to his duty, he faithfully sent unto his said maj.; and withal, did honestly, faithfully, and truly advertise his said maj. what he understood and thought then upon the place: but was so far from giving unto his said maj. any ill-grounded hopes in that behalf, that he wrote unto the lords of the council, here in England, from Vienna, the 26th of July, 1621, in sort as followeth, viz. "I am further to move your lordships, that there may be a dispatch made presently into Spain, to his maj.'s ambassador and Mr. Cottington, that they there deal effectually for the preparing and ripening of the business against my coming; and that they use some plain and direct language, letting the ministers there know, that the late letter sent by the king of Spain to the emperor, was colder and more reserved than his maj. had reason to expect. I shall conclude with telling your lordships, that tho' I despair not of good success in this knotty business, yet I hope his maj. and your lordships lay not aside the care of all fitting preparations for a war, in case a peace cannot honourably be had; and amongst other things, I most earnestly recommend unto your lds. and, by your lordships, unto his maj. the continuing abroad, yet for some small time, of sir Rob. Mansel's fleet upon the coasts of Spain; which, in case his maj. should be ill-used, will prove the best argument he can use for the restitution of the Palatinate."—And the said earl further saith, That this his advice was really seconded by his actions, by being the cause, as he returned homeward out of Germany, of the bringing down of the count Mansfelt, whereby the town of Frankendale was relieved, and, by supplying of his maj.'s army, then in great distress, with money and plate, to the value of 10,000*l.* merely out of his zeal and affection to the good of the king and his children, having no order or warrant for the doing of it; but might easily have excused it, either thro' want of order, or want of means; but that his heart was ever really bent in effects more than shews, to serve the king's son-in-law and his cause, as by the discourse of this business will appear. And how acceptable these services then were, will appear by the Letters of the Queen of Bohemia, dated in Oct. 1621, in these words following:—"My lord; Having understood from Heidelberg, how you have shewn your affection to the king and me in all things, and in the help of money you have lent our soldiers, I cannot let such an obligation pass without giving you many thanks for it by these lines, since I have no other means to shew my gratefulness unto you; howsoever, assure yourself, that I shall never be forgetful of the testimonies you give me of your love, which I entreat you to continue, in doing the king and me all the good offices you can to his maj. you have been an eye-witness of the miserable estate our countries are in: I intreat you therefore to solicit his maj. for our help. You have given me assurance of your affection, I intreat you now to shew it by helping us, in your good endeavours to his maj."

and you shall ever bind me to continue, as I am already, your very affectionate friend,

‘ELIZABETH.’

“The earl likewise received several other letters, about the same time, both from the king of Bohemia and council of Heidelberg, to the same effect. And how much satisfaction his late maj. received in that behalf, and touching that business, will several ways appear, and particularly by his speech to the parliament. And the said earl likewise appealeth to both houses of parliament, to whom, by his late majesty's order, he gave a just and true Account of that employment; with what true zeal he proceeded, and how he pressed that single treaties and promises might no longer be relied on, but that a fitting preparation for a war might go, hand in hand, with any treaty of accommodation; and, for a conclusive testimony of his late majesty's approbation of his carriage in this employment, he humbly desired that a letter of the duke of Buckingham's, under his own hand, bearing date the 11th of Oct. 1621, may be read: viz.—“My lord, I am exceeding glad your ldp. hath carried yourself so well in this employment, that his maj. is not only infinitely pleased for the service you have done, for which he commanded me to give your ldp. thanks in his name, until he see you himself; but that you have given all men cause to commend his majesty's choice of such a man, that, unless your heart had gone with the business, could never have brought it to so good a pass. Amongst other things his maj. liketh very well the care of clearing his honour, whereof he will advise further with your ldp. at your coming over. I hope you will not find your negotiation with the Infanta of such difficulty as you seem to fear in your letter, seeing my brother Edward hath brought with him a letter from his majesty's son-in-law, whereby he putteth himself wholly to his majesty's advice and pleasure for his submission. And as for the money your ldp. hath so very reasonably laid out, his maj. will see you shall sustain no loss; holding it very unreasonable you should suffer any thing by the care of his service, which you have shewed so much to his contentment, and the great joy of your lordship's faithful servant, G. BUCKINGHAM.”

“Having given this Account of his Employment with the Emperor, he humbly craveth leave to make it known in what sort, before this his employment, he endeavoured to serve the prince Palatine and his cause; which will best appear by his majesty's own testimony, upon the going of sir Fran. Nethersale to the prince Palatine; at which time his maj. being, out of his royal and just heart, desirous to do his faithful servant right, commanded sir F. Nethersale to let the prince Palatine understand how good a servant the said earl had been unto him, and how active in his affairs; and will best appear by a dispatch of sir F. Nethersale, written all in his own hand, to sir Geo. Calvert, in answer to what was commanded him, dated at Prague 11th Aug. 1622, and sent by his late maj. to the said earl for his comfort, being as followeth:—“Right Hon. ‘That you may the better be assured, that I have neither forgotten nor neglected the commandment received from his maj. by your honour, you will be pleased to have the patience to hear me report what I said to the king upon delivery of my lord Digby's letters to his maj. which was, that the king my master, whose justice is so much renowned over the world, did use to shew it in nothing more than in vindicating his servants from wrongful opinions, whereof he knew noble hearts were more sensible than of injuries done to their persons or fortunes; that, out of his royal disposition, his maj. having found my lord Digby mistaken by some of his people at home, by occasion of his being by him employed in the affairs with Spain; and having thereupon conceived a jealousy that the said noble lord might also be misreported hither to the prince Palatine, had, in that respect, given me a particular commandment to assure the prince, that his highness had not a more truly affectionate servant in England; and, for proof thereof, to let the prince understand, that whereas the baron Donagh, now his highness's ambassador in England, had, since his coming thither, obtained but three great points for his master's service, to wit, the Loan of Money from the king of Denmark, the Contributions in England of the city and country, and the sending of Ambassadors to the contrary party: that the lord Digby had been the first propounder of all those to the king my master, before his highness's ambassador, or any other of his servants in England; although his ldp. had been contented, that others who were but set on should carry away the thanks and prize; because his ldp. being known to be the first mover therein, might possibly weaken the credit he hath in Spain, and so render him the more unable to serve both his own master and the prince; in which respect I humbly prayed his highness also to keep this to himself.”—By which testimony it may appear, as the said earl conceiveth, how he the said earl behaved himself before his said ambassador and in his said ambassador, with his said late majesty's approbation thereof.—Now he most humbly craveth leave to give your lordships an Account how he proceeded after his Return from the emperor's court: as soon as he came into England, he discovered to his maj. and the lords of his council, in what great want he had left the forces in the Palatinate, and solicited the present sending away of money; and thereupon 30,000*l.* was borrowed of sir Peter Vanlore, sir Baptist Kirks, and sir Wm. Cockaine, and presently sent into the Palatinate, besides the 10,000*l.* which he had lent, for which he paid the interest out of his own purse 6 months; having also given, not long before, 500*l.* by way of Benevolence, to the service of the said Palatinate. Now, in the interim betwixt his return from the emperor, which was in Nov. 1621, and his going into Spain, in May, 1622, he first gave an Account, as is aforesaid, of his embassy, to both the houses of parliament; and moved them to be as effectual as was possible for the supplying of his maj. and that the money might be wholly employed for the succour of the Palatinate. The parliament being dissolved, he solicited, with great care and industry, the settling of some course for the supplying of the Palatinate; and his maj. was persuaded to maintain 8000 foot and 1600 horse under his own standard, and in his pay, in the Palatinate, and to establish a certain course for the due payment of the said army: and the lord Chichester was upon his, the said earl's motion, sent for out of Ireland; and he, the said earl, by his majesty's commandment, took care of his dispatch. In this estate the said earl left this affair at his departure towards Spain, in 1622, nothing doubting but all things would have effectually and constantly been pursued, according to the order which was settled and resolved on at his departure. On his arrival at the court of Spain, he presently proceeded according to his instructions, pressing the business of the Palatinate as effectually as could be, and faithfully laboured, and effected from time to time, (as far as the point of Negotiation) all the particulars that were given him in charge; as will appear by his late majesty's letters upon every particular occasion. And, if by accident, such as the marquis of Baden, count Mansfelt, and the duke of Brunswick's receiving each of them an overthrow that summer; or by neglect, or ill-ordering the affairs there, (whereof his late maj. so far complained to his son-in-law, as to give order for the withdrawing of his forces, as will appear by his majesty's letters of the 3d of June, 1622, as also by his letter to sir Horace Vere and the lord Chichester, if there were not a speedy redress) those businesses have miscarried, the earl hopeth he shall not be liable to the blame, it having no relation to him or his employment; having so far, and so honestly, with his best affections, employed his care and utmost service in the business: and his maj. was pleased, by many several letters, upon several occasions, to signify his gracious acceptance of his service, as in his letter of the 24th of Nov. 1622, from Newmarket, writing as followeth, viz. "Your dispatches are in all points so full, and in them we receive so good satisfaction, as in this we shall not need to enlarge any further, but only to tell you we are well pleased with the diligent and discreet employing of your endeavours in all that concerneth our service; so are we likewise with the whole proceedings of our ambassador, sir Walter Aston. Thus we bid you heartily farewell."—And afterwards his maj. was likewise pleased, in his letter of the 7th of Jan. 1622, a little before our gracious sovereign lord the king, then prince, his coming into Spain, to write as followeth, viz. "Concerning that other unfortunate knotty affair of the Palatinate, to say the truth, as things stand, I know not what you could have done more than you have done already."—And whereas it is objected, that the Palatinate should be lost by the hopes he, the said earl, gave by his letters out of Spain, it is an objection of impossibility; for there was nothing left but Manheim and Frankendale, when his first letters, out of Spain, could possibly come to his late majesty's hands; for he did not begin there to negotiate in that business until August, 1622; and about that time Heidelberg, and all but Manheim and Frankendale was lost; and Manheim he had saved by his industry, had it not been so suddenly delivered, as is by his maj. acknowledged, by his letter of the 24th Nov. 1622, writing thus, viz. "And howsoever the order given to the Infanta, for the relief of Manheim, came too late, and after the town was yielded into the hands of Tilly; yet must we acknowledge it to be a good effect of your negotiation, and an argument of that king's sincere and sound intention."—And Frankendale being by the said earl's means once saved, was again the second time saved merely by his the said earl's industry, in procuring a letter from the king of Spain, dated the 11th of Feb. 1623, whereupon followed the Treaty of Sequestration, which hath since continued: and he the said earl was so far from hindering succours, by any letter or counsel of his, that he was the solicitor, and, in great part, the procurer of most of the succours that had been sent thither, as is formerly set down: and when his royal maj. that now is, arrived at the court of Spain with the duke of Buckingham, they found the said business of the Palatinate in so fair a way, that the Spanish ministers told them the king should give his late maj. a blank in that business to frame his own conditions, as appeareth by his late majesty's letter of the 8th Oct. 1623, as followeth, viz.

"Our son did write to us out of Spain, that that king would give us a blank in which we might frame our own conditions, and the same he confirmeth to us now."—And the like touching the blank was also acknowledged by the duke of Buckingham, in his speech in parliament, after the return of his majesty out of Spain. It will appear by the testimony of sir Walter Aston, and by his and the earl's dispatches, that the said earl wanted not industry and zeal in this business; insomuch that the last answer the earl procured therein from the king of Spain, was fuller than he, the said earl, was ordered by his late majesty's latest letters to insist upon; so as by that which hath been alleged, the said earl hopeth your lordships will be satisfied, not only that he wanted neither will nor industry; but that he hath, with all true zeal and affection, and with his own means, faithfully served their majesties and the prince Palatine in this cause. And forasmuch as, in that affair, he had all the assurances that could be betwixt Christian princes; if therein there hath been any deceit (as by the said Article is intimated), which he never knew nor believed, he referreth it to

God to punish their wickedness; for, betwixt princes, there can be no greater tie than their words, oaths, hands, and seals; all which he procured in that behalf: and both he, the said earl, and sir Walter Aston, were so confident that the business would be ended to his late maj.'s satisfaction, that, in a joint dispatch to his said late maj. of the 23rd of Nov. 1623, after his now majesty's return into England, they wrote as follows:—"We hope that your maj. may, according to your desire, signified to me the earl of Bristol, by the letter of the 8th Oct. give to your majesty's royal daughter, this Christmas, the comfortable news of the near expiring of her great troubles and sufferings; as also unto the prince, your son, the congratulation of being married to a most excellent princess."

"Having thus given your lordships an Account of his proceedings touching the Palatinate, he will, by your lordships good favour, proceed to the other part of the charge concerning the Marriage. And, first, touching the hopes and assurances, that he is charged to have given to his late maj. and ministers of state here in England, of the Spaniards real proceedings in the said Match, when it is said he knew they never meant it; he saith, He never gave any hopes of their real proceeding, but such and the very same that were first given unto him, without adding or diminishing; neither could he have done otherwise with honesty or safety. And he further saith, That the hopes he gave were not upon slight and vain intelligence, but, as well in that of the Match, as the other of the Palatinate, his advertisements were grounded upon all the assurances, both upon word and writing, that could pass betwixt Christians; as will be made evidently appear by his dispatch of the 9th Sept. 1623; which he humbly desireth may be read, if the length of it may not displease: the substance of it being to shew by all the engagements and promises of the king of Spain, that he really intended the Match; and the cause why the conde D'Olivares pretended to the duke of Buckingham, that the Match was not formerly meant, was only thereby to free himself from the treating any longer with the said earl, to the end he might treat for larger conditions, in point of religion, with the said duke; the said conde D'Olivares taking advantage of having the person of his maj. then prince, in their hands: and with this dispatch the said earl acquainted his maj. that now is, then in Spain, before he sent it. And his maj. upon the reading of it, was pleased to say, That the earl had proceeded with so much caution and care, that, in case the Spaniards should be false, he might be sure to shame them for their falshood. By this dispatch the said earl doubteth not but it will appear to this most hon. court, That whilst the treating of that business was in his hands, he proceeded in it, not only with care and industry, but with some measure of vigilancy.—For the clearing of an objection that hath been alleged, viz. That the Match was never meant before the duke's going into Spain, nor after; the earl craveth leave to set down some few reasons, of many, which caused him to believe that the said Match had been really meant; and that it was so conceived, by both their majesties and the king of Spain, and their chief ministers on both sides, for the following reasons: 1. The duke of Buckingham certified to his late maj. That the business of the Marriage was brought to a happy conclusion; whereupon his late maj. was pleased to give order to the said duke and earl to proceed in other business, which his said late maj. would not have treated until the Marriage was concluded; as will appear by a letter of his late maj. jointly to the d. of Buckingham, and the said earl, of the 23d July, 1623. 2. It will appear, by letters of the lord Conway to the d. of Buckingham, bearing date 3rd and 4th Sept. 1623, that the said duke had good assurance of the conclusion of the said Match; and, upon this confidence, all things were put in due execution in England, as had been capitulated; and the lord Conway, and others, fully settled and agreed all the points of immunity and liberty for the Roman Catholics for the use of their religion, as was set down in the Declaration of the 9th Aug. 1623, hereafter mentioned in the Answer to the 5th Article of this Charge. 3. The very day that his now maj. and the d. of Buckingham departed from the Escorial, in Spain, towards England, the said duke solemnly swore to the Treaty of the said Marriage, and the furthering of it all that should be in his power, upon the Holy Evangelists, in the presence of the said earl and sir Walter Aston. 4. The Treaty of Marriage had formerly been signed, sealed, and solemnly sworn to by the king of Spain; and when his maj. and that king took their leaves, the king of Spain did solemnly protest, on the word of a king, faithfully and punctually to perform all that had been capitulated in the Treaty of the Marriage; and hereupon embraced his maj. at his departure: and the very next day sent a letter unto his maj. all written with his own hand, and protesting to make good all that he had capitulated or promised to his maj. at his departure the day before; so that if there were no true meaning on the part of Spain to make the Marriage, as by Mr. Attorney is pretended, yet certainly the said earl hath not been slightly deceived: neither can it be, as he conceiveth, any fault in him; since not only his late maj. but his maj. that now is, and the d. of Buckingham, being then both upon the place, did confidently believe, (and that upon other grounds than the informations, suggestions, or persuasions of the said earl) that the Marriage was really intended; and to that effect, both his late maj. and his maj. that now is, after his return into England, wrote unto him, the said earl, several letters, assuring him that their intents and pleasures were to have the said Match proceeded in: and thereupon the powers of his maj. then prince, were again renewed, and sent unto the said earl; so that the said earl having so many and so great causes to be assured that the Match was really intended on both sides, he conceiveth it will be hard for Mr. Attorney to make good that part of his Charge, wherein he affirmeth, That the earl should know the contrary, or give assurances upon false grounds, as in the said Article is alleged."

II. To the Second Article the said earl saith; "That he did not falsely, wilfully, or traitorously, or contrary to his allegiance, or the trust or duty of an ambassador, continue the Treaties upon Generalities, without effectual pressing the king of Spain unto particular conclusions, according to his late maj.'s instructions or directions; nor intended to have continued the said Treaties upon generalities, without reducing them to certainties or direct conclusions; nor did therein any thing to the dishonour of his said late maj. or to the danger or detriment of his maj.'s person, his crown or dominions, or of his confederates or allies, as by the said Article is alleged; but directly denieth all the supposed offences wherewith he standeth charged by the said Article: and, for a clear declaration and manifestation of the truth and manner of his proceedings, that it may appear to this high and most honourable court, how far he hath been from offending in that kind, nor continuing the said Treaties one day longer than necessity enforced, but rather pressing beyond than coming any way short of his instructions and directions: he farther saith, first, as to the continuing of the Treaties upon generalities, that the temporal articles were, by agreement on both sides, not to be treated or settled, until such time as the articles of religion were fully agreed; for that it was held most proper and honourable for both sides, first to see if the difficulties of religion might be reconciled before they passed into further engagements; and the said articles of religion, by reason of the pope's new demands sent into England by Mr. Gage, were not signed nor condescended unto by his late maj. nor his maj. that now is, then prince, until the 5th Jan. 1622, and then were sent away post out of England to the said earl by Mr. Simon Digby, who arrived with them at Madrid in Spain, about the 26th of the same month: but the earl's care was such to have no time lost in the settling the temporal articles, that before he would condescend (so much as de bene esse) unto the articles of religion that they should be sent back again unto Rome, he procured the king of Spain to promise that within the time limited for the procuring of the dispensation (which was by March or April following at the farthest) all the temporal articles should be settled and agreed; to the end the Infanta might be delivered at the spring, as, by the king of Spain's answer in writing, was declared to be that king's intencion; and accordingly sir W. Aston and the said earl did, not in general, but most industriously, labour to settle all particular articles, (as they did most of them),

viz. That the portion should be two millions, it appearing that it was so agreed by the late king of Spain, the present king's father; that, the dispensation coming, the desponsories should be within 40 days after, and the Infanta's departure from Madrid should be within 20 days after that: and that don Duarte de Portugal should be the man that should attend the Infanta in the journey: and all other particulars necessary for the conclusion of the said Treaty, were by sir W. Aston, the said earl, and the Spanish commissioners, drawn up into heads in writing; and after many debates they were consulted with that king, and the 2nd of March, 1622, O. S. the conde de Gondomar and the secretary don Andreas de Prada, were appointed to come home to the house of the said earl, to signify unto sir W. Aston and himself, (as they did) that the king of Spain had declared his resolution in all the particulars, and given them order to come to a speedy conclusion with them of all things: and that king's answer to that conclusion the earl saw and read, all written with the said king of Spain's own hand.—On the 7th of the same month of March, the king's maj. then prince, and the duke of Buckingham, arrived at Madrid, and then the Spaniards took new hopes, and the negotiation was put into a new form; so that where it is objected against the earl, that he entertained and continued the Treaty so long upon Generalities, he conceiveth it is not meant of the spiritual articles, for they were such as were sent from Rome to England, and from thence they came to the earl; and for the temporal articles, they not being to be settled or treated till the articles of religion were concluded, he conceiveth it cannot be alleged with any colour, that in them his maj. was entertained with generalities; since from the time that the said articles of religion were brought unto the said earl by Mr. Simon Digby, being about the 25th of Jan. there were but 6 weeks until the 7th of March following, when his maj. then prince arrived in Spain; and in the interim all the above specified particulars were settled: and the time that hath been spent in this Treaty hath not been through his the said earl's default, in continuing upon generalities, without pressing to particulars, but hath been caused as well by difficulties which the business brought with it, as also by exterior accidents, viz. the wars of Bohemia the death of two popes, and of the late king of Spain, without the least fault of the said earl: as is acknowledged by his late maj. in the said earl's instructions of the 14th March, 1621; neither could any delay therein be attributed unto him the said earl, for he was employed in those times into Flanders and Germany; and sir W. Aston and sir F. Cottington, for the space of 3 or 4 years, were resident in Spain; from whence the hopes they gave were upon all the discreet grounds that ministers can expect from a state: but the earl resumed this business only 6 months before his maj.'s coming into Spain; and he was so desirous to see his maj. then prince, bestowed, that he pressed a thing so much, both to the king and the prince, as that the prince might lose no more time, and rather break the Match with Spain, than suffer any further delays, as will appear by the dispatches from his first arrival at the court of Spain, until his maj. then prince, his coming; for in his letters of the 20th June, 1622, being the first he wrote after his first audience, he was so desirous that no time might be lost, that in them he craveth leave of his then maj. that in case he should find any delays in Spain, he might (without expecting any new order) take his leave and come home. And upon the return of sir F. Cottington in Sept. following, he wrote both to the king and his maj. then prince, viz. to the king as followeth: 'I shall presume to add to that which Mr. Cottington shall deliver unto your maj. by word of mouth, of the present state of the Match, what I conceive to be the right way to bring it to a speedy issue; that your maj. will be pleased positively to declare what will do in point of religion, and that you will appoint me a certain limited time, by which this king shall procure the dispensation, or conclude the Match without it; that in case there should be any further delay therein, then, I may declare your maj. disengaged, and free to bestow the prince in such sort as you shall judge most convenient.' And to the prince at the same time he wrote in the subsequent words, viz. 'That which will be necessary for his maj. presently to do on his maj.'s part, is to declare himself how far he will be pleased to extend in point of religion, in such form as Mr. Cottington will propound unto your highness; and that he set me a prefixed limited time to break or conclude the Match, either with the dispensation or without it; and for the rest it may be left to my negotiation; but your highness may be pleased to hasten this his maj.'s resolution with all possible speed.' And the said earl saith: That having received from his said late maj. the resolution in point of religion, and a limited time, according to his desire; he was so precise and punctual therein, that although the making or breaking of the Marriage depended upon it, he would not give one month's longer time, for the procuring of the dispensation, until he had first acquainted his said late maj. therewith, and received his directions under his own hand; as will appear by his said majesty's letters of the 25th Oct. 1622, as followeth:—"Right trusty and well beloved cousin and counsellor, we greet you heartily well. Whereas by your last letters written to our secretary, dated 29th Sept. you are desirous to have our pleasure signified unto you under our own hand, whether we will be contented or not to have a month's longer time for the coming of the dispensation from Rome, than we have already limited unto you, in case they shall there conclude all things else to our contentment, with a resolution to send the Infanta hither next spring; we do hereby declare unto you, that in such case you shall not break with them for a month's longer delay;

we also wish you not to trouble yourself with the rash censure of other men, in case your business should not succeed, resting in that full assurance of our justice and wisdom, that we will never judge a good and faithful servant by the effect of things so contingent and variable; and with this assurance we bid you heartily farewell."—And he further said, That when his maj. had agreed unto the Articles of Religion, and that a settled time was appointed for the coming of the dispensation and a conclusion of the Match, although he would bind himself to nothing without his maj.'s approbation, yet, for that no time might be lost, he agreed to the propositions, de bene esse, sent by Mr. Porter on the 10th Dec. 1622; to the end the Articles might be sent immediately to Rome, without losing so much time as to hear first from England, and humbly moved, that in case his maj. should approve of the said Articles, he would send his approbation directly to Rome, for the gaining of time, which his maj. was pleased to do: and at that time he wrote both to his said late maj. and his now maj. then prince, viz. to his maj. as followeth: 'This is the true state of the business as it now standeth; if your maj. approve of what is done, I hope it will have a happy and short conclusion; if your maj. think it not fit to allow of these articles, I have done the utmost of my endeavours, and shall humbly persuade your maj. not to lose a day longer in the Treaty; so much it importeth your maj. and your kingdoms that the prince were bestowed.'—And to the prince, in letters of the like date, in this sort: 'I presume now to write unto his maj. that which I think my duty to say likewise unto your highness; That in case you should not approve of what is now conditionally agreed, you permit not a day more to be lost in this Treaty; for it is of so great consequence that your highness were bestowed, that it importeth almost as much that you were speedily, as willingly, married; but I hope that his maj. and your highness, will in such sort approve of this last agreement, as you will speedily bring this long Treaty to a happy conclusion. I am out of hope of bringing things to any better terms, and therefore I deal clearly with your highness; and do not only most humbly persuade, but, on my knees, beg it of you, that you either resolve to conclude this Match as you may, or speedily to break it off, and bestow yourself elsewhere; for no less than the happiness of your kingdoms, and the security of the king your father and yourself, depend upon it.'—All which things being considered, the earl most humbly submitteth himself to the judgment of this most high and hon. court, whether those delays, which several accidents have brought forth in this business, can be attributed to his fault; since, on the one side, he hopeth it will evidently appear unto your lordships, That he ever moved his maj. and the prince to admit of no delays, but rather to think of some other course; and, on the other side, it will appear by all his dispatches, that he pressed things with the ministers of Spain to as speedy a conclusion, as the utmost terms of fair negotiation and good manners would bear. And whereas it is pretended that the Spaniards should take occasion, by entertaining the said Treaties, to abuse his late maj. (which he knoweth not) yet he saith, That he used all the industry and vigilancy that a careful minister could do, and got from the Spaniards all the assurances, by oaths, words, and writings, which could be expected from Christians, the which he faithfully, without adding or diminishing, represented unto his said maj.; and his said maj. in those times, was pleased to conceive upon those assurances, that they dealt really with him: and he conceiveth that his maj. that now is, then prince, and the d. of Buckingham, were pleased to write as much to the late king's maj. at their first coming into Spain; and that all which the said earl had written touching that employment, was there avowed by the conde D'Olivares, and conde de Gondomar, to the said prince and duke, at their arrival at Madrid; and he hopeth that, when his dispatches are perused, it will appear and be adjudged, That he served his maj. with some measure of vigilancy, as well as fulness of fidelity."

"III. To the Third Article the said earl saith; That he did not, either by word or letters to his late maj. or his ministers, extol or magnify the greatness or power of the king of Spain; nor represented to his late maj. the supposed dangers, that would ensue unto him if a war should happen between him and the said king of Spain; nor affirmed, nor insinuated, as in the said Article is mentioned, to any such intent as by the said Article is alleged. But if he did at any time speak or write of the power or greatness of the king of Spain, or represented any dangers to his late maj. that might ensue, by entering into hostility with the said king, it was as a faithful counsellor and servant to his master, by way of advice and opinion, which he ever delivered sincerely, faithfully and truly, according to the present occasion; and in no wise to any such intents as in the said Article is mentioned, nor to any other evil intent or purpose whatsoever. But he hath been so far from dissuading his late maj. to take arms, that he hath upon all just occasions advised, that all fitting preparations for war might be made, as (beginning with the year 1621, from which time he is only charged,) will appear by his speech in parliament presently upon his return out of Germany, 'That he hoped his maj. would rely no longer upon single treaties, but make all fitting preparations for a war, and that the parliament would enable his maj. thereunto:' and by the care he took before his going again upon his ambassage into Spain, that the establishment of an army, under his maj.'s own standard, of horse and foot, and in his own pay, might be fully settled and provided for, as likewise his advice to the lords of the council, that his maj. might have a curb upon the king of Spain upon all occasions, by continuing of sir Rob. Maunsel's fleet upon the coasts of Spain, as will appear by his letter written from Vienna, 26th July, 1621, mentioned in the Answer to the first Article: by all which it will appear that he laboured and endeavoured, as much as in him lay, that his maj. might be well prepared for any occasion of war which should happen; and he no way remembereth to have discouraged, or to have spoken or written any thing that might have been understood to have tended to the discouraging his said late maj. from the taking of arms, or entering into hostility against Spain; or from assisting of him or his forces from attempting the invasion of his said late maj.'s dominions or the dominions of his late maj.'s confederate friends, or allies, as by the said Article is charged against him; nor remembereth that he had any cause so to do: but if he hath in any kind spoken or written of Spain, or the power of it, it may have been to his late maj. or to his maj. that now is, by way of discouraging speaking of the solidness of the Spanish proceedings, of their serious and deliberate dealing of business before they resolved on the same, and of their constant pursuing of them when they were once resolved; wishing that England and other nations would therein imitate him, for that he supposed the right way to improve the Spanish greatness, was to grow as wise as they, and to beat them at their own weapons; but, otherwise, he is confident he hath not been heard to speak, or write, any thing that might give any terror or discouragement to his late maj. or his chief ministers; knowing that England need but little fear the power of Spain, having almost in all attempts and enterprises won honour upon them. And as for his representing the dangers that might ensue upon war, though he knoweth not what is aimed in that particular, yet he is most confident of the integrity of his own conscience, that he hath neither said or advised any thing but what befitted a faithful counsellor and an ambassador; which was truly to deliver his opinion, as he understood it upon the present occasion; and as for the affirming that his maj.'s counsel should be disturbed, and he not permitted to hawk or hunt, he remembereth not what course he may have had or written to any person how fit it might be, upon the being embroiled in so great a war, seriously to attend and make it our whole work: but as he is confident it will appear, that what discourse or counsel it may have been, it wanted not the true affection which he hath ever borne to his king's service: so he hopeth it will be far from not to want that due respect and reverence to his part, which he ought to shew to so great a master; neither can it be conceived, that considerations of hunting, hawking, or the like, should be considerations worthy so great a prudent a king, to withhold him from attending for the good of Christendom, and his maj.'s dominions, if he should be unjustly provoked thereunto."

"IV. To the Fourth Article the said earl birth;—That he did not any thing contrary to his duty and allegiance, or contrary to the faith and trust of an ambassador, as by the Article is alledged; but did endeavour the service and honour of his late maj. and no corrupt or sinister ends of his own, or his own advancement, as by the Article is alledged. And as for the conference which is pretended he should hold concerning the Treaty, that being bid there was little probability that the said treaties would or could have good success, and that he should acknowledge as much; and yet say that he cared not what the success thereof would be, but that he would take care to have his instructions perfect, and to pursue them punctually; and would make his fortune thereby, or words to that effect; he doth not remember to have held any such discourse, though it is true, that the time hath been, many years since, when he thought the Match very unlikely to be effected, in regard of the unequal Answers which were given to his late maj. Henry's time, and the unlikelihood of accommodating the differences of religion and sect. Further, as to the reviving of the said Match for his maj. that now is, that in the first he wished and advised a Protestant Match; but, in the duty of a servant understanding that both their majesties really desired the Match with Spain, he did seriously and faithfully intend the service and honour of their majesties, and effectually endeavoured to procure their pleasure; and it is very likely he might say he would do his instructions perfect, and to pursue them punctually, as he conceiveth was lawful for him to do; but for the latter part of the conference, that he should say he would make a fortune by it, or any words to that effect, he was in the year 1621, and ever since, of that rank and quality, both in regard to his employment, fortunes, and his master's favour, that he assureth himself he did not; he dare answer so far for his own discretion, that it was impossible for him to hold so mean and unworthy a discourse."

"V. To the Fifth Article the said earl saith;—That he did not intend or resolve, that the Marriage in the former Articles mentioned should have been effected, that thereby the Romish religion or the professors thereof should be advanced; or the true religion and the professors thereof discouraged or discountenanced, as by the said Article is alledged; nor did he, to any such end or purpose or otherwise, at any time, counsel or persuade the late king's maj. to set at liberty the Jesuits and priests of the Romish religion; or to grant or allow unto the Papists and professors of the Romish religion a free toleration or silencing of the laws made and standing in force against them, as in the said Article is also alledged; but contrarily, upon all occasions, to the utmost of his power, did endeavour to prevent all the inconveniences in point of religion, that might come by matching any princess of a differing religion; as hath appeared by a Paper of his own opinion, that his maj. should marry with a lady of his own religion, as hereafter mentioned in his

Answer to the 7th Article: and for further proof thereof he saith, that in the whole Treaty with Spain he ever stood stricter in point of religion than by his instructions he needed to have done, as will appear by the testimony of sir W. Aston, and his dispatches 12th Dec. 1622, and other dispatches, which he desireth may be read: and as for counselling or persuading to set at liberty Jesuits or priests, he utterly denieth to have done any such thing, as before he hath answered; although it be true that the embassage of Spain being far different from employments in other places, where there is a body of our reformed religion, and where his maj. hath kindred and allies, whereby his maj.'s ministers may be informed of the necessary occurrences of state, without the help of a priest or Jesuit; but in Spain there being none but Roman-Catholics, nor any other manner of correspondence or intelligence but by them, the ambassadors must make use of all sorts of people, especially of Jesuits and priests; and to that purpose ambassadors thither have always a particular warrant under the king's hand, to treat and make use of priests, Jesuits, and all other sorts of men, unless it be such as be proclaimed rebels; and divers times the ministers employed in Spain, to gratify some whom they there employed for the king's service, as he believeth, at their particular suit, moved his maj. to extend grace and favour to some particular friend or kinsman of theirs, being a Roman-Catholic and imprisoned in England; and this he remembereth to have happened to others, but doth not remember to have written himself to his late maj. in that kind: and, as concerning his advice and counsel to set at liberty Jesuits and priests, the granting to the Papists a toleration, or a silencing of the laws against them, he saith, That his late maj. was engaged by the Treaty of Madrid in 1617, in divers matters concerning religion, as likewise by promises to the conde de Gondomar, and his letters to the king of Spain, of the 17th April, 1620, wherein he is pleased to promise some particulars in favour of Roman-Catholics, as by the said letter will appear. And, notwithstanding the said earl had sufficient warrant, under the king's own hand, to assure the king of Spain, that whatsoever was agreed in the said Articles, or in the said letter, his maj. would sincerely perform; yet the said earl was so cautious in that point, that when, for the conclusion of the Match, the other articles of religion being all agreed, it was pressed by the Spanish ministers, that a clause, if convenient, might be inserted, with protestation, that the form and way thereof should be wholly left to his maj.'s wisdom and clemency; and that his maj.'s Roman Catholic subjects should acknowledge this grace only to come from the king's mercy and goodness; yet the said earl would not condescend or assent thereunto, but only de bene esse, as by his letters to Mr. Sec. Calvert, bearing date 8th Oct. 1622, will appear; thereby to give his maj. time to take it into consideration, before he would engage or hind him in this point.—And the said earl saith, That he did not by letters, or otherwise, ever counsel or persuade his late maj. to grant unto the Papists and professors of the Romish religion, a free toleration or silencing of the laws made and standing in force against them, but ever protested against any such toleration; and when any such proposition hath been offered to be made in Spain, he hath ever refused so much as to give ear unto it, or to suffer it to be propounded; although it be true he hath since seen a writing touching Pardons, Suspensions, and Dispensations, for the Roman Catholics, bearing date 9th Aug. 1623, signed by some of the lords in England, wherewith he was never acquainted; but it was treated and concluded by others with the Spanish ambassadors here in England, whilst the said earl was in Spain; neither was his advice or counsel in it, for if he had known it he should have protested against it, as far as with duty and good manners he might have done. And so the said earl leaveth it to your lordships, to consider of the difference betwixt the conditions of the Treaty of Madrid of the 12th Dec. 1622, concluded by him and sir W. Aston, and of those which were after concluded here in England, expressed in the said writing; which is ready to be shewn to your lordships if in your wisdoms it shall so seem fit; and then he doubteth not but your lordships will judge the said earl to be very unfortunate to be charged with an Article of this kind.”

“ VI. To the Sixth Article the said earl saith, “ That he gave not any false information or intelligence concerning the Treaties, in the said Article mentioned, either unto the late king, or unto his maj. that now is, then prince; neither doth he know that his late maj. by hopes taken from his the said earl’s assurances, or by jealousies or suspicions from the delays in the proceeding with Spain, was enforced for the speedy conclusion of these Treaties, or to the intent to discover the ill intention of the king of Spain and the emperor, to take his journey into Spain, as by the said Article is supposed; for the said earl saith, That the assurances which he gave his late maj. and his maj. that now is, concerning these Treaties, were such as it had been dishonesty and breach of his duty and trust, for him to have held back; being the same that were given him by the emperor, and the king of Spain, and their ministers, upon as great assurances as can pass betwixt ministers of princes in the like cases: and as for the delays of Spain, they could never be so ill, and with so little colour complained of, as at the time of his maj.’s coming thither; for that a certain time was, before then, prefixed for the coming of the Dispensation, viz. in April 1623, at the furthest, which was the next month after the prince’s arrival at Madrid; and the desponsories were to have been within 40 days following, and the Infanta to begin her journey into England within 20 days after: so as 3 months patience longer would have shewed the issue of the business, without putting the person of the heir apparent of the crown into so imminent hazard for the trying an experiment; and it is an odd kind of argument, that, because the Spaniards were suspected to have dealt falsely, and so the less to be trusted, therefore the person of the prince should be put into their hands to try conclusions; but the truth is, that though that was made the pretended ground and occasion of the journey, it was neither the assurances of the said earl nor the jealousies of Spain, but other motives, that were the original cause of his maj.’s said journey; as shall be sufficiently made appear in due time: and the said earl having got an inkling thereof, by something that was let fall by the conde de Gondomar to that purpose, instantly dispatched away Mr. Gresley to his late maj. to have the journey prevented; who, upon the confines of France, met his majesty and the d. of Buckingham on their journey towards Spain, and told them as much: so that although he confesseth what is said in the said Charge to be true, viz. That, by the said journey, the person of the prince and the peace and safety of this kingdom did undergo such apparent danger, as, at the remembrance thereof, the hearts of all good subjects do tremble; yet the blame of it is due to the authors and advisers of the said journey, and not to the said earl: and although it pleased God, to the exceeding great joy and comfort of the said earl and of all good men, to send his gracious maj. home with safety; yet never was the person of any prince, upon such grounds, exposed to so great a hazard; and in such cases, not the success but the counsels ought to be considered.”

“ VII. To the Seventh Article the said earl saith, That he did not move nor persuade his maj. then prince, to change his religion, neither in the manner in the said Article mentioned, nor in any other manner whatsoever; neither did he conceive that the Charge in itself, as it is laid, will, in any reasonable construction, bear any such inference as is made thereupon; so as he conceiveth he needeth not to make any further or other Answer thereunto; yet that it may appear that the motion he made unto the said prince was not traiterously, falsely, or cunningly, or without ground, nor to any such intent as in the said Article is supposed; and to manifest unto this high and honourable court, how far he was from any such intention, he saith, That he doth acknowledge that within few days after his majesty’s coming into Spain, whilst he had that great honour to have his maj. lodge in his house, and to have so royal a guest; finding, by the Spanish ministers, that there was a general received opinion in that court, that his majesty’s coming thither was with intentions to become a Roman Catholic; and the conde de Gondomar having that very morning pressed the earl not to hinder so pious a work (as he termed it) of his majesty’s conversion, and seeming to be assured of the duke of Buckingham’s assistance therein; his maj. being all alone in a withdrawing room in the said earl's house, the said earl kneeled unto him and told him, That he had a business to impart unto him which highly imported his maj. to know, so he might be sure his boldness therein might be pardoned, which his majesty graciously promised; and thereupon the said earl told his majesty, That the general opinion in the court was, that his majesty's coming thither was with intention to be a Roman Catholic, and there to declare it; and confesseth that, at the same time, in regard of those things which he had heard, he humbly besought his maj. to deal freely with him, as with a servant of whose fidelity he might be confident, or words to that effect: but he was so far from persuading his maj. to be a Roman Catholic, that, without expecting his majesty's Answer, he declared himself to be a Protestant, and so should always continue; yet, he said, he would serve his majesty, and labour to advance his and the king his father's affairs, with as much fidelity and honesty as any Catholic whatsoever: and his majesty was pleased then to make unto the said earl a full and clear declaration of his religion, and of his constant resolution therein; and seemed to be much displeased that any should have so unworthy an opinion of him, as to think he would, for a wife, or any earthly respect whatsoever, so much as to waver in his religion: whereupon the said earl besought his majesty to pardon his boldness, and then intreated him not to suffer his business to be overthrown, by permitting that conceit of his conversion any longer to remain in the Spaniards, nor to do any thing that might give them hope therein, alledging, that it was impossible the Marriage could be without a dispensation, and so long as the Spaniards, who were to procure this dispensation, should have the least hope of his conversion, they would rather clog the dispensation than hasten it; for whilst they should have any hope at all of his conversion, they would never content themselves with the part to which they were tyed by the articles agreed upon with the said earl and sir W. Aston. At which time his maj. was pleased to approve of his opinion, and said, he would expect the dispensation; and did thereupon afterwards send Mr. Andrews to Rome to hasten it. And the next day the said earl dealt very roundly with the said conde d'Olivares and Gondomar, telling them, It was a discourteous manner of proceeding, to press his maj. beyond the conditions which had been formerly agreed upon in point of religion; and to make his condition the worse for the great obligation he had laid upon them, by putting himself into their hands: whereat they took such offence, that they estranged themselves from him for a long time after. And that the said earl did thus proceed with the condes, and that this is not a new-framed Answer to satisfy the present objection, but that which really and indeed passed, will appear by his dispatches sent unto his late maj. before his maj. that now is came out of Spain; and were first there shewed unto his maj. bearing date the 9th Sept. 1622; so that although it be true that the said earl did not dissuade his maj. (for there was no cause for it) yet without expecting his maj.'s Answer, he first made a true and clear profession of his own religion; and when his maj. had declared unto him his zeal and constancy, he humbly besought him that the Spaniards might not, for any respect, be held longer in any hopes in that point.—And because a point of religion is that which all men of honour and honesty should chiefly desire to clear, especially having imputations of that nature laid upon them, as the said earl hath in the said Article; he humbly beseecheth your lordships that he may not seem to digress from the Charge, in tendering to your lordships satisfaction in that particular, not by the aforesaid verbal discourse only, (which he protesteth was with much zeal to religion, and dutiful care to the prince, in that kind) but by some written testimony of his former opinion; both to the Match and Religion, when he was first employed into Spain for the treating of this Marriage in 1617: for his late maj. having commanded him to give an Account thereof unto his maj. that now is; he, at his departure towards Spain, presumed to give unto his maj. his opinion in writing, signed with his own hand, to be kept as a testimony of his future actions: the copy whereof is this that followeth." [Here follows the said Opinion.] "Besides which declaration of the said earl's opinion, he hath all his life, in all places, lived and avowed himself a Protestant, never having done the least act that was not suitable to the same profession; and that in all his foreign employments, for the space of fourteen years, of more than 500 persons of all qualities that have attended him, there was never any one perverted in his religion, save two Irish footmen, who in Ireland had been bred Papists: and he humbly desireth the testimony of Dr. Mawe and Dr. Wrenn, and of Mr. Saunford, one of the prebends of Canterbury, Mr. Boswell, parson of St. Lawrence in London, and Mr. Frewen, divinity-reader in Magdalen-College in Oxon, (all of whom were his maj.'s chaplains in Spain) as well for the frequent use of the sacrament, and constant profession and exercises of religion; and the testimony also of such catholics as are known to have been his ancient acquaintance and friends, and to examine them upon oath, whether either publicly or privately, in Spain or in England, they have known him in any kind to make shew, or so much as forbear upon all occasions avowedly to declare the religion that he professeth; and that the said Mr. Frewen and Mr. Wake, his now chaplains, may be also examined, whether in extremity of several sicknesses, whereunto he hath of late years fallen, he hath not ever settled his conscience with them towards God, and made a confession of his faith, resolving as befitted a Protestant and a good Christian."

"VII. To the Eighth Article the said earl saith:—That he did not at any time, or in any place, endeavour to persuade the prince to change his religion, and to become a Roman Catholic, or to be obedient to the usurped authority of the pope of Rome; neither did the said earl, to that end or purpose, or otherwise, use unto his maj. then prince, the words in the Article mentioned, viz. "That the state of England did never any great thing, but when they were under the obedience of the pope of Rome, and that it was impossible they should do any thing of note otherwise," as in the said Article is charged: but the said earl acknowledged, that upon occasion of a letter, which came to his maj. then prince, putting his maj. in mind of the great actions of his royal progenitors in the Holy Wars; and that the great kings of those times did not only employ their forces, but, in their persons, went into the Holy Land; the earl believeth, that, by way of discourse only, and not otherwise, he may have said, that in regard of the difference of religion, it were of more difficulty to undertake such great actions now than in former ages; and it might well be instanced in the present Treaty of Marriage, wherein the pope's consent was to be obtained; and to this effect, and upon the like grounds, he was confident there were very many that have, nay few of nearness about his late maj. that have not, often heard his maj. say, that he was the true martyr, that suffered more for his religion than all the princes of Christendom besides; instancing in divers particulars, but especially in that he could not match his children with kings of their own rank, without the pope's leave: but the said earl saith, That he never alledged any such thing to other purpose, than to shew that only conscience and love to truth, (in which regard protestants suffered much) and not any temporal respects, made us constant and zealous to the profession of our religion; by which discourses he ever attributed much to the sincerity and honour of the protestant religion; but never used it as an argument to persuade, as in the accusation is insinuated. Besides, he conceiveth, that, by way of Answer thereunto, the same question may be asked which his maj. was pleased to ask of the said earl in the 7th Article, viz. 'What the said earl saw in his maj. that he should think him so unworthy as to change his religion for a wife, or any earthly respect whatsoever?' So why should it be thought, that the becoming more fit to undertake great actions in the world, (being a mere moral temporal respect) should be an argument to persuade, in conscience, so religious and wise a prince, and so well instructed as his maj. is; as though the soul of a christian prince was to be wrought upon, in point of truth and belief, by temporal and worldly respects of conveniences and greatness. It were necessary, for proof of this assertion, 'The earl's persuading his maj. touching his religion' to produce some arguments that he used out of the scriptures to satisfy him, in point of conscience; in some tenet of the Romish church; or that he procured any conference with learned men for his satisfaction in point of religion; otherwise, the argument used in this Article against the said earl doth, as he conceiveth, carry his due strength to prove the charge of persuading of his maj. either in regard of itself, or indeed in regard of his maj.'s piety."

"IX. To the Ninth Article the said earl saith, That there was a discourse in Spain, of the way of accommodating the prince Palatine's affairs; and, by way of discourse, it was moved, That the marriage of his eldest son with a daughter of the emperor, and his son to be bred in the emperor's court, would be the fairest way for pacifying and accommodating those businesses; and the earl, by way of such discourse, and not otherwise, did say, That he thought his late maj. would not be averse, either to the said Match, or the breeding of the prince Palatine's son with the emperor; so as thereby the whole patrimonial estate of the prince Palatine, with the dignity electoral, might be fully restored; that his son might be brought up in his own religion, and have such preceptors and such a family as his late maj. and his father, (meaning the prince Palatine) should appoint, and they to have free exercise of their religion; for so his late maj. had often declared himself to the said earl, and wished him to lay hold of any occasion for entertaining of any such proposition, and otherwise than so, and upon the terms aforesaid, and by that way of conference of discourse only, he delivered not any opinion of his maj. at his majesty's being in Spain; and the said earl is very confident that his late maj. was returned out of Spain, before any proposition was made for the said Marriage, other than by way of discourse, as aforesaid; the same, as the said earl believeth, being moved and debated on, by way of proposition here in England, betwixt Mr. Sec. Calvert and the ambassador of the king of Spain, about the 2d of Oct. 1623; and his late maj. upon relation made unto him by a letter of Mr. Sec. Calvert, approved of the proposition, and declared the same to be the only way, as supposed, with honour, to accommodate the great businesses; and wrote to that purpose his son-in-law, the prince Palatine, by his letters, dated 19th Oct. 1623, a copy of which letter, together with a copy of Mr. Sec. Calvert's relation, the lord Conway, by his majesty's commandment, sent unto the said earl.—By which letter, written after his majesty's coming out of Spain, it appeareth unto your lordships, that there was no proposition of the Marriage betwixt the son of the prince Palatine and the emperor's daughter when the letter was written; for therein his maj. saith he was determined to interest the king of Spain in the business before any such proposition should be made to the emperor: and it also thereby appear, what his late majesty's opinion was of the convenience thereof, when he, the said earl, hopeth will acquit him, if by way of discourse only, he declared what he knew was his majesty's inclination; and with honesty, he could not have concealed. And the said earl saith, That he doth not remember what answer sir W. Astor made up that discourse which he then delivered, nor that reply the said earl made; but sure he is, that whatsoever the said earl said, or what powers or replies soever were made, as it was by way of discourse, and not otherwise, so it was according to that which he then truly conceived to be the best and easiest way to accommodate the business, and to be his majesty's pleasure, which the said sir W. Aston might be ignorant of, as he is confident he was; and not at any disaffection to our religion, or any sinister respect or regard to the house of Austria, as by the said Articles is intimated; for he did not conceive the breeding of the Palatine's son with the emperor, having a governor appointed by his late maj. and his father, and his domestics to have the free use of his own religion, to be a matter of impossibility, or of such dangerous consequence in point of religion, as to imply his conversion, as the Articles is intimated; well knowing that, in the emperor's court, all princes there, though prisoners, and others his counsellors and agents about his person, and of great command in his armies, being avowed protestants, use the free use of their religion: and it is not to be supposed that the son of the prince of France, grand-child to the king of Great Britain, should be matched, and no care taken to capitulate for the use of his religion, it being granted to the meanest princess that is married; and his majesty's special care in this point is fully seen in the said letter."

X. To the Tenth Article the said earl saith, That by comparing the above Article, of too much forwardness, with the second, whereby he is charged with 'continuing the practices upon Generalities, without reducing them to certainties and direct conclusions,' his lordships will perceive how impossible it is for him to avoid exception: but for direct answer to the present Charge, he saith, That he did not presumptuously, nor to his yet knowledge, break his instructions, nor set any law at all for the desponsories; but was therein barely passive, in admitting the day nominated by the king of Spain, according to the capitulation long before made; nor did he presumptuously, wittingly, or willingly, disobey any commandment or direction of his late maj. or his maj. that now is, then prince, which he would understand not to be countermanded, or by precedent or future instructions, otherwise explained. And for the better manifestation of the truth of his proceedings in and concerning the same, he saith, That on the day of the departure of his majesty, then prince, from the Resourial in Spain, his highness desired unto him, in the presence of the commissioners on both sides, the powers, with public declaration taken in writing by Serica, secretary to the king of Spain, of the prince's pleasure, and how he, the said earl, should use them, viz. That he should deliver them unto the king of Spain, upon the coming of the dispensation cleared from Rome, according to that which had been agreed, which was to have been within ten days after the coming of the said dispensation. And he further saith, That it is true, that the prince afterwards, by his letters, sent by one Mr. Clark, commanded him, the said earl, not to deliver the said powers till he should have received security that the Infanta, after being betrothed, should not enter into any religious order; and that before he proceeded, he should send unto his maj. then prince, such security as should be offered, that he might judge whether it were sufficient or not; whereupon the said earl, as became a faithful servant, presented unto his late maj. and to his maj. that now is, then prince, such assurances as were offered unto him for securing of that point, together with such reasons as, he conceived, were fit to be offered to their considerations; which gave unto his late maj. and his maj. that now is, then prince, such satisfaction, as they were pleased to dispatch a post presently unto him, absolutely discharging him of that commandment; as by their several letters, dated the 8th of Oct. 1623, will appear;—hereby the said earl was absolutely freed from that commandment; and being so freed thereof, he then remained under the order which his maj. then prince, had left with him at his departure; which was to proceed according to the capitulations, and his highness's declaration when he delivered the said powers unto him; and so he intended to have done, till, by his highness's declaration, of the 13th Nov. 1623, he was directly commanded the contrary; which commandment he readily and punctually obeyed: and for such his intention, till he was so countermanded, he conceived he had not only sufficient warrant, but had highly offended, if he had done otherwise: for, 1. For his proceeding to consummate the Match he had warrant and instruction under his late maj.'s hand. 2. It was the main scope of his embassy. 3. He was enjoined to that by the king and prince's commission, under their great seals. 4. He had positive orders, under his late maj.'s hand, by letter since. 5. It was agreed, by capitulation, that it should be within 10 days after the coming of the dispensation. 6. His late maj. and his maj. that now is, then prince, signified unto him by their letters, at the same time when they discharged him of his commandment, touching the Infanta's entering into a religious order, that they intended to proceed in the Marriage, as by his maj.'s letter of the 8th Oct. 1623, will appear. 7. The powers were to that end left in his hand, and renewed again after his maj.'s return into England. 8. He had overthrown the Marriage without order; for although sir W. Aston and himself used all possible means for the gaining of time, and deferring of the desponsories, yet the king of Spain caused it formally to be protested, That in case the said earl should insist upon the deferring of the desponsories, he would hold himself freed from the Treaty by the said earl's infringing of the capitulation. And, in truth, although the king of Spain should have condescended to have prorogued the desponsonies until one of the days of Christmas, as by the letter (which is by this Article acknowledged to be mistaken) was required, yet the prince's powers had before that time been expired. 9. He durst not, without a precise warrant, put such a scorn upon so noble a lady, whom he then conceived likely to be the prince's wife, as to nominate a day for the marriage when the powers were out of date. 10. He was himself sworn to the treaty. Lastly, He could not, in honour and honesty, but endeavour to perform that trust reposed in him, when the powers were deposited in his hands, with public and legal declaration taken into an instrument by the secretary of state to the king of Spain, leading and directing the use of them; for the same being then instrumentum stipulatum, as well the king of Spain was interested by the acceptance of the substitution, as the prince by the granting of the powers, and he could not in honesty fail that public trust, without clear and undoubted warrant; which, as soon as he had, he obeyed: so, the case standing thus, the said earl is very confident, that the supposed countermands, or directions of restriction, when they shall be perused and considered of, will appear to have been a very slender and insufficient warrant against the aforesaid orders and reasons, herein before specified: and is also as confident, that what is assumed out of the said earl's dispatches, will also appear to be so understood; and that if he had proceeded to the execution of the desponsories, before he received direct and express commandment to the contrary, by the aforesaid letter of the 13th Nov. 1623, which he readily and punctually obeyed, he had not, under favour, broken his instructions, nor deserved any blame for lack of assurance of restitution of the Palatinate, or temporal articles: and first, of the Palatinate, his maj. did not send unto the said earl express direction not to dispatch the desponsories until a full conclusion be had of the other treaty of the Palatinate, together with that of the Marriage, as by the said Article is alledged; only his late maj. by the aforesaid letters of the 8th Oct. required the said earl so to endeavour, that his maj. might have the joy of both at Christmas; whereas his instructions of the 14th March, 1621, were express, that he should not make the business of the Palatinate a condition of the Marriage; and his late majesty's letters, of the 30th Dec. 1623, were fully to the same effect: yet did the said earl according to what was intimated by the said letters of the 8th Oct. so carefully provide therein, that before the powers were to have been executed, he had an absolute Answer in the business of the Palatinate, that the same should be really restored, according to his late majesty's desire; and the conde D'Olivares, both in his master's name and his own, desired the said earl and sir W. Aston, that they would assure his maj. of the real performance thereof; and intreated them, if need were, they should engage their honours and lives for it, as by their joint dispatch, of the 23d Nov. 1623, will appear; and so much the said sir W. Aston and the said earl agreed should be delivered unto them in writing before they would have delivered the powers, and so the said earl declared it; the which Answer in writing should have been the same, which since was given them of the 8th Jan. 1623: and both the said sir W. Aston, and the said earl were so confident therein, as they, by their said letters of the 23d of November, wrote to his late majesty as followeth, viz.—“That his majesty might according to his desire signified to them by his letters of the 8th of October, give as well to his majesty's daughter, that Christmas, the comfortable news of the near expiring of her great troubles and sufferings, as to his son, the prince, the congratulation of being married to a most worthy and excellent princess.”—By which it will evidently appear, he meant not to leave the business of the Palatinate loose when he intended to proceed to the Marriage: but he confesseth he was ever of opinion, the best pawn and assurance his late maj. could have of the real proceedings in the said business of the Palatinate, was, that they proceeded really to the effecting of the Match: and of the same opinion was his late maj. also, and the lords commissioners here in England, as appeareth by his instructions, dated the 14th March, 1621; which opinion still continued in them, as appeareth by his late majesty's letters of the 7th Jan. 1622.—Concerning the Temporal Articles, the said earl saith, When the desponsories were formerly appointed to have been, as he remembereth, on the 9th Aug. before the departure of his maj. then prince, (which was only hindered by the not coming of the dispensation) the prince appointed him and sir W. Aston to meet with the Spanish commissioners; and they drew up the heads of the Temporal Articles, wherewith the prince and d. of Buckingham were acquainted; and in case the dispensation had come, and the desponsories been performed on that day, there had then no other provision been made for them before the Marriage; but presently upon the prince's departure, he, the said earl, caused them to be drawn into form, and sent them to his late maj. the 24th Sept. 1623, desiring to understand his majesty's pleasure with all speed, especially if he disapproved any thing in them; but never received notice of any dislike thereof until the aforesaid letters of the 13th Nov. 1623, which put off the desponsories. So it appeareth the said earl was so far from breaking his instructions, or from having any intention to have proceeded to the execution of the desponsories, before his maj. and the prince were satisfied in the point of the Infanta's entering into religion; or before convenient assurance as well of the restitution of the Palatinate as for performance of the Temporal Articles, that he deserved, as he conceiveth, (under favour) no blame, so much as in intention; but if he had erred in intention only, as he did not, and the same never reduced into act, the fault, as he

conceiveth, was removed by his obedience. before the intention was put in execution; for so it is in cases towards God himself.—And as to the Matter of Aggravation against him, 'That he appointed so short a day for the desponsories, as that, without extraordinary diligence, the prince had been bound;' he thereto saith as before, That he set no day thereto at all, nor could defer it after the dispensation came from Rome, without a direct breach of the Match so long laboured in, and so much desired; yet he and sir W. Aston used all possible industry to discover how the motion of deferring the Match would be taken; and finding an absolute resolution in the king of Spain to proceed punctually in requiring the powers, according to the capitulations, within ten days after the coming of the dispensation; and at that time also getting advertisement from Rome, that the dispensation was granted, and would presently be there: he, the said earl, to the end that, in so great a case, he might have a clear and undoubted understanding of his late majesty's pleasure, sent a dispatch, of the 1st Nov. with all diligence to the king; letting his maj. know that it would not be possible for him to protract the Marriage above 24 days, unless he should hazard the breaking of it, for which he had no warrant; but that this was no new resolution, nor the thing so straitened in time, as by the said Article is pretended, will appear by the said earl's dispatch of the 24th Sept. 1623; in which, upon the scruple that was then made of the Spaniards' entering into religion, he wrote to the same effect, viz. "That if the dispensation should come, he knew no means how to detain the powers above 24 days." So that although that difficulty happened not until about the middle of Nov. 1623, yet it was foreseen that it must of necessity happen whensoever the dispensation should come; and there was warning of two months' time given thereof; viz. from the 24th Sept. to the 29th Nov. which was the time appointed for the desponsories: so he humbly submitteth himself to your lordships which of the two ways was the safer and most dutiful for him to take; whether, upon inferences and conjectures, to have overthrown so great a business; or, on the other side, first to have presented to his maj. with truth and sincerity, as he did, the true state of his affairs, with his humble opinion therein; with an intention, if his maj. should resolve to break the Match, that, for the said earl's honest discharge of the public trust reposed in him, when the powers were deposited in his hands, and for his sufficient warrant in so great a cause, his maj. would be graciously pleased to give him clear and express orders, which he then had not; and, in the interim, whilst his maj. might take into consideration the great inconveniences that might ensue, the said inconveniences might be suspended; and the business kept upon fair terms, that his maj. might have his way and choice clear and unimpeded before him; and as for the evil consequences which are pretended would have followed, if the said earl had proceeded to the consummation of the Match before he had express warrant to the contrary, he must, and doth confess, he then understood the clean contrary; for he supposed that his maj. should speedily have seen the Marriage (which he had so long sought) effected, and the prince should have a worthy lady whom he loved; that the portion was much greater than was ever given in money in Christendom; and that the king of Spain had engaged himself for the Restitution of the Palatinate; for which the said earl conceived a daughter of Spain and two millions had been no ill pawn, besides divers other additions of advantage to the crown of England: whereas, on the contrary side, he foresaw the prince would be kept at least one year longer unmarried, a thing which highly concerneth these kingdoms; he doubted that the Recovery of the Palatinate from the emperor and duke of Bavaria, by force, would prove of great difficulty; and that Christendom was like to fall in a general combustion; so desiring that his maj. should have obtained his ends, and have had the honour and happiness not only to have given peace, plenty, and increase to his own subjects and crowns; but to have compounded the greatest differences that had been these many years in Christendom; and, by his piety and wisdom, to have prevented the shedding of so much Christian blood, as he feared would ensue, if these businesses were disordered. These reasons, he confesseth, and his zeal unto his majesty's service, made him so earnestly desire the effecting of this business: and he cannot but think himself an unfortunate man, that his majesty's affairs being so near the settling to his majesty's content, as he conceived they were, and hoping to have been to his master not only a faithful but a successful servant, to see the whole state of affairs turned upside down, without any the least fault of his; and yet he the only minister, on the English or Spanish side, that remaineth under disgrace."

"XI. To the Eleventh Article the said Earl saith, That the said Article is grounded upon a Petition, preferred by him to this most honourable house, supposed to be scandalous; which your lordships, as he conceiveth, according to the custom and privileges of the house of peers, would have been pleased first to have adjudged so to have been, either for matter appearing in itself, or upon hearing of the said earl; for if the matter appearing in the Petition itself be not excepted unto, it cannot, as he conceiveth, by collateral averment, be taken for a scandal, till it be examined and found false: but, for a plain and direct Answer thereunto, he saith, That the said Petition doth not warrant any such inference, as by the said Article is enforced; and that he hopeth to justify the contents of his said Petition in such sort as shall not displease his maj. nor deserve that expression which is used in the Charge; but, contrarily, what he hath said, or shall say therein, in his defence, shall, in all things, tend to the honour and service of his most royal maj. by reducing unto his memory divers circumstances, and laying before him the passages of divers particulars, which, by undue practices, have been either concealed from his maj. or misrelated unto him."

"Having thus offered unto this high and hon. court such proofs and reasons as, he hopeth, shall, in your lordships wisdom and justice, clearly acquit him of any capital crime, or wilful offence: if it shall appear that, out of error of judgment, too much fervency of zeal to his maj.'s service, or ignorance in the laws, wherewith he hath not been able to be so well acquainted as he ought, by reason of his foreign employments for the space of 14 years, or by any other ways or means, he hath fallen into the danger of the laws, for any thing pardoned in the general Pardon made in the 21st year of our late sovereign lord king James of England, of blessed memory, he humbly prayeth allowance of the said Pardon, and the benefit thereof; with this clause, That he doth and will approve that he is none of the persons excepted out of the same: and though he is very confident that he shall not need the help of any Pardon, having received several significations, as well from his majesty's own mouth, that he had never offended his maj. as lately by several letters from the lord Conway, that he might rest in the security, he was and sit still, and should not be further questioned; yet he hopeth your ldsps. will find him so free from blame, that he shall need no pardon; but that he hath served his late maj. of blessed memory, and his most gracious sovereign that now is, with fidelity, care, and industry; and that your lordships will take such course, as you, in your wisdoms, shall think fit, not only for the upholding of the honour and reputation of a peer of this realm, after so many employments, but will likewise become humble and earnest suitors to his maj. on his behalf, (which he humbly prayeth) that he may be restored to his maj.'s gracious favour; which, above all worldly things, he most desireth."

The earl of Bristol's Answer being ended, the lord keeper demanded of him if he had any thing more to say. Whereupon the earl complaining of the inequality between himself and the duke of Buckingham, and that, by reason of his restraint, he was disabled from proceeding against the duke, and that his counsel was disheartened to give him their free advice; he earnestly urged their lordships promise to make them both equal; and said, That his counsel informed him there was no treason in all the Charge against him save only what came near a statute touching religion, which he humbly submitted to the house: and besought their lordships to take some course, by the resolution of the judges, or otherwise as they should please, that it may be declared whether his case be treason or not, before he be further proceeded with: likewise, that he might have liberty to examine his witnesses, and that Mr. Attorney might not take hold of any matter of form or legality to his prejudice.

To this Mr. Attorney replied, "That he would not, but only insist upon the matter of the Charge;" and desired, as the earl had done, that the house would direct the course how the witnesses might be examined, and the manner of his further proceeding against the said earl. The earl being withdrawn, the house agreed to give his counsel encouragement for their free and faithful advice to him; and it was further ordered that the said earl should have liberty to go abroad in the custody of Mr. Maxwell, the usher, to take the air for his health's sake; which was granted at his humble request. The earl being called in again was made acquainted with this order, as the king's own consent, for which he returned his maj. and their lordships his most humble thanks.

The Commons commit Mr. More, a Member, for reflecting on the King. The Commons proceeded for several days, after the last mentioned affair, in reading bills, &c. But, in one of these days' debates, Mr. More, a member, dropped some words, which were represented to the king, and, by him, back again to the house: on which a committee was appointed to examine into the matter; and, June 3rd, a report was made, from thence, of the words spoken by Mr. More, "That we were born free, and must continue free, if the king would keep his kingdom:" or words to that effect. And, in the same discourse, upon supposing what a tyrant may do or not do, within this kingdom, he added these words; "As thanks be to God, we have no occasion, we having a just and pious king." Mr. More was heard to explain himself, and then withdrew. But though the Journals say that Mr. More was cleared of any ill intentions, in speaking those words, by all who spake in his favour, which were many; yet, on the question, Mr. More was sentenced to the Tower, and the Speaker pronounced it accordingly. But, four days after, the king was pleased to send a message to the house, That he would remit his further punishment. On which he was ordered to be enlarged.

The Commons lay a Penalty upon absent Members. About this time a call of the house of commons was made with great strictness, and the absent members ordered to be taken into custody; a penalty of 10*l.* was laid upon any member that did not appear at the call, and yet absents himself from the service of the house, without asking leave.

The Commons order a Letter of Reprimand to the Univ. of Cambridge for choosing the D. of Buckingham for their Chancellor. June 5th. Mr. Herbert made a report from a committee, That it appeared to them this house had just cause of complaint, on the election of the d. of Buckingham to be chancellor of the University of Cambridge; and do think fit, that a letter should be written to the corporation of that university, to signify that dislike; and to require them to send some of their body instructed and authorized to inform and give account to this house, of the manner of their proceeding in the said election.—Rushworth acquaints us, "That great interest was made by the court to carry this point; and that several letters were pretended to be sent, by the king himself, in order to discourage all opposers. But, notwithstanding that the heads of houses and the doctors were almost unanimously in the duke's interest; yet a strong party was formed against him, amongst the juniors; and, at the election, he carried it by only 5 voices; the numbers being, for the duke 108, and 103 for the earl of Berkshire; besides that two of the duke's were void by statute, as being given to the vice-chancellor by compromise, to dispose of as he should think fit."—The disgust of the commons against the university was, that they should pretend to chuse a man, who then stood impeached by them, for several high crimes and misdemeanors. Accordingly, the opinion of the committee for writing a letter to Cambridge, &c. was readily complied with, and ordered to be done, by the whole house. But, June the 6th, when the letter was read by Mr. Pym and approved on, the chancellor of the exchequer, sir Rd. Weston, told the house, "That the king, being acquainted with their intention, had commanded him to signify his pleasure to them, that they forbear to send the letter." The further consideration of this message was deferred to the next day. And, June 7th, the house, in a grand committee, agreed upon the following answer to it.

"That they do acknowledge they were about to write to the University, because that the very election itself, whereby the University is committed to the government of one that is charged, and publicly complained of by the commons in parliament, whereof the electors are a part, is in itself, a very great grievance, and prejudicial in example; whereof they have reason to be the more sensible, because they are informed, that in the manner of the election there were many passages likewise done in contempt of the house: and do humbly beseech his maj. to believe, that neither in this, nor any other thing, this house did or shall intend to enlarge their own power and jurisdiction, to the diminution of his maj.'s right or prerogative."

Whereunto his maj. replied by the said sir Rd. Weston:—"That the University of Cambridge and all corporations derive their right and privilege from him; and that he hath reason to esteem the Universities above any other, and is resolved to defend them against any, which either wilfully, or by chance, shall go about to infringe their liberties. Concerning the election itself, his maj. is far from conceiving it a grievance; for he never heard that crimes objected, were to be taken as proved; or, that man should lose his fame or good opinion in the world, upon an accusation only. But whereas you say in the manner of carriage of the election, there were many passages done in it to the contempt of the house: his maj. is well pleased that you enquire and punish the offenders, if there be any that have misbehaved themselves in that respect. But for the election itself or the form of it, his maj. doth avow his first Message."—It is probable, that the house was in some measure satisfied by the king's Reply, or seemed to be so: for it was referred to a farther consideration from time to time, till we hear no more of it.

The D. of Bucks' Speech upon presenting his Answer to the Commons, Impeachment.] June 8. The duke of Buckingham gave in his Answer to the house of lords concerning the Articles of his Impeachment, p. 106. But before he delivered it, he made the following speech.

"My Lords, In a cause of pressure considered by itself, I have a fair beginning; as it is a debt due to your lordships for this noble favour in leaving it to my choice, whether I would answer to every particular in the aggravation, or not. I may without lessening any obligation, say, the favour is of greater extent than at first may be imagined; for what is my cause now may be yours or your posterities hereafter. I have in a manner tied myself only to my Charge, hoping, if I give your lordships satisfaction in that, the aggravations will fall of themselves. I could not well have followed the aggravations, being composed of words which, I hope, my actions have not deserved, and I am sure my ears have not been acquainted with, without some distraction of spirit: yet I have left nothing of them unanswered that is material. I have used as much speed to come to my Answer as conveniently I could, without prejudice to my cause, having already had my reputation too long upon the stage; and had your lordships called for it sooner I had been as ready as now I am desirous to detain your lordships as little as may be, with the expectation of my particular, from weightier business. I was also grieved that my business should be the cause of the loss of this year for foreign attempts, and the hindrance of those resolutions that would have comforted our friends abroad, and secured ourselves at home: but, in this, my lords, I am sure, you will easily acquit me in your thoughts. When I look upon my Charge in general, as the commons did, without searching into the integrity of my own heart and actions, which are yet unknown to most of them, I wonder not so much at their proceedings, the particulars not being voted against me unanimously; but, had they taken the means to have been better and more truly informed of the particulars, or had given me cause to have informed them, I assure myself they had not troubled your lordships with this Charge. I confess there hath been that contestation in the house of commons concerning my justification, that I cannot but acknowledge much favour there from many, and if the actions of some others of that house do not make them conclude me of a worse disposition than I shall hereafter be found, there is none but may say with me, 'I am at peace with all.' I shall now, for the present, only apply myself to the clearing my reputation, and for the future to those actions and endeavours which may repose me of that I have accounted one of my greatest losses, their good opinions. I would not speak nor profess this before your lordships, if reason and my own disposition did not warrant the performance of it. For, first, who accused me? Common Fame. Who gave me up to your lordships? The house of commons. The one is too subtle a body, if a body; the other too great a one, for me to contest with: I am confident, when my Cause shall be tried, neither the one or the other, or part of either, will be found to have any ground to be my enemy. But as Fame is subtle, so it is often, and especially in accusations, false: therefore though the house of commons have not willingly wronged me: yet I am confident it will at length be found, that Common Fame hath abused both them and me. I presume the house of commons have proceeded against me, out of an hearty and zealous affection, to do their king and country service; and, I hope, out of Christian charity, to punish or amend my faults, (if Fame could have proved them) and not to ruin my reputation, or destroy my fortune. I shall never call such proceedings wrong, which, seeking to cure my errors, give me opportunity to clear and publish my innocence. For the State itself, I have a little to say; it is but a little: I will not abuse your lordships patience. I was born and bred in it. I owe it my life. I have been raised to honours and fortunes in it, I freely confess, beyond my merits. What I wanted in sufficiency and experience for the service of it, I have endeavoured to supply by care and industry. Could there be the least alienation hereafter of my heart from the service of the state, for any thing that hath past, I should be the ungratefullest man living. Should but such a thought stain my heart, I should be content it were let blood. If my posterity should not inherit the same fidelity, I should desire an inversion in the course of nature, and be glad to see them earthed before me. My Answer to the several points of my Charge I shall crave leave to deliver briefly in writing and in form of law; but as naked as truth loves to be: and so I leave myself and my Cause to your lordships justice."

Then his grace presented his Answer, and gave the same to the lord keeper, and his lordship to the clerk, which followeth in hæc verba:

"The Humble ANSWER and PLEA of GEORGE Duke of BECKINGHAM, to the DECLARATION and IMPEACHMENT made against him, before your Lordships, by the Commons House of Parliament. (See p. 106.)

"The said duke of Bucks. being accused, and sought to be impeached before your lordships, of the many misdemeanors, misprisions, offences, and crimes, wherewith he is charged by the commons house of parliament, and which are comprised in the Articles preferred against him and were aggravated by those whose service was used by that house in the delivery of them; doth find in himself an inexpressible pressure of deep and hearty sorrow, that so great and so worthy a body should hold him suspected of those things which are objected against him, whereas, had that honourable house first known the very truth of those particulars, whereof they had not there the means to be rightly informed; he is well assured, in their own true judgments, they would have forbore to have charged him therewith. But the integrity of his own heart and conscience, being the most able and most impartial witness, not accusing him of the least thought of disloyalty to his sovereign or to his country, doth raise his spirits again to make his just defence before your lordships; of whose wisdom, justice, and honour he is so well assured, that he doth with confidence, and yet with all humbleness submit himself and his cause to your examinations and judgments; before whom he shall, with all sincerity and clearness, unfold and lay open the secrets of his own actions, and of his heart; and, in his Answer, shall not affirm the least substantial, and as near as he can, the least circumstantial point, which he doth not believe he shall clearly prove before your lordships."

"The Charge consisteth of 13 several Articles, whereunto the duke, saving to himself the usual benefit of not being prejudiced by any words, or want of form, in his Answer; but that he may be admitted to make further explanation and proof, as there shall be occasion; and saving to himself all privileges and rights belonging to him as one of the peers of this realm, doth make these several and distinct Answers following, in the same order they are laid down unto him."

"1. To the First Article, which concerneth the Plurality of Offices which he holdeth, he answereth thus.—That it is true that he holdeth those several places and offices, which are enumerated in the preamble of his Charge, whereof only three are worthy the name of offices, viz. the Admiralty, the Wardenship of the Cinque-Ports, and Mastership of the Horse; the others are rather titular and additions of honour: for these offices he humbly and freely acknowledgeth the bounty and goodness of his most gracious master, who is with God; who, when he had cast an eye of favour upon him, and had taken him into a more near place of service about his royal person, was more willing to multiply his graces and favours upon him than the duke was forward to ask them; and, for the most part, as many honourable persons, and his now most excellent maj. above all others, can best testify, did prevent the very desires of the duke in asking: and all these particular places, he can and doth truly affirm, his late maj. did bestow of his own royal motion, except the Wardenship of the Cinque-Ports only; and thereto also he gave his approbation and encouragement. And the duke denieth, that he obtained these places either to satisfy his exorbitant ambition, or his own profit or advantage, as is objected against him, and he hopeth he shall give good satisfaction to the contrary in his particular Answers ensuing, touching the manner of his obtaining the places of the Admiralty, and the Wardenship of the Cinque-Ports; whereunto he humbly desireth to refer himself.—And for the Mastership of the Horse to his maj. he saith, It is a mere domestic office of attendance upon the king's person, whereby he receiveth some profit; yet but as a conveniency to render him more fit for his continual attendance; and in that place, the times compared, he hath retrenched the king's annual charge, to a considerable value, as shall be made apparent.—And for the Number of Places he holdeth, he saith, That if the commonwealth doth not suffer thereby, he hopeth he may, without blame, receive and retain that which the liberal and bountiful hand of his maj. hath freely conferred upon him. And it is not without many precedents, both in antient and modern times, that one man, eminent in the esteem of his sovereign, hath, at one time, held as great and as many offices: but when it shall be discerned, that he shall falsely or corruptly execute those places, or any of them; or that the public shall suffer thereby, he is so thankful for what he hath freely received, that, whensoever his gracious master shall require it, he, without disputing with his sovereign, will readily lay down at his royal feet, not only his places and offices, but his whole fortune and his life, to do him service."

"II. To the Second Article, his buying the Admiral's Place, the said duke maketh this clear and true Answer.—That it is true, that in Jan. in the 16th year of his late maj.'s reign, his late maj. did, by his letters patent, grant unto the duke the office of Lord Admiral for his life; which grant, as he well knoweth it, was made freely, and without any contract or bargain with the late lord admiral, or any other, and upon the voluntary surrender of that noble and well-deserving lord, so he is advised it will appear to be free from any defect in law, by reason of the statute 5 Edw. 6. mentioned in the Article of his Charge, or for any other cause whatsoever; for he saith the true manner of obtaining this office, and of all the passages thereof, which he is ready to make good by proof, was thus: that hon. lord, the late earl of Nottingham, the lord admiral, being grown much in years, and finding that he was not then able to perform that which appertained to his place, as in former times he had done to his great honour; and fearing lest his maj.'s service and the commonwealth might suffer by a defect, became an humble and earnest petitioner to his late maj. to admit him to surrender his office. His late maj. was at the first unwilling unto it, out of his royal affection to a person, and true judgment of his worth, that the earl renewed his petitions, and in some of them nominated the duke to be his succe-

sor, without the duke's privity or forethought of it. And, about that time, a gentleman of good place about the navy, and of long experience, of himself came to the duke, and earnestly moved him to undertake the place. The duke apprehending the weight of the place, and considering his young years and want of experience to manage so great a charge, gave no ear unto it; but excused it, not for form, but really and ingenuously out of the apprehension of his then unfitness for it. The gentleman not thus satisfied, unknown to the duke, applied himself to the late king, and moved his maj. therein, and offered these reasons for it: that the duke was the fittest man at that time, and as the state of the navy then stood, for that place, for he said it was then a time of peace: that the best service that could be done for the present, was to repair the navy and ships royal, which then were much in decay, and to retrench the king's charge and to employ it effectually; that before there was like to be personal use of service otherwise, the duke, being young and active, might gain experience, and make himself as fit as any other: and that, in the mean time, none was so fit as himself, having the opportunity of his maj.'s favour and means to his person, to procure a constant assignment and payment of money for the navy; the want whereof was the greatest cause of the former defects. These reasons persuaded his late maj. and, upon his maj.'s own motion, prevailed on the duke to take the charge upon him: and thereupon the earl voluntarily, freely, willingly, and upon his own earnest and often suit, surrendered the place; without any precedent contract or promise whatsoever, which might render the duke in the least degree subject to the danger of the law, which was not then so much as once thought upon; and upon that surrender, the grant was made to the duke: but it is true, that his maj. out of his royal bounty, for recompence of the long and faithful service of the said earl, and for an honourable memory of his deserts to him and the crown of England, did grant him a pension of 1000*l.* per ann. for his life; which, in all ages, hath been the royal way of princes, wherewith to reward antient and well-deserving servants in their elder years? when, without their own faults, they are become less serviceable to the state: and the duke also voluntarily and freely, and as an argument of his noble respect towards so honourable a predecessor, who, to his death, he called father; and whose estate, as he then understood, was fallen very low; did, with his late majesty's privity and approbation, send him 8000*l.* in money; which he hopeth no person of worth and honour will esteem to be an act worthy of blame in him. And when the duke had thus obtained this place of great trust, he was so careful of his duty, that he would not rely upon his own judgment or ability; but of himself humbly besought his then maj. to settle a commission of fit and able persons for the affairs of the navy, by whose counsel and assistance he might manage that weighty business with the best advantage for his majesty's service; which commission was granted, and yet continueth; and without the advice of those commissioners he hath never done any thing of moment; and, by their advice and industry, he hath thus husbanded the king's money, and furthered the service, that where before the ordinary Charge of the Navy was 54,000*l.* per ann. and yet the ships were very much decayed, and their provisions neglected, the charge was reduced to 30,000*l.* per ann.; and with that charge the ships all repaired and made serviceable, and 2 new ships built yearly; and for the two last years, when there were no new ships built, the ordinary charge was reduced to 21,600*l.* per ann. And now he dare boldly affirm, that his majesty's navy is in better state by much than ever it was in any precedent time whatsoever."

"III. To the Third Article, his buying the Wardenship of the Cinque-Ports, he maketh this plain, ingenious, and true Answer:—That in Dec. in the 22nd year of his late majesty's reign, he obtained the office of Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, and Constable of the Castle of Dover (being one entire office) upon the surrender of the lord Zouch, then lord warden. The manner of obtaining whereof, was thus: the lord Zouch being grown in years, and with his almost continual lameness being grown less fit for that place, he discovered a willingness to leave it, and made several offers thereof to the duke of Richmond, and Rd. earl of Dorset, deceased; but he was not willing to part with it, without recompence. Notice whereof coming to the duke, by an offer made from the lord Zouch, he finding by experience how much, and how many ways both the king's service might, and many times did suffer; and how many inconveniences did arise to the king's subjects in their goods, ships, and lives, by the intermixture of the jurisdictions of the admiralty and wardenship of the Cinque-Ports, and by the emulation, disaffection, and contention of their officers, as clearly appear by these particulars, amongst many others which may be instanced. 1. Whereas the admiral-jurisdiction extends generally to all the narrow seas; the warden of the Cinque-Ports hath and exerciseth admiral-jurisdiction on all the sea-coasts, from Show-Beacon in Essex, to the Red Nore in Sussex; and within those limits there have been continual differences between the lord admiral and the lord warden, whether the lord warden's jurisdiction extends into the main sea, or only as far as the low-water-mark, and so much further into the sea, as a man on horseback can reach with a lance; which occasioneth questions between those chief officers themselves. 2. There are many and continual differences in executing of Warrants against Offenders: the officers of the one refusing to obey or assist the authority of the other; whereby the offenders protected or countenanced by either, easily escape. 3. Merchants and owners of goods questioned in the admiralty, are often enforced to sue in both courts, and often enforced, for their peace, to compound with both officers. 4. The king's service is much hindered; for the most usual and ordinary rendezvous of the king's ships being at the Downs, and that being within the jurisdiction of the lord warden; the lord admiral or captains of the king's ships have no power or warrant to press men from the shore, if the king's ships be in distress. 5. When the king's ships, or others, be in danger on the Goodwin, and other places within view of the ports-men, they have refused to help with their boats, lest the king's ships should command them on board; whereby many ships have perished, and much goods have been lost. 6. When warrants come to press a ship in the road for the king's service, the officers take occasion to disobey the warrants, and prejudice the king's service. For, if the warrant come from the lord-warden, they will pretend the ship to be out of their jurisdiction; if the warrant come from the lord admiral, they will pretend it to be within the jurisdiction of the Cinque-ports; and so, whilst the officers dispute, the opportunity of the service is lost. 7. When the king's ships lie near the ports, and the men come on shore, the officers refuse to assist the captains to reduce them to the ships without the lord warden's warrant. 8. If the king's ships, on the sudden, have any need of pilots for the sands, coasts of Flanders, or the like, wherein the ports-men are best experienced, they will not serve without the lord warden's or his lieutenant's warrant, who perhaps are not near the place. 9. When for great occasions for the service of the state, the lord admiral and lord warden must both join their authority; if the officers for want of true understanding of their several limits and jurisdictions, mistake their warrants, the service, which many times can endure no delay, is lost, or not so effectually performed.—For these, and many other reasons of the like kind, the duke not being led, either out of ambition or hope of profit, hath been objected; (for it could be no increase of honour to him, having been honoured before with a greater place; nor of profit, for he hath not yielded him any matter of profit at all, nor is like to yield him above 500*l.* per ann. at any time) but out of his desire to make himself the more able to do the king and kingdom service, and prevent all differences and difficulties which heretofore had, or hereafter might hinder the same, he did entertain that motion: and doth confess, that not knowing, or so much as thinking of the said act of parl. before-mentioned, he did agree to give the said lord 1000*l.* in money, and 500*l.* per ann. in respect of his surrender; he not being willing to leave his place without such consideration, nor the duke willing to have it without his full satisfaction; and the occasion why the d. of Bucks gave that consideration to the lord Zouch, was, because the d. of Richmond in his life time had first agreed to give the same consideration for it; and if he had lived, he had had that place upon the same terms: and when the said d. of Richmond was dead, his late maj. directed the d. of Buckingham to enter upon that place, and, for the reasons before-mentioned, to put both these offices together; and to give the same consideration to the said lord, which the d. of Richmond should have given, and his late maj. said he would repay the money. And how far this act of his, in acquiring this office, accompanied with these circumstances, may be within the danger of the law, the king being privy to all the passages of it, and encouraging and directing it, he humbly submitteth to your judgment; and he humbly leaves it to your lordships judgments, in what third way an ancient servant to the crown, by age or infirmity disabled to perform his service, can, in an honourable course, relinquish his place; for if the king himself gave the reward, it may be said it is a charge to the crown; if the succeeding officer gave the recompence, it may thus be objected to be within the danger of the law: and howsoever it be, yet he hopeth it shall not be hold in him a crime, when his intentions were just and honourable, and for the furtherance of the king's service; neither is it without precedent, that in former times of great employment, both these offices were put into one hand by several grants."

"IV. To the Fourth Article, whereby the not Guarding of the Narrow Seas in these two last years by the duke, according to the trust and duty of an admiral, is laid to his charge; whereof the consequence, supposed to have been merely through his default, are, the ignominious infesting of the coasts with pirates and enemies, the endangering of the dominion of these seas, the extreme loss of the merchants, and the decay of the trade and strength of the kingdom: the duke maketh this Answer;—That he doubteth not but he shall make it appear, to the good satisfaction of your lordships, that albeit there hath happened much loss to the king's subjects within the said time of two years, by pirates and enemies; yet that hath not happened by the neglect of the duke, or want of care and diligence in his place: for whereas in former times, the ordinary guard allowed for the narrow seas hath been but 4 ships, the duke hath since hostility began, and before, procured their number to be much increased; for, since June 1624, there hath never been fewer than 5 of the king's ships, and ordinarily 6 besides pinnaces, merchants ships and drumblers: and since open hostility of the king's ships, besides merchants of great number, and pinnaces, and drumblers; and all these well furnished and manned, sufficiently instructed and authorized for the service. He saith, he hath from time to time, upon all occasions, acquainted his maj. and the council board therewith, and craved their advice, and used the assistance of the commissioners for the navy in this service: and for the Dunkirkers, who have of late infested these coasts more than in former years, he saith, There was that providence used for the repression of them, that his maj.'s ships and the Hollanders joining together, the port of Dunkirk was blocked up, and so should have continued, had not a sudden storm dispersed them; which, being the immediate hand of God, could not by any policy of man be prevented; at which time, they took the opportunity to rove abroad, but it hath been so far from endangering the dominion of the narrow seas thereby, as it is suggested, that his maj.'s ships or men of war, were never yet mastered, nor encountered by them, nor will they endure the sight of any of our ships; and when the duke himself was in person, the Dunkirkers run into their harbours. But there is a necessity that, according to the fortune of wars, interchangeable losses will happen; yet, hitherto, notwithstanding their more than wonted insolency, the loss on the enemy's part hath been as much, if not more, than what hath happened to us; and that loss that hath fallen, hath chiefly come by this means, that the Dunkirkers ships being of late years exercised in continual hostility with the Hollanders, are built of a mold as fit for flight as for fight; and so they pilfer upon our coasts, and creep to the shore, and escape from the king's ships: but to prevent that inconvenience for the time to come, there is already order taken for the building some ships, which shall be of the like mold, light and quick of sail, to meet with the adverse party in their own way. And for the pirates of Sallie, and those parts, he saith, it is but very lately that they found the way unto our coasts, where, by surprize, they might easily do hurt; but there hath been that provision taken by his maj. not without the care of the duke, both by force and treaty, to repress them for the time to come, as will give good satisfaction. All which he is assured, will clearly appear upon proof."

"V. To the Fifth Article the duke maketh this Answer: That about Sept. last, this ship called the St. Peter, amongst divers others, was seized on as a lawful prize by his majesty's ships, and brought into Plymouth, as ships laden by the subjects of the king of Spain: in the end of Oct. or beginning of Nov. they were all brought to the Tower of London, all of them were there unladen but the Peter, and the bulk of her goods was not stirred, because they were challenged by the subjects of the French king; and there did not then appear so much proof against her, and the goods in her, as against the rest. About the middle of Nov. allegations were generally put in against them all in the Admiralty-court, to justify the seizure; and all the pretendants were called in: upon these proceedings, divers of the ships and goods were condemned, and divers were released in a legal course; and others of them were in suspence till full proof made. The 28th of Dec. complaint was made on the behalf of some Frenchmen at the council-board, concerning this ship and others, when the king, by advice of his council (his maj. being present in person) did order, That the ship of Newhaven, called the Peter, and the goods in her, and all such other goods of the other prizes, as should be found to appertain to his maj.'s own subjects, or to the subjects of his good brother the French king, or the States of the United Provinces, or any other princes or states in friendship or alliance with his maj. should be delivered: but this was not absolute, as is supposed by the Charge, but was thus qualified, so as they were not fraudulently coloured; and it was referred to a judicial proceeding. According to this just and honourable direction, the king's advocate proceeded upon the general allegations formerly put in the 26th of Jan. after there was a sentence in the admiralty, that the Peter should be discharged; and the king's advocate, not having then any knowledge of further proof, consented to it: but this was not a definitive sentence, but a sentence interlocutory, as it is termed in that court. Within few days after, this ship prepared herself to be gone, and was falling down the river: then came new intelligence to the lord admiral by the lieut. of the Tower, that all those ships were laden by the subjects of the king of Spain; that the Amirautesco wafted them beyond the North-Cape; that they were but coloured by Frenchmen; that there were witnesses ready to make good this new allegation; neither was it improbable to be so, for part of the goods in that ship have been confessed to be lawful prize. This ship being now fallen down the river, and being a ship of the most value of all the rest, the duke acquainted the king therewith; and, by his commandment, made stay of the ship, lest otherwise it should be too late; which the duke, in the duty of his place of admiral, as he believeth, ought to have done, without such command: and if he had not done so, he might worthily have been blamed for his negligence; and then instantly he sent for the judge of the admiralty, to be informed from him, how far the sentence already passed, did bind, and whether it might stand with justice to make stay of her again, she being once discharged in such manner as before. The judge answered, as he was advised, That it might justly be done, upon better proofs appearing; yet discreetly, in a matter of that moment, he took time to give a resolute answer, that in the interim he might review the acts which had passed. The next day, or very shortly after, the judge came again to the duke, and, upon advice, answered resolutely, That the ship and goods might justly be stayed, if the proofs fell out to be answerable to the informations given; whereof, he said, he could not judge, till he had seen the depositions. And according to this resolution of the judge, did five other learned advocates, besides the king's advocate, concur in opinion, being intreated by the duke to advise thereof; so cautious was the duke not to do any unjust act. Then he acquainted the king again therewith, and his maj. commanded him to re-seize this ship, and to proceed judicially to the proofs; and the duke often required the king's advocate to hasten the examination of the witnesses; and many witnesses were produced and examined in pursuance of this new information. But the French merchants, impatient of any delay, complained again to the council-board, where it was ordered, not barely, That the ship and goods should be presently delivered, but should be delivered upon security; and, upon security, she had been then delivered, if it had been given; and security was once offered, but afterwards retracted; and when all the witnesses produced were examined, and published, the king's advocate having duly considered of them, forthwith acquainted the duke, that the proofs came too short for the Peter; and thereupon the duke instantly gave order for her final discharge, and she was discharged by order of the court accordingly.—By which true narration of the fact, and all the proceedings, the doubt hopeth it will sufficiently appear, that he hath not done any thing herein, on his part, which was not justifiable, and grounded upon deliberate and well-advised counsels and warrant. But for the doing of this to his own lucre and advantage, he utterly denieth it; for he saith, that there was nothing removed out of the ship, but some moneys, and some small boxes of stones of very mean value, and other small portable things lying above the deck, easily to be embezzled: and whatsoever was taken out of the ship, was first publicly shewed to his maj. himself, and thence committed to the custody of Gabriel Marsh, in the Article mentioned, by inventory, then and still marshal of the admiralty, by him to be safely kept; whereof the money was employed for the king's immediate service, and by his direction, and the rest was left in safe-keeping; and are all since delivered and reimbursed to the owners, or pretended owners thereof; and not a penny profit thereof, or thereby, hath come to the duke himself, as shall be made good by proof; and whereas the suggestion hath been made, That this accident was the cause of the embargo of the ships and goods of our merchants trading in France, he saith, That it is utterly mistaken; for divers of their goods were embargoed before this happened; and if, in truth, the French had therein received that loss, either they pretend, or is pretended from them, yet the embargoing of the goods of the English upon that occasion, was utterly illegal and unwarrantable; for by the mutual articles betwixt the two kings, they ought not to have righted themselves before legal complaint, and a denial on our part, and then, by way of reprisal, and not by embargo. So that the duke doth humbly leave it to the consideration of your lordships, whether the harm which hath happened to our merchants, hath not been more occasioned by the unseasonable justifying of the actions of the French, which animated them to increase their injuries, than by an act either of the duke, or any other."

"VI. To the Sixth Article, which consisted of two main points, the one of the extorting

10,000*l.* unjustly, and without right, from the East-India Company; the other, admitting the duke had a right as lord admiral, the compassing it by undue ways, and abusing the parliament, to work his private ends; the duke giveth this Answer, wherein a plain narration of the fact, he hopeth, will clear the matters objected; and in this he shall lay down no more, than will fully appear upon proof:—About the end of Michaelmas term, 1623, the duke had information given him, by a principal member of their own company, that the company had made a great advantage to themselves in the seas of East-India, and other parts of Asia and Africa, by high prizes gotten there forcibly from the Portuguese, and others; and a large part thereof was due to his maj. and to the duke as admiral, by the law; for which, neither of them had any satisfaction. Whereupon directions were given for a legal prosecution in the court of admiralty, and to proceed in such matters as should be held fittest by the advice of counsel. In the months of Dec. and Jan. in that year, divers witnesses were examined in the admiralty, according to the ordinary course of that court, to instruct and furnish informative processes in this behalf. After the 10th of March, 1623, an action was commenced in the court, in the joint names of his maj. and the admiral, founded upon the former proceeding; this was prosecuted by the king's advocate, and the demand, at first, was 15,000*l.* The action being thus framed in both their names, by advice of counsel, because it was doubted in the judgment of the counsel, whether it did more properly belong to the one, or the other, or to both; and such form of entering that action being most usual in that court, on the 28th of April 1624, the judicial agreement and sentence passed thereupon in the admiralty court, wherein the company's consent, and their own offer, plainly appeareth; so that for the second part, of the right, it were very hard to conclude that the duke had no right, contrary to the company's own consent, and the sentence of the court, founded on their agreement; unless it shall fully appear, that the company was by strong and enforced thereto, and so the money exorted. Therefore to clear that scruple, that is the matter of the suit was just, or at least so probable as the company willingly desired it for their peace, so the manner was just and honourable; your lordships are humbly intreated to observe these few true circumstances: the suit in the admiralty began divers months before the first mention of it in parliament; and some months before the beginning of it in that parliament, it was prosecuted in a legal course, and upon such grounds as will yet be maintained to be just. The composition made by the company, was not moved by the duke; but his late maj. on the behalf of himself, and of the duke, treated with divers members of the company about it, and the duke himself treated not at all with them. The company, without any compulsion at all, agreed to the composition; not that they were willing to give so much, if they might have escaped for nothing; but that they were willing to give so much, rather than to hazard the success of the suit: and upon this composition, so concluded by his maj. the company desired and obtained a pardon for all that was objected against them. The motion in parliament about the stay of the company's ships then ready prepared and furnished, was not out of any respect, to draw them the rather to the composition; but really out of an apprehension, that there might be need of their strength for the defence of the realm at home; and, if so, then all private respects must give way to the public interest. These ships, upon the importunity of the merchants, and reasons given by them, were, suffered, nevertheless, to fall down to Tilbury, by his late maj.'s directions; to speed their voyage the better, whilst they might be accommodated for this voyage, without prejudice to the public safety; and they were discharged when there was an accommodation propounded and allowed, which was, That they should forthwith prepare other ships for the home service, whilst those went over with their voyage: which they accordingly did. That the motion made in the Commons' house, was without the duke's knowledge or privy. That when there was a rumour that the duke had drawn on the composition by staying of the ships which were then gone, the duke was so much offended thereat, that he would have had the former composition to have broken off, and have proceeded in a legal course; and he sent to the company for that purpose; but the company gave him satisfaction, that they had raised no such rumour, nor would, nor could avow any such thing, and intreated him to rest satisfied with such public acts to the contrary. That after this, their ships being gone, and, being careful of their future security, they solicited the dispatch of the composition; consulted with counsel about the instruments which passed about it, and were at the charge thereof; and the money was paid long after the sentence; and the sentence given after the ships were gone; and no security given at all for the money, but the sentence; and when this money was paid to the duke, the whole sum (but 200*l.* thereof only) was borrowed by the king, and employed by his own officers, for the service of the navy. If these things do, upon proof, appear to your lordships, as he is assured they will, he humbly submitteth it to your judgments, how far verbal affirmations or informations extrajudicial, shall move your judgments, when judicial acts, and those things which were acted and executed, prove the contrary."

"VII. To the Seventh Article, which is so mixed with actions of great princes, as that he dares not in his duty publish every passage thereof, he cannot for the present make so particular an Answer as he may, hath, and will do to the rest of his Charge. But he giveth this general Answer, the truth whereof he humbly prayeth may rather appear to your lordships by the proofs, than by any discourse of his; which, in reason of state, will haply be conceived fit to be more privately handled.—That these ships were lent to the French king at first, without the duke's privy: that when he knew it, he did that which belonged to an admiral of England, and a true Englishman: and he doth deny that, by menace, or compulsion, or any other indirect or undue practice or means, he, by himself, or by any others, did deliver those ships, or any of them, into the hands of the French, as is objected against him. That the error which did happen, by what direction soever it were, was not in the intention any ways injurious or dishonourable, or dangerous to this state, or prejudicial to any private man, interested in any of those ships; nor could have given any such offence at all if those promises had been observed by others, which were professed and really performed by his maj. and his subjects on their parts."

"VIII. To the Eighth Article, wherein he is taxed to have practised for the employment of the ships against Rochel, he answereth:—That he was so far from practising or consenting that the said ships should so be employed, that he shall make it clearly appear, that when it was discovered that they would be employed against those of the religion, the protestation of the French king being otherwise, and their pretence being that there was a peace concluded with those of the religion, and that the French king would use those ships against Genoa, which had been an action of no ill consequence to the affairs of Christendom, the duke did, by all fit and honourable means, endeavour to divert that course of their employment against Rochel, and he doth truly and boldly affirm, that his endeavours, under the royal care of his most excellent maj. have been a great part of the means to preserve the town of Rochel; as the proofs, when they shall be produced, will make appear. And when his maj. did find, that, beyond his intention, and contrary to the faithful promises of the French, they were so misemployed, he found himself bound in honour to intercede with the most christian king, his good brother, for the peace of that town, and of the religion, lest his maj.'s honour might otherwise suffer; which intercession his maj. did so sedulously, and so successfully pursue, that the town and the religion there do, and will, acknowledge the fruits thereof. And whereas it is further objected against him, That when in so unfaithful a manner he had delivered those ships into the power of a foreign state, to the danger of the religion, and scandal and dishonour of our nation, (which he utterly denieth to be so) that to mask his ill intentions, in a cunning and cautelous manner, he abused the parliament at Oxford, in affirming before the committee of both houses, That the said ships were not, nor should be so used or employed, he saith, under the favour of those who so understood his word, That he did not then use those words, which are expressed in the Charge to have been spoken by him; but there being then a jealousy of the mis-employing of those ships, the duke having no knowledge thereof, and knowing well what the promises of the French king were, but was not then seasonable to be published, he hoping they would not have varied from what was promised, did say, that the event would show that it was no undertaking for them; but a declaration of that in general terms which should really have been performed, and which his maj. had just cause to expect from them."

"IX. To the Ninth Article, That the duke did compel the lord Robartes to buy his Title of Honour;—He utterly denieth it; and he is very confident, the lord Robartes himself will not affirm it, or any thing tending that way; neither can he, nor any man else, truly say so. But the said duke is able to prove, That the lord Robartes was willing before to have given a much greater sum, but could not then obtain it; and he did now obtain it by solicitation of his own agents."

"X. To the Tenth Article, For the selling of Places of Judicature by the duke, which are specially instanced in the Charge, he answereth:—That he received not, nor had a penny of either of those sums to his own use; but the truth is, the lord Mandeville was made lord treasurer by his late maj. without contracting for any thing for it; and after that he had the office conferred upon him, his late maj. moved him to lend him 20,000*l.* upon promise of repayment at the end of a year; the lord Mandeville yielded it, so as he might have the duke's word that it should be repaid unto him accordingly. The duke gave his word for it; the lord Mandeville relied upon it; and delivered the said sum to the hands of Mr. Porter, then attending upon the duke, by the late king's appointment, to be disposed as his maj. should direct: and according to the king's direction, that very money was paid out to others, and the duke neither had, nor disposed of a penny thereof to his own use, as is suggested against him. And afterwards, when the lord Mandeville left that place, and his money was not repaid unto him, he urged the duke upon his promise; whereupon the duke being jealous of his honour, and to keep his word, not having money to pay him, he assured lands of his own to the lord Mandeville for his security: but when the duke was in Spain, the lord Mandeville obtained a promise from his late maj. of some lands in free farm, to such a value, as he accepted of the same in satisfaction of the said money, which were afterwards passed unto him; and, at the duke's return, the lord Mandeville delivered back unto him the security of the duke's lands, which had been given unto him as aforesaid. And for the 6000*l.* supposed to have been received by the duke, for procuring to the earl of Middlesex the mastership of the wards, he utterly denieth it; but afterwards he heard that the earl of Middlesex did disburse 6000*l.* about that time, and his late maj. bestowed the same upon sir Henry Mildmay, his servant, without the duke's privy; and he had it and enjoyed it, and no penny thereof came to the said duke, or to his use."

"XI. To the Eleventh Article the duke answereth; That it is true, that his late maj. out of his royal favour unto him, having honoured the duke himself with many titles and dignities of his bounty; and, as a greater argument of his princely grace, did also think fit to honour those, who were in equal degree of blood with him, and also to ennoble their mother, who was the stock that bare them. The title of countess of Bucks, bestowed upon his mother, was not without precedent; and she hath nothing from the crown but a title of honour, which dieth with her. The titles bestowed on the visc. Purbeck, the duke's elder brother, were conferred upon him, when he was a servant of the bed-chamber to his now maj. then prince, by his highness's means: the earl of Anglesey was of his late majesty's bed-chamber; and the honours and lands conferred on him were done when the duke was in Spain. The earl of Denbigh hath the honours mentioned in the Charge; but he hath not a foot of land which came from the crown, or of the king's grant. But if it were true that the duke had procured honours for those who are so near and dear unto him, the law of nature, and the king's royal favour, he hopeth, will plead for his excuse; and he rather believeth he were worthy to be condemned in the opinion of all generous minds, if, being in such favour with his master, he had minded only his own advancement, and had neglected those who were nearest unto him."

"XII. To the Twelfth Article his Answer is,—That he doth humbly, and with all thankfulness acknowledge the bountiful hand of his late maj. unto him; for which he oweth so much to the memory of that deceased king, his most excellent maj. that now is, and their posterity, that he shall willingly render back whatsoever he hath received, together with his life, to do them service: but for the immense sums and values which are suggested to have been given unto him, he saith, There are very great mistakings in the calculations, which are in the Schedules in this Article mentioned; unto which the duke will apply particular Answers in another Schedule, which shall express the truth of every particular, as near as he can collect the same, to which he referreth himself; whereby it shall appear, what a great disproportion there is between conjectures and certainties: and those gifts which he hath received, though he confesseth that they exceed his merit, yet they exceed not precedents of former times. But whatsoever it is he hath, or hath had, he utterly denieth that he obtained the same, or any part thereof, by any undue solicitation or practice, or did unduly obtain any release of any sums of money he received; but he having, at several times, and upon several occasions, disposed of divers sums of the moneys of his late maj. and of his maj. that now is, by their private directions, he hath releases thereof for his discharge; which was honourable and gracious in their majesties, who granted the same for their servant's indemnity; and, he hopeth, was not unfit for him to accept of, lest, in future times, he, or his, might be charged therewith, when he could not be able to give so clear an account thereof, as he hopeth he shall now well be able to do."

"XIII. To the Thirteenth Article of the Charge, which is set forth in such an expression of words, as might argue an extraordinary guiltiness in the duke; who, by such infinite bonds of duty and thankfulness, was obliged to be tender of the life and health of his most dread and dear sovereign and master, he maketh this clear and true answer,—That he did neither apply nor procure the plaister or posset-drink, in the Charge termed to be a potion, unto his late maj. nor was present when the same was first taken or applied: but the truth is this; that his maj. being sick of an ague, took notice of the duke's recovery of an ague not long before, and asked him how he had recovered, and what he found did him most good? The duke gave him a particular answer thereto, and that one, who was the earl of Warwick's physician, had ministred a plaister and posset-drink to him; and the chief thing that did him good was a vomit; which he wished the king had taken in the beginning of his sickness. The king was very desirous to have that plaister and posset-drink sent for; but the duke delayed it: whereupon the king impatiently asked, Whether it was sent for or not? And finding by the duke's speeches he had not sent for it, his late maj. sent John Baker the duke's servant, and, with his own mouth, commanded him to go for it: whereupon the duke besought his maj. not to make use of it but by the advice of his own physicians, nor until it should be tried by James Palmer, of his bed-chamber, who was then sick of an ague, and upon two children in the town; which the king said he would do. In this resolution the duke left his maj. and went to London; and in the mean time, in his absence, the plaister and posset-drink was brought and applied by his late majesty's own command. At the duke's return his maj. was in taking the posset-drink, and the king then commanded the duke to give it him; which he did in presence of some of the king's physicians, they then no ways seeming to dislike it, the same drink being first tasted of by some of them, and divers others in the king's bed-chamber: and he thinks this was the second time the king took it. Afterwards, when the king grew somewhat worse than before, the duke heard a rumour as if his physic had done the king hurt, and that the duke had ministred that physic to him without advice. The duke acquainted the king therewith; to whom the king, with much discontent, answered thus, 'They are worse than devils that say it.' So far from the truth it was; which now notwithstanding, as it seemeth, is taken up again by some, and with much confidence affirmed. And here the duke humbly prayeth all your lordships, not only to consider the truth of this Answer, but also to commiserate the sad thought which this Article had revived in him.

" This being the plain, clear, and evident truth of all those things which are contained and particularly expressed in his Charge, the rest being general and requiring no Answer: and he being well assured that he hath herein affirmed nothing which he shall not make good by proof, in such way as your lordships shall direct, doth humbly refer it to the judgment of your lordships, how full of danger and prejudice it is to give too ready an ear, and too easy a belief unto reports or testimony without oath, which are not of weight enough to condemn any. He humbly acknowledgeth how easy it was for him in his younger years, and unexperienced, to fall into thousands of errors in those ten years wherein he had the honour to serve so great and open-hearted a sovereign and master; but the fear of Almighty God, his sincerity in the true religion established in the church of England, (though accompanied with many weaknesses and imperfections, which he is not ashamed humbly and heartily to confess) his awfulness not willing to offend so good and gracious a master, and his love and duty to his country, have restrained and preserved him, he hopeth, from running into heinous and high misdemeanors and crimes: but whatsoever, upon examination and mature deliberation, they shall appear to be; lest in any thing, unwittingly, within the compass of so many years, he shall have offended, he humbly prayeth your lordships, not only in those, but as to all the said misdemeanors, misprisions, offences, and crimes wherewith he standeth charged before your lordships, to allow him the benefit of the free and general pardon, granted by his late maj. in parliament in the 21st year of his reign, out of which he is not excepted; and of the gracious pardon of his now maj. granted to the said duke, and vouchsafed in like manner to all his subjects at the time of his most happy inauguration and coronation; which said pardon, under the Great Seal of England, granted to the said duke, beareth date the 10th day of Feb. now last past, and is here shewn forth unto your lordships, on which he doth most humbly rely; and yet he hopeth your lordships, in your justice and honour, upon which with confidence he puts himself, will acquit him of and from those misdemeanors, offences, misprisions, and crimes wherewith he hath been charged; and he hopeth, and will daily pray, that for the future he shall, by God's grace, so watch over his actions, both public and private, that he shall give no just offence to any." [Here follows the Answer of the Duke to these Grants and Gifts contained in the Schedule referred to in the 12th Article.]

After the reading of the above Answer, the duke made a short speech, desiring their lordships to expedite the examination of his cause, and then withdrew himself and departed.

Further Proceedings in the Earl of Bristol's

Trial.] June 8. p. m. the earl of Bristol, being before their lordships at the bar, desired leave to move two points: The one, touching the Charge of Treason against himself; the other, touching the Articles exhibited by him, (as an ambas-ador) against the duke of Buckingham, for his unfaithfulness to the king and state.—As touching the first, he made a large discourse, shewing the manner of his restraint, as in his former speech of May 6th, and that he was not charged with Treason until he first exhibited his Petition to the house, wherein he accused the duke of Buckingham; and that thereupon he was immediately sent for up as a delinquent, contrary to all former proceedings that he ever observed: and it being contrary to the order of this house, to be restrained of his liberty, unless it be for treason or the like, he is therefore charged with treason; and hereupon he besought their lordships to consider how prejudicial this precedent might prove to all their liberties; and that he might have a speedy trial by parliament, for that he feared no man would be of his counsel if the parliament were once ended; and that it might be determined whether his case be treason or not.—As touching the duke of Buckingham, he shewed that his accusation of him is no recrimination, for he originally intended it two or three years since; neither hath the duke any charge depending against him. Then he recited the particulars of Mr. Attorney's Charge against him, and that, whereas he is charged with the prince's journey into Spain, with seeking to convert the prince to popery, and the loss of the Palatinate; he doth charge the duke with plotting with Gondomar, to bring the prince into Spain and to convert him to Popery; and that the duke is in more fault than any other for the loss of the Palatinate.—And that whilst he was in Spain, he wrote to the late king of the duke's unfaithfulness; so that it cannot now be said to be a recrimination.—That yet he is restrained and used as a traitor; and contrariwise, the duke of Buckingham, accused of treason by him, (a public minister of state) hath his liberty.—Then he made two requests unto their lordships; the one, that there might be an equality between him and the duke herein; the other, that Mr. Attorney might proceed against the duke upon his accusation; and he would not only prove the duke's unfaithfulness to the late king and his maj.; but that the Narration which the duke made to both houses in the late parliament is very false."

The earl, having concluded his speech, delivered a petition, which was read, in hæc verba:

" To the Right Hon. the Lords of the Higher House of Parliament. The Humble Petition of John Earl of Bristol.

" 1. Humbly beseeching your lordships that you will be pleased to declare, whether the matter of the Charge against him be Treason or no; and that if your lordships shall adjudge it not to be treason, that the words 'Traitor' and 'traiterously' may be struck out of the Charge; and some such course taken, as to your lordships shall seem meet for the speedy prosecution and bringing of the cause to hearing.

2. That his own and sir Walter Aston's dispatches might be brought into the court, (being his chiefest evidence) to be used for his defence.

3. That if Mr. Attorney, by his reply, shall give the earl occasion to declare, for his justification, such matters of secrecy and mysteries of state as are not proper to be divulged; your lordships will then be pleased to move his maj. to signify his pleasure, to whom and in what manner it shall be declared.

4. And that the earl may have leave to come with Mr. Maxwell to the house, or wait upon the committees when he shall find it needful for the prosecution of his cause, attending your lordships leisure.

BRISTOL."

The Petition being read, the earl was withdrawn, and the house being put into a committee, it was read again in parts, and fully debated: The house being resumed, it was read again; and these 4 Answers were made unto the 4 several parts of the said Petition, and ordered as followeth, viz.—1. The house to sit to-morrow at 8, and such witnesses to be sworn as Mr. Attorney or the earl of Bristol shall procure; and then the committee to proceed to take the examinations; and the Answer to the rest of this part of the Petition to be deferred to further consideration, after a full examination taken by the committee, and reported to the house.

2. All such dispatches as Mr. Attorney shall make use of against the earl, to be used by the said earl for his defence; and the house to be suitors to the king for any other dispatches, to be brought hither for the said earl's defence, as he shall particularly name.

3. When any such occasion shall be offered, the house will then consider what course to take herein.

4. This is to be granted.

These being thus agreed and ordered by the house, and their lordships having also agreed to give the e. of Bristol a reason why the first part of his said Petition is not fully answered; the e. of Bristol was brought again before their lordships, and the lord keeper signified the said orders unto him: and, having read the first, told him, That the house had not fully granted the first part of this Petition, for two reasons, both in favour to his lordship: The 1st. that they are loth to proceed to declare their opinions or judgments upon the bare charge of Mr. Attorney, before the true case appears upon the proofs: The 2nd, for that if they should declare his cause to be Treason, then his testimony against the d. of Buckingham would be weakened; and the lord keeper having read the 2nd 3rd and 4th orders also, the e. of Bristol gave their lordships humble thanks, and so was withdrawn.

The Lord Conway gives in his Answer to the E. of Bristol's Charge against him. June 18. The lord Conway put their lordships in mind of several Articles delivered to them by the earl of Bristol against himself, the 1st.

of May last; and besought the lords that he might then give in his Answer to the same; which being granted, it was read in hæc verba:

"The ANSWER of the Lord CONWAY to the ELEVEN ARTICLES, delivered against him into the Upper House of Parliament by the Earl of BRISTOL, the 1st day of May. (See p. 88.)"

"I. To the First Article he saith;—He doth acknowledge to owe a great deal of respect, love, and service, to the d. of Buckingham; and doth well remember that a worthy gentleman did invite him to endeavour the reconciliation of the e. of Bristol with the duke; to which also he made answer, That he had both affection and readiness to do all the good offices in his power, and that for the general duty which every man oweth to the works of reconciliation, and for other special motives, as being born in one and the same county, of long acquaintance, nothing having ever passed between the persons of the e. of Bristol and the lord C. but demonstrations of goodwill, and an interest of blood being between the lord C.'s children and the earl, acknowledging withal many lovely parts and powers in him: and it is not unlikely but the lord C. might say, (according to the ingenuous freedom which he useth and cherisheth in himself) that if things should not be reconciled, but break out into opposition between the duke and the earl, he must then declare his greater love to be to the duke than to him; but this the lord C. limited to their particular persons, and hopes it cannot, by any justice, be interpreted to stain him as he is a public minister, a magistrate, or a peer of the realm. All offices and obligations, in those respects, he owes to God and the king, but to no subject; and doth profess and is confident he hath paid them hitherto; and hopes in God to continue so with unblameable integrity."

"II. To the Second Article he saith,—That the artifice the e. of Bristol useth, in mingling truth with untruth, makes it hard to clear it without much prolixity; which the lord C. thinks this Article not worthy of, comparing it with the honour and reverence he owes to this great and noble council; yet, by your lordships good favours he gives it this Answer, That he verily believes he never wrote in those terms of being a secretary by the duke's creation; although he never was, nor is, unapt to acknowledge infinite obligations to the duke, for his favours freely conferred upon him; which he was ever, as he is yet, ready to testify by all due attributes and expressions; but for the lord C. to have acknowledged this in those terms, had been to have forgotten what he owed to his gracious master of glorious memory; who when he gave him the seals, in the presence of divers lords of the council (the duke being also present) told him, and took the duke to witness, that it was his own proper choice to make my lord C. his secretary: yet it may well be when our now gracious king and the duke were in Spain, his late maj. having commanded the lord C. to write, that they both might know it, that he had appointed him only to be secretary to receive the dispatches from thence and return the answers, that he might then write to the duke that he was his secretary: and as to the beginning of the lord C.'s letters, with Gracious Patron, which the e. of Bristol is pleased to note, it is true that, ever since the king gave him the creation of duke (which carries the style of grace) the lord C. hath given him that title, with the addition of patron; with as true and plain a heart as it is given ordinarily in other countries, without particular intention or meaning: and the first time that ever the lord C. gave this style, was, when his late maj. told him, he must in his letters give the duke the style of grace; and that this letter he showed to his maj. and 20 others of the same style, and his maj. neither reproved it nor forbid it."

"III. To the Third Article he saith;—That it is a scandalous Article without foundation; and that the lord C. never did any thing to keep the e. of Bristol from his late maj.'s presence, but by express commandment from his maj. which, as he was secretary, he conceives to be sufficient warrant."

"IV. To the Fourth Article he saith;—This is in all a scandal; and in one part unthankfully and untruly wrested; for Mr. Grisley, coming to the lord C. under the pretext of faith and confidence, for advice, to know of him whether it might be safe for his lord, upon consideration of several restraints and leaves, to come to London to follow his business; hereupon the lord C. answered him in the presence of God (as a man that would not betray another to save his own head) that he thought he might not safely come without leave from his maj.; but this advice he gave as a friend, not as a secretary, nor any way from his maj. or in his name."

"V. To the Fifth Article he saith,—He denies the Charge in general; and, for that part, touching his speaking with the duke, he remembereth that the earl of Bristol did, in the postscript of a letter, desire him to move his maj. in that point; but the lord Conway conceiving the state of affairs to stand so between the earl and the duke, that good respect required that an office of grace to the earl should not pass without the knowledge of the duke, it is possible he might stay the opportunity to acquaint the duke; it being no part of his duty to his master of glorious memory, but a thing free in the choice of him, the lord C. to do or not, and further, the lord C. doth verily believe, that he was informed that it was the desire of the earl that the duke should be made acquainted with it."—To the rest of this Article he answereth, "That it gives him, the lord C. the first notice of any displeasure taken by his late maj. against him, for not moving him; or that he should call the denying the earl leave a barbarous act: and the lord C. denies that he retarded the leave from his maj.; but so soon as he received the warrant, he obeyed it, without any clause or limitations more than the king commanded; and that he delayed not the dispatch of it."

"VI. To the Sixth Article he saith;—It appears by the e. of Bristol's acknowledging that he was directed to the lord C. for his business, that the king had not found any fault in the lord C.'s handling of the e. of Bristol's occasions, as is alledged in the 5th Article; and for the lord C.'s refusing to do any thing without the duke, it is true that the duke being so far engaged by the relation he made to both houses of parliament, in the presence, and with the assistance, avowal and testimony, (in many things) of the then prince, now our gracious king; his late maj. commanded the lord C. that nothing should be moved or done in the e. of Bristol's business, without the knowledge of the duke."

"VII. To the Seventh Article he saith,—It is true that commissioners were appointed to forming the Charge against the earl of Bristol in sundry articles; which were the longer in handling by reason that some of the commissioners were at London, for occasions of the king's service, and the lord Conway tyed to attend the court; yet the lord C. did come expressly to London, to attend the committee, to give the business the greater expedition; and doubted not but the commissioners will witness that the lord C. did shew all manner of forwardness to give speed to that work: and as touching the king's promises, the lord C. knows of any thing of them, but he well knows that the king bestowed the reading of all the Charges and Answers, both at large and in brief, directed to his maj.; and doth verily believe, that if the earl of Bristol's Answers had been as full as to have admitted no reply, his maj. would have presently put an end to the earl's business; especially if he had promised it, as is alledged. Touching the commissioners' Declaration, the lord C. never heard any one of them declare himself satisfied; and the earl of Bristol's Answers being given to the king, it was in his majesty's heart and pleasure to give directions; which, if the lord C. had ever received he would have obeyed them; but the commissioners had done their work in forming the Charge; and for ought the lord C. knows, had neither warrant nor matter to proceed farther upon. The lord C. knows of no notice of the duke of Buckingham, to the earl mentioned in this Article; nor was ever made acquainted with, or believes there was any; and, for himself, when the supposed articles are made appear, as is undertaken, the lord C. will be ready to make his just Answer."

"VIII. To the Eighth Article he saith;—He never knew or heard of any such solemn protestation of the king, touching the admitting of the e. of Bristol to his presence; but his late maj. told the lord Conway, That there was a further Charge to be laid against the said earl, which, perhaps, the lord C. might accordingly write unto him: the king never gave the lord C. directions for any further charge, but moving his maj. upon some solicitation of the e. of Bristol, his maj. was pleased to answer, that the earl was upon other ways and solicitations; by which the lord C. took himself to be discharged of that business, and, perhaps, answered the earl of Bristol so."

"IX. To the Ninth Article he saith; He knows not what passed from the earl of Bristol to his maj. or from his maj. to him, by the duke's hand; but for his majesty's letter, which the lord Conway acknowledgeth passed through his hands, there was nothing inserted but by the king's directions; and the letter read, approved, and signed by his maj.: for the latter part of this Article, the lord C. refers himself to his Answer to the 4th Article, where the same charge is laid against him."

"X. To the Tenth Article he saith, That the Treaty for marrying the king of Bohemia's eldest son with the emperor's daughter, and bringing him up in that court, was handled by the lord Baltimore; and the lord Conway had never any part in that treaty, nor knew that his maj. gave consent to it, or advised it; but on the contrary, he ever understood that his maj. was against the breeding of the young prince in the emperor's court; and ever said, That he would take upon him the care of his breeding: but the lord Baltimore giving an account of that treaty, by his letter to his maj. then at Newmarket, and there being then a dispatch going for Spain, his maj. commanded the lord C. to send that dispatch from the lord Baltimore, in the packet to the earl of Bristol, which is all the lord C. had to do in it; and the lord Baltimore being a party in the treaty, and a commissioner in forming the Charge against the earl of Bristol, the earl may as well take exceptions against him and the rest of the commissioners, as against the lord C. for that part of the Charge: but the earl of Bristol is not charged for conforming himself to his maj. and his proceedings here, in that point; but further, for moving it, and carrying it in such a fashion in Spain, as sir W. Aston told him, 'He durst not consent to it for his head': For the late letter from his maj. the lord C. answereth, That he did nothing therein but by direction from his maj. and by his majesty's own words or pen."

"XI. To the Eleventh Article he saith;—That he never sent any dispatches to the earl of Bristol into Spain, without his majesty's directions, and first shewing them unto his maj. and receiving his approbation and warrant of them; whose judgment would not have let dubious or entrapping directions pass him without reformation; and if the earl be charged with any thing more than the directions import, the dispatches will clear that: but the lord Conway conceives that the cause of the earl of Bristol's troubles proceeds, truly, from his own large promises on the behalf of Spain and the emperor, and the little grounds the effects shew he had for drawing of his maj. into so deep and disadvantageous engagements"—The lord C. having thus made a true and clear Answer to the several Articles exhibited against him, he humbly leaveth the same to your lordships grave consideration; reserving to himself, as well all just advantages against any part of those Articles in the varieties and contradiction of the Charge; as also, the supply of any thing in these his humble Answers that may be defective in point of form; or which, by further instance, or doubtful interpretation, may require a clearer explanation."

This Answer being read, it was ordered, 'That the earl of Bristol may reply thereunto if he pleases.'—We shall not trouble the reader with the other proceedings in the earl of Bristol's Cause, as they were no way momentous; and since, in a few days time, a great blow from above rendered all these Trials abortive We shall, therefore, turn back to the Commons, and see what they were about, before the king thought proper to put an end to this parliament.

The Duke of Bucks further Defence upon the 7th Article.] June 9. The Commons dispatched the chancellor of the duchy to the lords, to desire a copy of the duke's Answer, that, upon consideration thereof, a Reply might be made by them, with as much speed as possible. The lords said, That they would take this Message into consideration with all speed. Hereupon the d. of Buckingham stood up, and declared, "That for the better clearing of his honour and fidelity to the state, in that part of his Charge which is objected against him by the 7th Article, he hath been an earnest and humble suitor to his maj. to give him leave in his proofs, to unfold the whole truth and secret of that great action; and hath obtained his majesty's gracious leave therein: and accordingly doth intend to make such open and clear proof thereof, that he nothing doubteth, but the same, when it shall appear, will not only clear him from blame, but be a testimony of his care and faithfulness, in serving the state."

The King's Letter to the Speaker to hasten the Supply.] The same day a Letter from the King was delivered to the Speaker, the tenor whereof was as follows: "Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well;—Our house of commons cannot forget how often, and how earnestly, we have called upon them for the speeding of that Aid which they intended us for our great and weighty affairs, concerning the safety and honour of us and our kingdoms: and now the time being so far spent, that, unless it be presently concluded, it can neither bring us money nor credit by the time which themselves have fixed, which is the last of this month; and being further deferred would be of little use, we being daily advertised from all parts, of the great preparations of the enemy ready to assail us: we hold it necessary, by these our letters, to give them our last and final admonition, and to let them know, that we shall account all further delays and excuses to be express denials. And therefore we will and require you to signify unto them, that we do expect that they forthwith bring in their bill of Subsidy, to be passed without delay or condition, so as it may fully pass the house by the end of the next week at the furthest: which if they do not, it will force us to take other resolutions. But let them know, if they finish this according to our desire that we are resolved to let them sit together for the dispatch of their other affairs so long as the season will permit; and, after their recess, to bring them together again the next winter. And, if by their denial or delay, any thing of ill consequence shall fall out either at home or abroad, we call God and man to witness that we have done our part to prevent it, by calling our people together to advise with us; by opening the weight of our occasions unto them, and by requiring their timely help and assistance in these actions wherein we stand engaged by their own counsels: and we will and command you, that this letter be read publicly in the house."

June 10. The copy of the duke's Answer was brought down to the commons, by Mr. baron Trevor and sir C. Caesar; and they further signified, "That the duke had made a request to their lordships, which they, also, recommended to this house, that the commons would proceed, with all expedition, in their Reply to this Answer; that so they might go on with business of much higher concern."—By the further proceedings on the Journals, the Commons seem to have fallen upon the consideration of the duke's Answer immediately; though nothing is particularly entered about it. At this time, also, they had prepared a Petition to the king concerning Popish Recusants; a business they had, from time to time, been upon, ever since the beginning of this session. And, having perfected their list, it was presented to his maj. along with their petition.

The Commons' Answer to the King's Letter to their Speaker.] The next thing of note the commons went upon was to prepare a Declaration, by way of Answer to the King's Letter for Supply. This was read in the house and agreed to, June 14th, and ordered to be presented to his maj. by the Speaker, attended by the whole house. Accordingly, on the 15th of June, Mr. Maxwell, gentleman usher of the black rod, came down to the commons and acquainted them, "That the lords desired them to come up to them, to hear a commission read for the Dissolution of this Parliament." Whereupon, Mr. Speaker, with the house, went up accordingly.—We shall give the Speaker's oration to the king, on the delivery of the Declaration; as above mentioned, from Rushworth, since we have no other authority; viz.

"Most gracious and dread sovereign;—According to that liberty of access and liberty of speech, which your maj. and your royal progenitors have ever vouchsafed to your house of commons; your majesty's most humble and loyal subjects, the commons now assembled in parliament, have been suitors for this access to your royal throne. And out of their consideration of the nature, and of the weight and importance of the business, they have thought the attendance of the whole house, with their Speaker, not too solemn; and yet they have not thought fit barely to commit those words, which express their thoughts, to the trust of any man's speech; but are bold to present them in writing to your gracious hands, that they may not vanish, but be more lasting than the most powerful words of a more able speaker are like to be.—I have much to read, and shall therefore, as little as I can, weary your maj. with speeches. This parchment contains two things, the one by way of Declaration, to give your maj. an account and humble satisfaction of their clear and sincere endeavours and intentions in your majesty's service; and the other an humble Petition to your maj. for the removal of that great person, the duke of Buckingham, from access to your royal presence.—For the first, They beseech your most excellent maj. to believe, that no earthly thing is so dear and precious to them, as that your maj. should retain them in your grace and good opinion; and it is grief to them, beyond my expression, that any misinformation, or misinterpretation, should at any time render their words or proceedings offensive to your maj. It is not proper for any one to hear the echo of a voice, that hears not the voice; and if echoes be sometimes heard to double and redouble, the echo of the echo is still fainter, and sounds not louder.—I need not make the application: words mis-reported, though by an echo, or but an echo of an echo, at a third or fourth hand, have oft a louder sound than the voice itself; and may sound disloyalty, though the voice had nothing undutiful or disloyal in it. Such misinformations, they fear, have begot interruptions and diversions, which have delayed the ripening and expediting of those great counsels, which concern your majesty's important service, and have enforced this declaration.—I pass from that to the Petition, in which my purpose is not to urge those reasons, which your maj. may hear expressed in their own words, in the language of the people. I am only directed to offer to your great wisdom, and deep judgment, that this Petition of theirs is such, as may stand with your majesty's honour and justice to grant. Your maj. hath been pleased to give many royal testimonies and arguments to the world, how good and gracious a master you are; and that, which the queen of Sheba once said to the wisest king, may without flattery be said to your maj. 'Happy are those servants which stand continually before you.'—But the relations by which your maj. stands in a gracious aspect towards your people, do far transcend and are more prevalent and binding, than any relation of a master towards a servant; and to hear and satisfy the just and necessary desires of your people, is more honourable than any expression of grace to a servant. To be a master of a servant, is communicable to many of your subjects; to be king of a people, is regal, and incommunicable to subjects. Your maj. is truly stiled by that name, which the greatest emperors, though they borrowed names and titles from those countries which they gained by conquest, most delighted in, pater patriæ. And the desires of children are preferred before those of servants; for the servant abideth not in the house for ever; but the son abideth ever. The government of a king was truly termed by your royal father, 'A politic marriage between him and his people;' and, I may safely say, There was never a better union between a married pair, than is between your maj. and your people."

The Lords Petition to the King against dissolving the Parliament.] When the lords had notice of the commission for dissolving this parliament, the house seemed to be much concerned at it; and, immediately, joined in a humble Remonstrance to the king to prevent it. The tenor whereof followeth:

"May it please your excellent majesty;—We your faithful and loyal subjects, the peers of this kingdom, having received this morning a Message from your maj. intimating an intention to dissolve this parliament; remembering that we are your maj.'s hereditary great council of the kingdom, do conceive, that we cannot deserve your maj.'s gracious opinion expressed in this Message unto us, nor discharge our duty to God, your maj. and our country, if, after expression of our great and universal sorrow, we did not humbly offer our loyal and faithful advice to continue this parliament; by which those great and apparent dangers at home and abroad, signified unto us by your maj.'s command, may be prevented, and your maj. made happy in the duty and love of your people, which we hold the greatest safety and treasury of a king; for the effecting whereof, our humble and faithful endeavour shall never be wanting."

The King dissolves the Parliament.] This Petition was presented to the king by the earl of Manchester, lord president of the council, with the earls of Pembroke, Carlisle, and Holland; who besought his maj. to give audience to the 'Whole House of Peers' on this account: but the king answered, 'That his resolution was to hear no motion for that purpose; but that he would dissolve the parliament.' Accordingly a commission, in the usual form, under the great seal, was sent to the house of lords, whereby an end was put to this parliament. Sanderson, in his life of Charles I. says, that the king's words to the lords, who came to intercede for a longer sitting, were, 'No, not a Minute!' And that on the very day the parliament was dissolved, the earl of Arundel was confined to his house, and the earl of Bristol committed to the Tower by the king's order.

The King's Reasons for dissolving the Parliament.] Rushworth has left us a copy of a Remonstrance, which, he says, the commons intended to have presented to the king; as also another of a Declaration from his maj. containing his Reasons for the Dissolution of this and the foregoing parliaments. They were as follows:

"THE KING'S DECLARATION.

"The king's most excellent maj. since his happy access to the imperial crown of this realm, having, by his royal authority, summoned and assembled two several parliaments; the first whereof was in Aug. last, by adjournment held at Oxford, and there dissolved; and the other begun in Feb. last, and continued until the 15th of this present June, and then, to the unspeakable grief of himself, and, as he believeth, of all his good and well affected subjects, dissolved also: although he well knoweth, that the calling, adjourning, proroguing, and dissolving of parliaments, being his great council of the kingdom, do peculiarly belong unto himself, by an undoubted prerogative, inseparably united to his imperial crown; of which, as of his other royal actions, he is not bound to give an account to any but to God only, whose immediate lieutenant and vicegerent he is in these realms and dominions, by the Divine Providence committed to his charge and government, yet so far as, by the assistance of the Almighty, his purpose is so to order himself, and all his actions, especially in the great and public actions of state, concerning the weal of his kingdoms, as may justify himself, not only to his own conscience, and to his own people, but to the whole world, his maj. hath thought it fit and necessary, as the affairs now stand both at home and abroad, to make a true, plain, and clear Declaration of the causes which moved his maj. to assemble, and after enforced him to dissolve these parliaments; that so the mouth of malice itself may be stopped, and the doubts and fears of his own good subjects at home, and of his friends and allies abroad, may be satisfied, and the deserved blame of these so unhappy accidents may light upon the authors thereof.—When his maj. by the death of his dear and royal father, of ever-blessed memory, first came to the crown, he found himself engaged in a war with a potent enemy, not undertaken rashly, nor without just and honourable grounds, but enforced for the necessary defence of himself and his dominions, for the support of his friends and allies, for the redeeming of the ancient honour of this nation, for the recovering of the patrimony of his dear sister, her consort, and their children, injuriously and under colour of treaties and friendship, taken from them, and for the maintenance of the true religion; and invited thereunto, and encouraged therein, by the humble advice of both houses of parl. and by their large promises and protestations to his late majesty, to give him full and real assistance in those enterprizes, which were of so great importance to this realm, and to the general peace and safety of all his friends and allies: but when his maj. entered into a view of his

treasure, he found how ill provided he was to proceed effectually with so great an action, unless he might be assured to receive such supplies from his loving subjects, as might enable him to manage the same.—Hereupon his maj. being willing to tread in the steps of his royal progenitors, for the making of good and wholesome laws for the better government of his people, for the right understanding of their true Grievances, and for the Supply of Monies to be employed for those public services, he did resolve to summon a parliament with all the convenient speed he might; and finding a former parliament already called in the life of his father, he was desirous, for the speedier dispatch of his weighty affairs, and gaining of time, to have continued the same, without any alteration of the members thereof, had he not been advised to the contrary by his judges and counsel at law; for that it had been subject to question in law, which he desired to avoid: but, as soon as possibly he could, he summoned a new parliament; which he did with much confidence and assurance of the love of his people, that those (who had, not long before, with some importunity, won his father to break off his former Treaties with Spain, and, to effect it, had used the mediation of his now maj. being then prince, and a member of the parl. and had promised in parliament their utmost assistance for the enabling of his late majesty to undergo the war, which they then foresaw might follow) would assuredly have performed it to his now maj.; and would not have suffered him, in his first enterprize of so great an expectation, to have run the least hazard through their defaults.—This parliament (after some adjournment, by reason of his maj.'s unavoidable occasions interposing) being assembled on the 18th day of June, it is true, that his commons in parliament, taking into their due and serious consideration the manifold occasions which, at his first entry, did press his maj.; and his most important affairs, which, both at home and abroad, were then in action; did, with great readiness and alacrity, as a pledge of their most bounden duty and thankfulness, and as the first fruits of the most dutiful affections of his loving and loyal subjects, devoted to his service, present his maj. with the free and cheerful gift of 2 entire Subsidies; which their gift, and much more the freeness and heartiness expressed in the giving thereof, his maj. did thankfully and lovingly accept: but when he had more narrowly entered into the consideration of his great affairs, wherein he was embarked, and from which he could not, without much dishonour and disadvantage, withdraw his hand, he found that this sum of money was much short of that which, of necessity, must be presently expended, for the setting forward of those great actions; which, by advice of his council, he had undertaken, and were that summer to be persued. This his maj. imparted to his commons' house of parl.; but before the same could receive that debate and due consideration which was fit, the fearful visitation of the Plague in and about the cities of London and Westminster, (where the lords and the principal gentlemen of quality of his whole kingdom were, for the time of this their service, lodged and abiding) did so much increase, that his maj. without extreme peril to the lives of his good subjects, which were dear unto him, could not continue the parliament any longer in that place.—His maj. therefore, on the 11th day of July then following, adjourned the parliament from Westminster, until the 1st day of Aug. then following, at the city of Oxford: and his maj. was so careful to accommodate his lords and commons there, that as he made choice of that place, being then the freest of all others from the danger of that grievous sickness; so he there fitted the parliament men with all things convenient for their entertainment: and his maj. himself, being in his own heart sincere, and free from all ends upon his people, which the Searcher of Hearts best knoweth, he little expected, that any misconstruction of his actions would have been made as he there found. But when the parliament had been a while assembled, and his majesty's affairs opened unto them, and a further Supply desired, as necessity required; he found them so slow, and so full of delays and diversions in their resolutions, that before any thing could be determined, the fearful contagion daily increased, and was dispersed into all parts of this kingdom; and came home even to their doors where they assembled. His maj. therefore, rather preferred the safety of his people from that present and visible danger, than provided for that which was more remote, but no less dangerous to the state of this kingdom, and of the affairs of that part of Christendom, which then were, and yet are, in friendship and alliance with his maj. And thereupon, his maj. not being then able to discern when it might please God to stay his hand of Visitation, nor what place might be more secure than other, nor what time convenient for their reassembling, dissolved that parliament.—That parliament being now ended, his majesty did not therewith cast off his royal care of his great and important affairs; but, by the advice of his privy council and of his council of war, he continued his preparations, and former resolutions; and therein not only expended those monies, which, by the 2 Subsidies aforesaid, were given unto him for his own private use, whereof he had too much occasion as he found the state of his exchequer at his first entrance; but added much more of his own, as by his credit, and the credit of some of his servants, he was able to compass the same. At last, by much disadvantage, by the retarding of provisions, and uncertainty of the means, his navy was prepared and set to sea; and the designs unto which they were sent and specially directed, were so probable, and so well advised, that, had they not miscarried in the execution, his majesty is well assured they would have given good satisfaction, not only to his own people, but to all the world, that they were not lightly or unadvisedly undertaken and pursued: but it pleased God, who is the Lord of Hosts, and unto whose Providence and good pleasure his maj. doth, and shall submit himself, and all his endeavours, not to give that success which was desired: and yet were those attempts not altogether so fruitless as the envy of the times hath apprehended, the enemy receiving thereby no small loss, nor our party no little advantage. And it would much avail to further his maj.'s great affairs, and the peace of Christendom, which ought to be the true end of all hostility, were these first beginnings, which are most subject to miscarry, well seconded and pursued, as his maj. intended; and as, in the judgment of all men conversant in actions of this nature, were fit not to have been neglected.—The things being thus acted, and God, of his infinite goodness, beyond expectation, asswaging the rage of the pestilence, and, in a manner of a sudden, restoring health and safety to the cities of London and Westminster, which are the fittest places for the resort of his maj. his lords, and commons, to meet in parl. his maj. in the depth of winter, no sooner descried the probability of a safe assembling of his people, and in his princely wisdom and providence, foresaw, that if the opportunity of seasons should be omitted, preparations, both defensive and offensive could not be made in such sort as was requisite for their common safety, but he advised and resolved of the summoning of a new parl. where he might freely communicate the necessities of the state, and have the counsel and advice of the lords and commons in parliament, who were the representative body of the whole kingdom; and that this great council of the realm, might proceed in those enterprizes, and be enabled thereunto, which concern the common good, safety, and honour both of prince and people; and accordingly, the 6th of Feb. last, a new parl. was begun. At the first meeting his maj. did forbear to press them with any thing which might have the least appearance of his own interest; but recommended unto them the care of making good laws, which are the ordinary subject for a parliament.—His maj. believing that they could not have suffered many days, much less many weeks, to have passed by, before the apprehension and care of the common safety of this kingdom, and the true religion professed and maintained therein, and of our friends and allies who must prosper or suffer with us, would have led them to a due and timely consideration of all the means which might best conduce to those ends; which the lords of the higher house, by a committee of that house, did timely and seasonably consider of, and invited the commons to a conference concerning that Great Business: at which conference there were opened unto them the great occasions which pressed his maj.; which making no impression with them, his maj. did, first by message, and after by letters, put the commons in mind of that which was most necessary, the defence of the kingdom, with due and timely preparations for the same.—The commons house, after this, upon the 27th of March last, with one unanimous consent at first, agreed to give unto his maj. 3 entire Subsidies, and three Fifteens, for a present Supply unto him; and, upon the 26th of April after, upon second cogitations, they added a 4th Subsidy; and ordered the days of payment for them all, whereof the first should have been on the last day of this present June. Upon this the king of Denmark, and other princes and states, being engaged with his maj. in this common cause, his maj. fitted his occasions according to the times which were appointed for the payment of those Subsidies and Fifteens; and hastened on the lords committers, and his council of war, to perfect their resolutions for the ordering and settling of his designs; which they accordingly did, and brought them to that maturity, that they found no impediment to a final conclusion of their counsels, but want of money to put things into action. His maj. hereupon, who had, with much patience, expected the real performance of that which the commons had promised; finding the time of the year passing away, and having intelligence not only from his own ministers and subjects in foreign parts, but from all parts of Christendom, of the great and powerful preparations of the king of Spain, and that his design was upon this kingdom, or the kingdom of Ireland, or both, (and it is hard to determine which of them would be of worst consequence) he acquainted the commons therewith; and laid open unto them truly and clearly, how the state of things then stood, and yet stand, and at several times, and upon several occasions, reiterated the same: but that house, (being abused by the violent and ill-advised passions of a few members of the house, for private and personal ends, ill-beseeming public persons trusted by their country, as then they were) not only neglected, but wilfully refused to hearken to all the gentle admonitions which his maj. could give them; and neither did nor would intend any thing, but the prosecution of one of the peers of this realm, and that in such a disordered manner, as being set at their own instance into a legal way, wherein the proofs on either part would have ruled the cause, which his maj. allowed, they were not therewith content; but, in their intemperate passions, and desires to seek for errors in another, fell into a greater error themselves; and not only neglected to give just satisfaction to his maj. in several cases which happened concerning his reuality, but wholly forgot their engagements to his maj. for the public defence of the realm; whereupon his maj. wrote the forementioned Letter to the Speaker, dated 9th of June, 1626.—Notwithstanding which letter read in the house, being a clear and gracious manifestation of his maj.'s resolutions, they never so much as admitted one reading to the bill of Subsidies; but instead thereof, they prepared and voted a Remonstrance or Declaration, which they intended to prefer to his maj. containing (though palliated with glossing terms) as well many dishonourable aspersions upon his majesty and upon the sacred memory of his deceased father, as also dilatory excuses for their not proceeding with the Subsidies, adding thereto also coloured conditions, crossing thereby his maj.'s direction; which his maj. understanding, and esteeming it, as he had cause, to be a denial of the promised Supply: and finding that no admonitions could move, no reasons or persuasions could prevail (when the time was so far spent that they had put an impossibility upon themselves to perform their promises, and when they esteemed all gracious messages unto them to be but interruptions) his maj. upon mature advisement, discerning that all further patience would prove fruitless, did, on the 15th of this present June, dissolve this unhappy parliament; the acting whereof, as it was to his maj. an unexpressible grief, so the memory thereof doth renew the hearty sorrow, which all his good and well affected subjects will compassionate with him. These passages his maj. hath at the more length, and with the true circumstances thereof, expressed and published to the world, lest that, which hath been unfortunate in itself, through the malice of the authors of so great a mischief, and the malevolent report of such as are ill affected to the state, or the true religion here professed, or the fears or jealousies of friends and dutiful subjects, might be made more unfortunate in the consequences of it; which may be of worse effect than at first can be well apprehended: and his majesty being best privy to the integrity of his own heart, for the constant maintaining of the sincerity and unity of the true religion professed in the church of England, and to free it from the open contagion of Popery, and secret infection of Schism; of both which, by his public acts and actions, he hath given good testimony, and with a single heart, as in the presence of God, who can best judge thereof, purposeth resolutely and constantly to proceed in the due execution of either; and observing the subtilty of the adverse party, he cannot but believe the hand of Joab hath been in this disaster; that the common incendiaries of Christendom have subtilly and secretly insinuated those things, which unhappily (and, as his maj. hopeth, beyond the intentions of the actors) have caused these diversions and distractions; and yet notwithstanding, his most excellent maj. for the comfort of his good and well-affected subjects, in whose loves he doth repose himself with confidence, and esteemeth it as his greatest riches; for the assuring of his friends and allies, with whom, by God's assistance, he will not break, in the substance of what he hath undertaken: for the discouraging of his adversaries, and the adversaries of his cause, and of his dominions and religion; hath put on this resolution, which he doth hereby publish to all the world: that as God hath made him king of this great people, and large dominions, famous in former ages both by land and sea, and trusted him to be a father and protector both of their persons and fortunes, and a defender of the faith and true religion, so he will go on cheerfully and constantly in the defence thereof; and, notwithstanding so many difficulties and discouragements, will take his sword and sceptre into his hand, and not expose the persons of the people committed to his charge to the unsatiable desires of the king of Spain, who hath long thirsted after the Universal Monarchy, nor their consciences to the yoke of the Pope of Rome: and that at home he will take that care to redress the just grievances of his good subjects, as shall be every way fit for a good king.—And in the mean time his maj. doth publish this to all his loving subjects, that they may know what to think with truth, and speak with duty, of his majesty's actions and proceedings in these two last dissolved parliaments."

"THE INTENDED REMONSTRANCE OF THE COMMONS.

"Most Gracious Sovereign, We your loyal and faithful subjects, the commons assembled by your majesty's most royal authority in this present parl. having, with all dutiful affection, from the time of our first meeting, earnestly endeavoured to proceed speedily in those affairs, that might best and soonest conduce to our dispatch of the intended Supply of your majesty's great designs, to the enlargement of your support, and to the enabling of ourselves, and them whom we represent, to the full and timely performance of the same; have notwithstanding, by reason of divers misinformations, interruptions, and other preventions, been hitherto so retarded in the prosecution of these affairs, that we now thought it a necessary part of our most humble duties thus to declare both those interruptions and preventions, with the true, original, and continual cause of them; as also, our most earnest devotion to the parliamentary service of your most excellent maj. and to the careful safety and defence of your dominions, crown and dignity: and we most humbly, therefore, beseech your most excellent maj. to be graciously pleased here to cast your eye on some particulars, that have relation, as well to your first parliament, as to this; out of which we cannot doubt, but that your great goodness may receive an ample satisfaction touching our most loyal and faithful intentions.—In the first parl. of the first year of your majesty's most happy reign over us, the commons then assembled, after they had cheerfully presented to your maj. as the first fruits of their affections, 2 entire Subsidies, were exceedingly pressed by the means of the duke of Buckingham, and for his own ends, as we conceive, to enlarge that Supply; which when he conceived would not be there effected, he procured, for the same ends, from your maj. an adjournment of the parl. to the city of Oxford, where the commons, then taking into just consideration the great mischiefs which this kingdom variously hath suffered, and that chiefly by reason of the exorbitant power, and frequent misdoings of the said duke, were entering into a parliamentary course of examination of those mischiefs, power, and misdoings, but no sooner was there any mention made of his name to this purpose, but that he, fearing lest his actions might so have been too much laid open to the view of your most excellent maj. and to the just censure that might then have followed; presently, through his misinformations to your maj. of the intentions of your said commons, (as we have just cause to believe) procured a dissolution of the said parl.: and afterwards, also, in the same year, through divers misreports made to your maj. in his behalf, touching some members of the said commons, who had more particularly drawn his name into just question, and justly professed themselves averse to his ends there, procured, as we cannot but conceive, the said members to be made sheriffs of several counties for this year that followed,* to the end that they might have all been precluded from being chosen members of the present parl. lest they should again have there questioned him; and, by the like practice also, (as we are persuaded) he procured, soon after the said dissolution, another member of the said house, because he had justly professed himself against his ends, to be sent as secretary of your majesty's last fleet, hereby indeed to punish him, by such drawing him from his practice of the law, which was his profession, under colour of an honourable employment. —It pleased your maj. afterwards, in Feb. last, to call this present parl.; wherein, though none of those, whom the said duke had so procured to be made high sheriffs, have sat as members; yet we (finding in ourselves the like affection, first, to the service of your maj. and next, to the good of the commonwealth) took into serious consideration several propositions; how, for the safety and happiness of your majesty's kingdoms and allies, we might enlarge your supports, and add to the military strength without charge to the poorer sort of your subjects; and give a larger Supply to your maj. for your instant and pressing occasions, than hath ever yet, but once, been given in parliament: whereupon, for the enabling of ourselves, and those whom we represent, we conceive it, first, necessary to search into the causes of those mischiefs, which this your kingdom suffereth, and divers of the Grievances that over-burden your subjects; without doing of which, we could neither be faithful to your maj. nor to the country that doth trust and employ us; as your royal father also, of blessed memory, admonished the house of commons in the 4th session of his first parl. In this consideration we found, that the most pressive and comprehensive mischief that we suffered, was fundamentally settled in the vast power and enormous actions of the said duke; being such, that by reason of his plurality of offices, all gotten by ambition, and some for money, expressly against the laws of your realm; his breach of trust in not guarding the seas; his high injustice in the admiralty; his extortion; his delivering over the ships of this kingdom into the hands of a foreign prince; his procuring the compulsory buying of honours for his own gain; his unexampled exhaustring of the treasures and revenues of the kingdom; his transcendent presumption in that unhappy applying of physic to your royal father of blessed memory, a few days before his death; and some other his offences carefully and maturely examined by us: we made a parliamentary Charge of the same matters and offences against him to the lords, then by your maj. assembled in parliament; there expecting some remedy by a speedy proceeding against him: but, may it please your most excellent maj. not only during the time of our examination of the matters and offences of the same Charge, we were diversely interrupted and diverted by Messages procured, through misinformation, from your maj. which, with most humble duty and reverence, we did ever receive, whence it first fell out, that so not only much time was spent amongst us, before the same Charge was perfected; but also, within two days next after the same Charge was transmitted by us to the lords, upon untrue and malicious misinformations, privately, and against the privilege of parliaments, given to your maj. of certain words supposed to have been spoken by sir D. Digges and sir John Elliot, knts, (two of the members of our house, in their service of the transmitting of the said Charge, both of them having been especially employed in the chairs of committees with us, about the examination of the said matters and offences) they were both, by your maj.'s command, committed to close imprisonment in the Tower of London, their lodgings presently searched, and their papers there found, presently taken away; by reason whereof, not only our known privileges of parliament were infringed, but we ourselves, that upon full hope of speedy course of justice against the said duke, were preparing with all dutiful affection to proceed to the dispatch of the Supply, and other services to your maj. were wholly, as the course and privilege of parliament bind us, diverted for divers days, to the taking into sole consideration some courses for the ratifying and preservation of the privileges so infringed: and we think it our duties, most rightly to inform hereby your most excellent maj. of the course held in the commitment of the two members: for whereas, by your maj.'s warrant to your messengers for the arresting them, you were pleased to command that they should repair to their lodgings, and there take them; your maj.'s principal secretary, the lord Country, gave the said messengers, as they wealth, strength, and honour of this your kingdom, and the support of your friends and allies abroad: and we doubt not but through God's blessing, as you are the best, so shall you ever be the best-beloved, and greatest monarch, that ever sat on the royal throne of this famous kingdom."

A Proclamation for burning the foregoing Remonstrance.] Soon after the king published a Proclamation, taking notice of the foregoing Remonstrance, intended to have been presented to him: "Wherein, he said, were many things contained to the dishonour of himself and his royal father of blessed memory; and whereby, through, the sides of a peer of this realm, they wound their sovereign's honour: as also, that some members of that house, ill-affected to his service, to vent their own passions against that peer, and to prepossess the world with an ill opinion of him, before his cause was heard in a judicial way, had, before-hand, scattered copies of that intended Declaration, thereby to detract from their sovereign: wherefore his maj. for the suppressing of this insufferable wrong to himself, doth command, upon pain of his indignation and high displeasure, all persons of whatsoever quality, who have, or shall have hereafter, any copies or notes of the said Remonstrance, or shall come to the view thereof, forthwith to burn the same; that the memory thereof may be utterly abolished, and never give occasion to his maj. to renew the remembrance of that, which, out of his grace and goodness, he would gladly forget."

Projects for raising Money, by Loans, Benevolences, &c.] Deprived of any parliamentary Aids, through the late dissolution, the court fell upon such projects, as had been practised in like cases, for raising money without them. By an order of council, it was declared, That all customs, duties and imposts on all goods and merchandizes exported and imported, which, for many ages had been continued, and esteemed a principal and necessary part of the revenue of the crown, should be levied and paid. Nevertheless, it was intended to have this settled by parliament, as it had been, from time to time, for many royal successions; but the dissolution of the last prevented it, before the matters therein treated of could be brought to perfection. Therefore, an instrument was to pass, under the great seal, to authorize these levies, until, as in former times, it might receive an absolute settlement by parliament. The forfeitures, also, arising to the crown by the execution of the laws against Jesuits, Priests, and Popish Recusants, were dedicated to the pressing necessities of the state. A proclamation was published, declaring the king's resolution to make his revenue certain; by granting his lands, as well copyhold as otherwise, to be holden in fee-farm. The king sent to the nobility to acquaint them, That according to the customs of former times, upon pressing occasions, the crown had ever had recourse to raise contributions on the subject; and therefore he now expected from them such a large and cheerful testimony of their loyalty, as might be acceptable to himself and exemplary to his people.—From the city of London the king demanded a Loan of 100,000*l.* which, all excuses set aside, was ordered by the council to be complied with. And, all the sea-port towns being ordered to fit out ships for the guarding of their own coasts, the city was appointed to set forth 20 of the best ships that lay in the river; with all manner of tackle, sea stores and ammunition, manned and victualled for 3 months. There were likewise privy-seals issued to divers persons; to others, the old way of Benevolence was proposed.

Persons committed to Prison for refusing the Loan.] This Loan however did by no means pass current through the kingdom; on the contrary, it bred a great deal of disturbance and laid the foundation for more Grievances to be complained of next parliament. Several persons, and some of good rank and quality, refused to subscribe to it; these in their several counties, were bound over, by recognizance, to make their appearance at the council-table; from whence, divers of them were committed to different prisons, not in their own, but in distant counties: the names of many of these gentlemen are preserved in Rushworth, and are too remarkable to be slightly passed over. Sir Tho. Wentworth, (afterwards earl of Strafford,) and Geo. Ratcliffe, esq. (afterwards sir George) Yorkshire gentlemen, were sent for by messengers, and removed out of York into Kent. Sir Walter Earl and sir John Strange-ways, Dorsetshire men, were confined in Bedfordshire. Sir Tho. Grantham, and others of Lincolnshire, in Dorsetshire. Sir John Heveningham, and others of Suffolk, into Somersetshire. Rd. Knightly, esq. and others of Northamptonshire, into Southampton and Wiltshire. Sir Nath. Barnardiston, of Suffolk, and William Coriton, esq. of Cornwall, in Sussex. Sir Harbottle Grimstone of Essex, and sir Rob. Pointz, were secured in Northamptonshire. John Hampden, esq. and others of Bucks, were secured in Hampshire: and the like course was taken with the gentry of other counties, who refused the Loan. The council also ordered, that all those refractory persons before named who are appointed, by his maj.'s command to their several commitments, shall presently obey the order of the board sent with their messenger in that behalf, or be committed close prisoners; any pretence of inability, want of convenience, or other excuse whatsoever notwithstanding.

Sir John Elliot's Petition, from the Gatehouse, on his Imprisonment.] Many of those gentlemen were afterwards sent for by pursuivants, out of those counties where they had been confined by order of the council, and committed to several prisons; some to the Fleet, some to the Marshalsea and Gatehouse, and others remained in custody of the messengers: from the latter sir John Elliot, who had rendered himself so remarkable, as a Manager against the duke of Buckingham (see p. 122.) sent the following Petition to the king.

"To the King's most Excellent Majesty. The Humble Petition of Sir John Elliot, Knt. Prisoner in the Gatehouse, concerning the Loan, Sheweth,

That your poor suppliant, affected with sorrow and unhappiness, through the long sense of your majesty's displeasure; willing, in every act of duty and obedience, to satisfy your maj. of the loyalty of his heart, than which he hath nothing more desired; and that there may not remain a jealousy in your royal breast, that any stubbornness of will hath been the motive of his forbearing to vnderstand to the said Loan: low at your highness's foot, with a sad yet a faithful heart, for an apology to your clemency and grace, he now presumes to offer up the reasons that induced him; which he conceiveth necessary of his duty to religion, to justice, and to your maj. did enforce.—The rule of justice he takes to be the law; the impartial arbitrer of government and obedience, the support and strength of majesty, the observer of that justice by which subjection is commanded: this and religion, added to this power not to be resisted, bind up the conscience in an obligation to that rule, which, without open prejudice and violence of these duties, may not be impeached. In this particular, therefore, of the Loan, being desirous to be satisfied how far the obligation might extend; and resolving where he was left master of his own, to become servant to your will, he had recourse unto the laws, to be informed by them; which, in all humility, he submiteth to your most sacred view in the collections following.—In the time of Edw. I. he findeth that the commons of that age were so tender of their liberties, as they feared even their own free acts and gifts might turn them to a bondage of their heirs. Wherefore it was desired and granted, "That for no business, such manner of aids, taxes, nor prizes, should be taken, but by common assent of the realm, and for the common profit thereof."* The like was in force by the same king, and by two other laws, again enacted: 'that no tallage or aid should be taken or levied, without the good-will and assent of the archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other freemen of the land.' And that prudent and magnanimous prince, Edw. 3, led by the same wisdom, having granted: "that the greatest gift given in parliament, for the aid and speed of his matchless undertaking against France, should not be had in example, nor fall to the prejudice of the subject in time to come; did likewise add, in confirmation of that right, That they should not from thenceforth be grieved to sustain any charge or aid, but by the common assent, and that in parliament. And more particularly upon this point, upon a Petition of the Commons afterwards in parliament, it was esta-lished: That the Loans, which were granted to the king by divers persons be released; and that none, henceforth, be compelled to make such Loans against their wills, because it is against reason, and the franchises of the land; and that restitution be made to such as had paid such Loans.' And by another act in the time of R. 3. it was ordained: "That the subject in no wise be charged with any such charge, exaction, or imposition called a Benevolence, nor such like charge; and that such like exactions be damned and annulled for ever.—Such were the opinions of those times, for all these Aids, Benevolences, Loans, and such like charges, exacted from the subject not in parliament; which they held to be grievances contrary to their liberties, and illegal: and so pious were their princes in confirmation of their liberties, that having secured them for the present, by such frequent laws and statutes, they did likewise by them provide for their posterity, and in some so strictly, that they bound the observation with a curse, as in that of 25. Edw. I. and also under pain of excommunication; which was to be denounced against all those that violate or break them: all which acts extend to us. And these reasons he presents to your maj. as the first motive taken from the law.—There are others also, which, in his humble apprehension, he conceived from the action itself, which he likewise tenders to your most excellent wisdom: 1st. That the carriage and instructions, accompanied with the authority of the great seal, imported a constraint; such requests to subjects being tacit and implied commands, and so preventing that readiness and love, which, in a free way, would have far exceeded those demands; whereas the wonted Aids given to your happy ancestors were 'ex spontanea voluntate & charitate populi,' whereby they made that conjunction of their hearts at home, which wrought such power and reputation to their acts abroad.—And whereas the firmest obligation of that readiness and love, is the benignity of princes, giving and preserving to their people their just rights and liberties; which, to this kingdom, are derived from the clemency and wisdom of your progenitors, to whom there is owing a sacred memory for them: he could not, as he feared, without pressure to these immunities, become an actor in this Loan; which, by imprisonment and restraint, was urged, contrary to Grants of the Great Charter, by so many glorious and victorious kings so many times confirmed; being therein most confident of your maj. that never king that reigned over us, had, of his own benignity and goodness, a more pious disposition to preserve the just liberties of his subjects, than your sacred self.—Though he was well assured by your maj.'s royal promise, whose words he holds as oracles of truth, that it should not become a precedent, during the happiness of your reign; (the long continuance whereof is the daily subject of his prayers) yet he conceived from thence a fear, that succeeding ages might thereby take occasion for posterity to strike at the very property of their goods, contrary to the piety and intention of your maj. so graciously expressed.—And these being the true grounds and motives of his forbearance to the said Loan, (shewing such inconveniences in reason, and representing it an act contradicting so many of your laws, and most of them by the most prudent and happiest of our princes granted; which could not, without presumption beyond pardon in your supplicant, in taking to himself the dispensation of those laws, so piously enacted by them, be violated or impeached, in the least degree;) in the fulness of all submission and obedience, as the apology of his loyalty and duty, he lowly offers to your most sacred wisdom, for the satisfaction of your maj.: most humbly praying your maj. will be graciously pleased to take them into your princely consideration; where when it shall appear, (as he doubts not, but from hence it will to your deep judgment,) that no factious humour, nor any disaffection, led on by stubbornness of will, hath herein stirred or moved him; but the just obligation of his conscience, which binds him to the service of your maj. in the observance of your laws; he is hopeful, presuming upon the piety and justice of your maj. that your maj. according to your innate clemency and goodness, will be pleased to restore him to your favour, and his liberty; and to afford him the benefit of those laws, which, in all humility, he craves.”

But notwithstanding this extraordinary Petition, sir John Elliot continued a prisoner in the Gate-house, till the general order of discharge came. Sir Peter Hayman also, refusing to part with Loan-Money, was called before the lords of the council, who charged him with refractoriness, and with an unwillingness to serve the king; and told him if he did not pay, he should be put upon service. Accordingly they commanded him to go into his majesty's service into the Palatinate: and having first settled his estate, he undertook and performed the journey, and afterwards returned into England.—Notwithstanding the vigorous opposition to this method of raising money by Loans, a considerable sum was raised, and some things were done with it, which tended to public service: though what sums these exactions raised in the kingdom is not particularly mentioned.—The next year, a large fleet was fitted out, and had a numerous land army on board, designed for a descent on the Isle of Rhee in France, under the conduct of the duke of Buckingham. The bad success of that enterprize is too well known to need a repetition; and this joined to a general defeat of the king of Denmark's army, by count Tilly, near Lutter in Germany, gave a mortal stroke to the Protestant cause in those parts, and rendered the fate of the Palatinate still more desperate. So that, both at home and abroad, Charles's affairs were then in a melancholy situation. For, when the unfortunate action at Rhee was known over the kingdom, the cry of the people was so great, and the king's necessities so pressing, that it was in every man's mouth, ‘A parliament must needs be summoned.’ The nation had now provoked two potent neighbouring kings to be their enemies, the coast and ports were unguarded, the able commanders worn out, or not employed, and the marine affairs were every where in as bad a condition as possible.

Sir R. Cotton's Advice to the Council to call a Parliament.] Under these unhappy circumstances, the king held a grand council at Whitehall, how to extricate himself and the nation out of such difficulties. To this council the famous historian and antiquary, sir Robert Cotton, was called; whose Advice to the lords there present, contains a succinct, though general history of these times, along with the best advice how to settle matters for the future, which we shall give in his own words; for, though not strictly parliamentary in itself, yet it induced the king and council to believe there was no other way, and obliged them to think of calling a parliament for the general good of the nation.*

“My lords; as soon as the house of Austria had incorporated itself into the house of Spain, and, by their new discoveries, gotten to themselves the wealth of the Indies; they began to affect, and have ever since pursued, a fifth monarchy.—The emperor Charles would first have laid the foundation thereof in Italy, by surprizing Rome: but from this he was hindered by the force and respect of religion. Hen. 8. being made caput fœderis against him. He then attempted it in High-Germany, practising by faction and force, to reduce those petty states to his absolute power. In this Hen. 8. again prevented him, by tying the Lutheran princes under his confederacy and assistance. His son, Philip 2, pursued the same ambition in the Nether-Germany, by reduction whereof he intended to make his way further into the other. This the late queen of England interrupted, by siding with the afflicted people on the one part, and making herself head of the protestant league with the princes on the other side; drawing in, as a secret of state, the countenance of France, to give the more reputation and assistance to them, and security to herself.—Spain seeing his hopes thus fruitless by these unions and sleights, began first to break, if he might, the amity of France and England: but finding the common danger to be so fast a tie, he raiseth up a party in that kingdom of his own, by the which the French king was so distressed, that, had not the English council and assistance relieved him, Spain had there removed that next and greatest obstacle of his ambition.—His council now tells him, from these examples, that the way to his great work is impassable, so long as England lies a lett in his way; and adviseth him, that the removal of that obstacle be the first of his intent. This drew on those often secret practices against the person of the late queen, and his open fury, in 1588, against the body of the state, for which she, following the advice of a free council, would never after admit of peace; winning thereby the hearts of a loving people, who ever found hands and money for all occasions at home, and by keeping sacredly her alliances abroad, secured her confederates, all her time, in freedom from fear of Spanish slavery; and ended her old and happy days in great glory. Spain then, by the wisdom and power of that great lady, despoiled so of his means to hurt, though not of his desire, makes up, with her peaceful successor of happy memory, the golden league; that, disarming us at home by opinion of security, and giving them a power in our council by believing their friendship and pretended marriage gave them way to cherish amongst us a party of their own, and bereft of power abroad, to lead in jealousy, and sow a division between us and our confederates; by which, we see, they have swallowed up the fortune of our master's brother, with the rest of the imperial states, distressed the king of Denmark by that quarrel, diverted Sweden's assistance by the wars with the Pole, and moving of him now with the offers of the Danish crown, and now, whether from that plot, or our fatality, it hath cast such a bone between France and us, as hath gotten themselves, by our quarrel of religion, a fast confederate, and us a dangerous enemy: so that now we are left no other assurance against their malice and ambition, but the Netherlands; where the tie of mutual safety is weakened by daily discontent bred and fed between us from some ill-affect to both our securities: so that, from the doubtfulness of friendship, as we now stand, we may rather expect, through our own domestic faction, if they grow too furious, they will sooner follow the example of Rome in her growing; (that held it equally safe, honourable, and more easy, dare regem, than subjungere provinciam) considering the power they have in their hands, than give any friendly assistance to serve the present condition of our state. You may see therefore in what terms we stand abroad; and, I fear, at home, in no better. There must be, to withstand a foreign invasion, a proportion both of sea and land forces; for to give an enemy an easy passage, and a port to relieve him in, is no less than to hazard all at one stake. And it is to be considered, that no march by land can be of that speed to make head against the landing of an enemy, nor no such prevention as to be master of the sea. To this point of necessary defence there can be no less than 240,000*l.* For the land forces; if it were for an offensive war, the men of less livelihood were the best spared, and were used formerly to make such war, purgamento reipublicæ, if we made no further purchase by it: but, for safety of a commonwealth, the wisdom of all times did never intrust the public cause to any other than such as had a portion in the public adventure. And thus we saw in 1588, when the care of the queen and council did make the body of that large army no other than of trained bands, which, with the auxiliaries of the whole realm, amounted to no less than 34,000 men. Neither were any of those drawn out of their countries, and proper habitations, before the end of May, that they might be no long aggrievance to the public; such discontentments being ever to us a more fatal enemy than any foreign force. The careful distribution and direction of the sea and land forces, being more fitting for a council of war, than a private man to advise of, I pass over; yet shall ever be willing and ready, when I shall be called, humbly to offer up such observations, as I have formerly gathered by the like occasions of this realm. There are two things requisite to make up this preparation, money and affections; for they cannot properly be severed. It was well and wisely said by that great and grave counsellor, lord Burleigh, in the like case, to the late queen, 'Win their hearts, and you may have their hands and purses. And I find of late, that diffidence having been a defect in the one, it hath unhappily produced the same in the other. In gathering of money for this present need, there are required 3 things, speed, assurance, and satisfaction: and the way to gather, as others in the like cases have done, must be by that path, which hath been formerly called via regia, being more secure and speedy; for, by unknown and untrodden ways, it is both rough and tedious, and seldom succeedeth well. This last way, although it took place as it were by Supply at first, and received no general denial; yet, since, it hath drawn many to consider with themselves and others of the consequence, and is now conceived a pressure on their liberties, and against law. I much fear, if now again it be offered, either in the same face, or by privy-seal, that it will be refused wholly. Neither find I that the restraint of those Recusants hath produced any other effect, than a stiff resolution in them and others to forbear. Besides, though it went at first with some assurance, yet, when we consider the commissions, and other forms incident to such like services; as also how long it hung in hand, and how many delays there were, we may easily see that such a sum, granted by parliament, is far sooner and more easily gathered.—If any will make the urgency of times an inevitable necessity for enforcing the levy, whether, in general, by excise or imposition; or, in particular, upon some select persons, which is the custom of some countries; and so conclude it, for the public state, supreme lege, he must look for this to be told him: that if necessity must conclude always for gathering money in the most speedy way, (which cannot be fitter than by parliament) the consequence may be, that the humours of the herdless multitude, who are full of jealousy and distrust, and so unlike to comply to any unusual course of levy, will not submit but by force; which, if used, the effect is fearful, and hath been fatal to the state: whereas that by parliament seetheth principally on the

regal person, who may, with ease and safety, mould them to fit his desire, by a gracious yielding to their just petitions.—If a parliament then be the most speedy, assured, and safe way, it is fit to conceive what is the best way to act and work it to the present need.—First, if the time of the usual summons, reputed to be 40 days, be too large for the present necessity, it may be shortened, since it is against no positive law; so that care be had that there may be one county day, after the sheriff hath received the writ, before the time of sitting.—If then the sum to be levied be once agreed on, then, for the advance of time, there may be, in the body of the grant, an assignment made to the knights of every county respectively; who, under such assurance, may safely give security proportionable to the receipts, to such as shall, in present, advance to the public service any sums of money.—The last and weightiest consideration (if a parliament be thought fit) is, how to remove or compose the differences between the king and subject in their mutual demands. What I have learned amongst the better sort of the multitude, I will freely declare, that your lordships may be the more enabled to remove those distrusts, that either concern religion, public safety of the king and state, or the just liberties of the common-wealth. For Religion, a matter that lies nearest to their conscience, they are led by this ground of jealousy to think some practise against it. First, for that the Spanish Match, which was broken by the grateful industry of my lord of Bucks, out of his religious care, as he there declares, that the articles there demanded might lead in some such sufferance as might endanger the quiet, if not the state of the reformed religion here: yet there have (when he was a principal actor in the conditions with France) as hard, if not worse, (to the preservation of our religion) passed than those with Spain: and the suspicion is strengthened by the strict observance of this agreement, in that point, there concluded. It is no less an argument of doubt to them of his affections; in that his mother and others, and many of his servants of near employment about him, are so affected. They talk much of his advancing men papistically devoted; some placed in the camp, of nearest service and chief command; and that the Recusants have gotten these late years, by his power, more courage and assurance than before. If, to clear these doubts, (which perhaps are worse in fancy than in truth) he took a good course, it might much advance the public service, against those squeamish humours that have more violent passion than settled judgment, and are not the least of the opposite number in the common-wealth.—The next is, the late misfortunes and losses of men, munition, and honour in our late undertakings abroad; which the more temperate spirits impute to want of counsel, and the more sublime wits to practice. They begin with the Palatinate, and by the fault of the loss there, on the improved credit of Gondouar; distrust-

ing him for the staying of supplies to sir Horace Vere, when Col. Cecil was cast on that employment; by which the king of Spain became master of the late king's children's inheritance. And when count Mansfield had a royal supply of forces, to assist the princes of our part, for the recovery thereof, either plot or error defeated the enterprise from us, to Spain's great advantage. That sir Rob. Mansel's expedition to Algiers, should purchase only the security and guard of the Spanish coasts; to spend so many hundred thousand pounds in the Calais voyage, against the advice of parliament, only to warn the king of Spain to be in a readiness, and so to weaken ourselves, is taken for a sign of ill-affection in him amongst the multitude. The spending of so much munition, victuals, and money, in the lord Willoughby's Journey, is conceived an unthrifty error in the director of it, to disarm ourselves in fruitless voyages; nay to some over-curious, seems a plot of danger, to turn the quarrel of Spain, our ancient enemy, that the parliament petitioned and gave Supply to support, upon our ally of France; and soon after, a new and happy tie gave much talk, that we were not so doubtful of Spain as many wish; since it was held, not long ago, a fundamental rule of their security and ours, by the old lord Burleigh, That nothing can prevent an universal Spanish monarchy, but a fastness of those two princes whose amity gave countenance and courage to the Netherlands and German princes, to make head against his ambition. And we see, by this disunion, a fearful defeat hath happened to Denmark and that party, to the great advantage of the Austrian family.—And thus far of the Waste of public Treasure in fruitless Expeditions: an important cause to hinder any new Supply in parliament. Another fear that may disturb the smooth and speedy passage of the king's desires in parliament, is the late waste of the king's livelihood; whereby is like, as in former times, to arise this jealousy and fear, that when he hath not of his own to support his ordinary charge, (for which the lands of the crown were settled unalterably, and called sacrum patrimonium principis) that then he must of necessity rest upon those assistances of the people, which ever were collected and consigned, only, for the common-wealth. From hence it is like there will be no great labour or stiffness to induce his maj. to an act of resumption; since such desires of the state have found an easy way in the will of all the princes from Hen. 3. to the last. But that which is like to pass deeper into their disputes and care, is the late pressures they suppose to have been done upon the public liberty and freedom of the subject; in commanding their goods without assent of parliament; confining their persons without special cause declared; and that made good against them by the judges lately; and pretending a writ to command their attendance in a foreign war: all which they are likely to enforce, as repugnant to many positive laws and customary immunities of this commonwealth.—And these dangerous distrusters are not a little improved by this unexampled course, as they conceive, of retaining an inland army in winter season; when former times of greatest fear, as that of 1588, produced no such; and makes them, in their distracted fears, to conjecture, idly, it was raised wholly to subject their fortunes to the will of power, more than of law; and so make good some further breaches upon their liberties and freedoms at home, rather than defend us from any force abroad.—How far such jealousies, if they meet with an unusual disorder of lawless soldiers, or an apt distemper of the loose and giddy multitude, may easily turn them away, upon any occasion in the state that they can side withal, to a glorious pretence of religion and public safety, when their true intent will be only rapine of the rich, and ruin of all, is worthy your provident and preventing care.—I have thus far delivered, with that freedom you pleased to admit, such difficulties as I have taken up amongst the multitude, as may arrest, if not remove, impediments to any speedy Supply in parliament at this time; how to facilitate which may better become the care of your lordships judgments than my ignorance. Only I could wish, that to remove away a personal distaste of my lord of Bucks amongst the people, he might be pleased, if there be a necessity of parliament, to appear a first adviser thereunto; and what satisfaction it shall please his maj. of grace, to give at such time to his people, (which I wish to be grounded by precedent of his best and most fortunate progenitors, and which, I conceive, will largely satisfy the desires and hopes of all) if it may appear in some sort to be drawn down from him to the people, by the zealous care and industry that my lord of Bucks hath of the public unity and content; by which there is no doubt that he may remain, not only secure from any further quarrel with them, but merit an happy memory amongst them of a zealous patriot: for to expiate the passion of the people, at such a time, with sacrifice of any of his majesty's servants, I have ever found it (as in Ed. 2. Rd. 2. and Hen. 6.) no less fatal to the master, than the minister, in the end."

A New Parliament called.] Actuated by such excellent advice as this, the king and council resolved, once more, to call a parliament, but, previously, thought proper to release all the gentlemen and others confined for refusing the Loan. Many of whom, Rushworth says, 'were chosen into the next parliament, and carried more resentment with them into the house, for their late ill usage, than was agreeable to the character of peace-makers between king and people.' Writs were sent out, to call a new parliament to meet, at Westminster, on the 17th of March, in the third year of the king; on which day the king, having rode in state down to Westminster Abby and heard a sermon, came to the house of lords, and sending for the commons, the lords Journals tell us his majesty was pleased to speak to both houses as follows,

 "My Lords and Gentlemen; These times are for action; wherefore, for example's sake, I mean not to spend much time in words; expecting accordingly that your (as I hope) good resolutions will be speedy, not spending time unnecessarily, or (that I may better say) dangerously; for tedious consultations at this conjuncture of time are as hurtful as ill resolutions. I am sure you now expect from me, both to know the cause of your meeting, and what to resolve on: yet I think that there is none here but knows that common danger is the cause of this parliament, and that Supply at this time is the chief end of it; so that I need not point to you what to do. I will use but few persuasions: for if to maintain your own advices, and, as now the case stands, by the following thereof, the true religion, laws, and liberties of this state, and the just defence of our true friends and allies, be not sufficient, then no eloquence of men or angels will prevail. Only let me remember you, that my duty most of all, and every one of yours, according to his degree, is to seek the maintenance of this church and common-wealth: and certainly there never was a time in which this duty was more necessarily required than now. I therefore, judging a parliament to be the antient, speediest, and best way in this time of common danger, to give such Supply as to secure ourselves, and to save our friends from imminent ruin, have called you together. Every man now must do according to his conscience; wherefore if you (which God forbid) should not do your duties in contributing what the state at this time needs, I must, in discharge of my conscience, use those other means, which God hath put into my hands, to save that which the follies of some particular men may otherwise hazard to lose.—Take not this as a threatening, (for I scorn to threaten any but my equals) but an admonition from him, that, both out of nature and duty, hath most care of your preservations and prosperities: and hopes (though I thus speak) that your demeanours at this time will be such, as shall not only make me approve your former counsels, but lay on me such obligations as shall bind me by way of thankfulness to meet often with you: for, be assured, that nothing can be more pleasing unto me, than to keep a good correspondence with you.—I will only add one thing more, and then leave my Lord Keeper to make a short paraphrase upon the text I have delivered you, which is, To remember a thing, to the end ye may forget it. You may imagine that I came here with a doubt of good success of what I desire, remembering the distractions of the last meeting: but, I assure you, that I shall very easily and gladly forget and forgive what is past, so that you will at this time leave the former ways of distraction, and follow the counsel lately given you, To maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace."

The Lord Keeper's Speech.] The Lord Keeper having conferred with his majesty, spake as followeth:—"My lords, and ye the knights, citizens, and burghesses of the house of commons;—If I had been delighted in long speaking, yet the example and commandment of his majesty had been more than enough to restrain the superfluity of that humour: but there is yet more; for that short and excellent compacted speech which you have heard from his maj. begins with a reason, 'It is a time for action, not for speech.' Examples and commandments master the will, and reasons master the understanding; and therefore you may expect nothing from me but brevity. You have heard the matter already; and, I doubt not, but with much reverence, as the weight and authority of it requires. You have imprinted it in your minds; and, the matter being known, long speech from me were but babbling to beat the air.—Ye are assembled here in parliament by his majesty's writ and royal command, to consult and conclude of the weighty and urgent business of this kingdom. Weighty it is, and great; as great as the honour, safety, and protection of religion, king, and country: and what can be greater? Urgent it is; it is little pleasure to tell or think how urgent: and to tell it with circumstances, were a long work: I will but touch the sum of it in few words.—The Pope and House of Austria have long affected, the one a spiritual, the other a temporal monarchy: and to effect their ends do join together to serve each other's turn. The house of Austria, besides the rich and vast territories of both the Indies and in Africa, are become masters of Spain and Italy, and the great country of Germany; and although France be not under their subjection, yet they have environed it all about; and in the very bowels of that kingdom swayed by the Popish faction, have gotten such a party and such interest in the government; that, under pretence of aiding to root out the protestants and our religion, they have drawn that king to their adherence so far that, albeit upon his majesty's interposition by his ambassadors, and his engagement of his royal word for just performance, the war between that king and his subjects of the religion was quieted; and his maj. as protector of that Treaty, was interested and bound to procure a good accomplishment of it: yet, against it, and the strict alliance between him and that king, the treaty hath been broken; and those of the religion have been put to all extremity, and undoubtedly will be ruined, without our present help. So as that king is not only diverted from assisting the common cause, but hath been misled to engage himself in hostile acts against our king and other princes; making way thereby for the house of Austria, to the ruin of his own and other kingdoms.—Other potentates, that in former times did balance and interrupt the growing greatness of the house of Austria, are now removed and diverted. The Turk hath made peace with the emperor, and turned himself wholly into wars with Asia. The king of Sweden is embroiled in a war with Poland, which is fomented by Spanish practices, to keep that king from succouring our party. The king of Denmark is chased out of his kingdom on this side the Sound; so as the house of Austria is on the point to command all the sea-coasts, from Dantrick to Embulen, and all the rivers falling into the sea in that great extent; so as, besides the power by land, they begin to threaten our party by sea, to the subversion of all our trade.—In the Baltick-Sea, they are providing and arming all the ships they can build or hire, and have at this time their ambassadors treating at Labeck, to draw into their service the Hans Towns, whereby taking from us and our neighbours the Eastland trade, by which our shipping is supplied, they expect, without any blow given, to make themselves absolute masters of that sea. In these western parts, by the Dunkirkers, and by the new French and Spanish admirals, to the ruin of fishing, (of infinite consequence, both to us, and the Low Countries) they infest all our coast, so as we pass not safely from port to port. And that fleet which lately assisted the French at the Isle of Rhée, is now preparing at St. Andrews, with other ships built on the coast of Biscay to re-inforce it, and a great fleet is making ready in Lisbon; where, besides their own, they do serve themselves upon all strangers bottoms coming to that coast for trade: and these great preparations are, no doubt, to assault us in England or Ireland, as they shall find advantage, and a place fit for their turn.—Our friends of the Netherlands, besides the fear that justly troubles them, lest the whole force of the empire may fall down upon them, are distracted by their long voyages into the East; which hath carried both men and money into another world, and much weakened and almost divided them at home. Thus are we ready on all sides to be swallowed up; the emperor, France, and Spain, being in open war against us; Germany overrun; the king of Denmark distressed; the king of Sweden diverted; and the Low Countries disabled to give us assistance.—I speak not this to increase fears unworthy of English courage, but to press to provision worthy the wisdom of a parliament: and for that cause his maj. hath called you hither, that, by a timely provision against these great and imminent dangers, ourselves may be strengthened at home, our friends and allies encouraged abroad, and those great causes of our fear scattered and dispelled.—And because in all warlike preparations, treasure bears the name, and holds the semblance of the nerves and sinews; and, if a sinew be too short or too weak, if it be either shrunk or strained, the part becomes unuseful; it is needful that you make a good and timely supply of treasure, without which all counsels will prove fruitless. I might press many reasons to this end; but I will name but few. 1. For his majesty's sake, who requires it. Great is the duty which we owe him by the law of God; great by the law of nature, and natural allegiance: great for his own merit, and the memory of his ever-blessed father. I do but point at them; but, methinks, our thoughts cannot but recoil on one consideration touched by his maj. which, to me, seems to sound like a parliamentary pact or covenant. A war was advised here, assistance proffered, yea, and protested here: I do but touch it, I know you will deeply think on it; and the more, for the example the king hath set you; his lands, his plate, his jewels he hath not spared to supply the war: what the people hath protested, the king, for his part, hath willingly performed. 2. For the cause-sake: it concerns us in Christian charity to tender the distresses of our friends abroad; it concerns us in honour not to abandon them, who have stood for us. And if this come not close enough, you shall find our interest so woven and involved with theirs, that the cause is more ours than theirs. If religion be in peril, we have the most flourishing and orthodox church: if honour be in question, the stories and monuments in former ages will shew, that our ancestors have left us as much as any nation: if trade and commerce be in danger, we are islanders; it is our life. All these at once lie at stake, and so doth our very safety and being. Lastly, In respect of the manner of his majesty's demand, which is in parliament; the way that hath ever best pleased the subjects of England. And good cause for it: for Aids granted in parliament work good effects for the people; they be commonly accompanied with wholesome laws, gracious pardons, and the like. Besides, just and good kings, finding the love of their people, and the readiness of their Supplies, may the better forbear the use of their prerogatives; and moderate the rigour of the laws towards their subjects.—This way, as his maj. hath told you, he hath chosen, not as the only way, but as the fittest; not as substitute of others, but as most agreeable to the goodness of his own most gracious disposition, and to the desire and weal of his people. If this be deferred, necessity and the sword of the enemy will make way to the others. Remember his majesty's admonition; I say, remember it. Let me but add, and observe God's mercy towards this land above all others. The torrent of war hath overwhelmed other churches and countries; but God hath hitherto restrained it from us, and still gives us warning of every approaching danger, to save us from surprise. And our gracious sovereign, in a true sense of it, calls together his high court of parliament; the lively representation of the wisdom, wealth, and power of the whole kingdom, to join together to repel those hostile attempts, which have distressed our friends and allies, and do threaten ourselves. And therefore it behoves all to apply their thoughts unto counsel and consultations, worthy the greatness and wisdom of this assembly; to avoid discontents and divisions, which may either distemper or delay; and to attend that unum necessarium, the common cause; propounding for the scope and mark of all your debates, the general good of the king and kingdom whom God hath joined together with an indissoluble knot, which none must attempt to cut or untie. And let all, by unity and good accord, endeavour to pattern this parliament by the best that have been, that it may be a pattern to future parliaments, and may infuse into parliaments a kind of multiplying power and faculty, whereby they may be more frequent; and the king our sovereign may delight to sit on his throne, and from thence to distribute his graces and favours amongst his people. His maj. hath given you cause to be confident of this, by what you have heard from his own royal mouth; which, nevertheless, he hath given me express command to redouble. If this parliament, by their dutiful and wise proceedings, shall but give the occasion, his maj. will be ready, not only to manifest his gracious acceptance, but to put out all memory of those distastes that have troubled former parliaments.—I have but one thing more to add; and that is, as your consultations should be serious, so let them be speedy. The enemy is before-hand with us, and flies on the wings of success. We may dandle and play with the hour-glass that is in our power, but the hour will not stay for us; and an opportunity once lost, cannot be regained. And therefore, so resolve of your Supplies that they may be timely and sufficient, sorting the occasion: your council, your aid, all are but lost, if your aid be too little, or too late: and his maj. is resolved, that his affairs cannot permit him to expect it overlong.”

The Speaker's Oration to the Throne.] March 19. The commons presented sir John Finch, for their Speaker; whose speech, for being excused from that office, with the lord keeper's reply, being purely ceremonial, we purposely omit; to come to the speaker's rejoinder. The copy given in Rushworth and the 'Ephemeris Parliamentaria' is very incorrect: but the following is taken from an original MS. communicated by sir John Napier, bart. to the editors of the Parliamentary or Constitutional History, in the hand-writing of his great-grand-father, a member of the house at that time:—

“It is now no longer time, nor good manners, to dispute with my lord the king; but, with all joy and alacrity of heart, humbly and thankfully to meet so great a favour from the best of masters, and the best of men. Therefore, first, I lift up my heart to Him that sits on the Throne of Heaven, ‘per quem principes imperant & potentes decernunt justitiam,’ humbly heging at his hands that made the tongue, to give me speech, and that framed the heart of man, to give me understanding; for I am but as clay in the hands of the potter, and he will mould me for honour or dishonour as best seems good unto him. Next I bow my knees unto your most excellent majesty, in all humble and hearty acknowledgment of this and many other your great and gracious favours. The truth of my own heart, full of zeal and duty to your maj. and the public as any man's, quits me from all fear of running into wilful and pregnant errors; and your majesty's great goodness, of which I have been so large a partaker, gives me strong assurance, that having been, by your gracious beams, drawn up from earth and obscurity, you will so uphold me, by a benign and gracious interpretation of all my words and actions, that I fall not down again, like a crude and imperfect vapour; but consume the remainder of my days in zeal for your majesty's service. This great and glorious assembly, made perfect by your royal presence; like a curious perspective, the more I behold it, with the more joy and comfort I find a lively representation of that true happiness, which, under your maj.'s gracious government, we all at this time enjoy: a better tongue were fitter to express it; but a rich stone retains its value, though ill set. Here, in the fulness and height of your glory, like the sun in the exaltation of his orb, sits your most excellent maj. the sovereign monarch of this famous isle, in a throne made glorious by a long succession of many and great princes. A meditation worthy our better thoughts, that we live neither enthralled to the fury and rage of the giddy multitude, nor yet to the distracted wills of many masters; but under the command of a king, the stay and strength of a people; one, as Homer saith well of kings,

not to be laid in common balance with other men; for kings know no other tenure but God's service, and their value is only tried at his beam: whence the poets said, the parents of the first kings were cœlum & terra; divine institution, and human approbation. Besides, that it is a sovereignty also hereditary; which makes the commonwealth the king's care, as that which is the king's own patrimony, and the inheritance of his children; when elective monarchies quickly run to ruin, and are commonly made poor by the enriching of several private families. On your right hand are the reverend, religious, and learned prelates, the lights of the church, fit to be set in golden candlesticks, and not made contemptible by parity or poverty: lively ideas of that blessing above all the rest, which, by God's great goodness, and your majesty's great piety, this realm enjoys, the liberty of the gospel, and the free profession of God's true religion. Your maj. passed the fiery trial in Spain, and gave us then assurance that your faith was built on that rock, against which the gates of Hell shall never prevail. Since your coming to the crown, by your royal edict, you have banished those incendiaries of Rome, the Priests, and Jesuits, enemies to our church and state; so that now they are either gone, or lurk in corners, like the sons of darkness. You have given life to the laws against Recusants; and, by your own pious example, have drawn more than you have compelled to come to church. Yet 'coge ingredi, ut impleatur domus mea,' was his command that made the great feast, and is the duty of magistrates. And certainly, dread sovereign, true religion will ever be a target to them that are a buckler to it: no cement so strong to hold your subjects hearts together in their due obedience. Our religion never bred a Clement or a Ravillac: and that execrable villainy, never to be forgotten here; when all of us, horresco referens, in an instant should have been turned into ashes, and those scattered in the wind; was a monster that could never have been engendered, but by the Devil or the Jesuits.—On your left hand sit your nobles, the lights of honour, full of courage and magnanimity; yet in a right distance between crown and people, neither overshadowing the one, or oppressing the other.—Before your throne, like the 12 lions under Solomon's throne, sit the lights of justice, your grave judges and sages of the law; learned and just as many ages have known, and learning justice by your great example. Our laws, as excellent as they are, (I am sure no human laws excel them, nor could so well suit with the constitution of this people) were they in the power of corrupt or ignorant men, (I know not which were worse, for one will perhaps oftener err than the other bribe) justice could never keep her right channel, nor run clear; as in your maj.'s happy reign it ever hath.—I must not forget the other lights, the knights, citizens, and burgesses, the representatives of the third estate; who, although they move lower, and at more distance from your royal person, yet, I am confident, will ever be found constant to the poles of love and loyalty.—It is a gracious favour of your maj. and our former kings, which I have often thought on, that when both houses are humble suitors for any thing, they are never denied; le roy s'avisera. (the king will advise of it) is the greatest denial. And I assure myself your maj. will find all your subjects so full of duty to your crown, and of true and loyal affection to your royal person, that you shall never have cause to think your gracious favours ill bestowed on them. This union of hearts, sir, is a greatness beyond that of the kingdom to which you are heir:

'Et penitus toto divisos Orbe Britannos,' is a name of advantage to this island, if the division be not among ourselves; which the God of Unity, for his mercy's sake, forbid; and so knit our hearts in love one to another, and all of us in love and loyalty to your most excellent majesty, that this renowned island perish not by our distractions; but may ever flourish, and be like Jerusalem, the city of God, where his name may be for ever honoured. Great and glorious have been the actions of your royal progenitors; yet greater remain for your majesty; and most of theirs attend you for their perfection and consummation.—The first Christian king of Europe; the first that abated the swelling pride of the Pope of Rome, by banishing his usurped power over God's true vice-gerent; the first that established the true religion now profest, were all kings of England; and the last a young one.—Queen Elizabeth, though a woman, yet Spain hath cause to remember her; the protestants of France and the Low Countries will never forget her: and were Henry the Great alive, he would say, That, in requital of the love this kingdom shewed him in her days, he hath sent us one of his own loins, your royal consort; our most gracious queen, to propagate these blessings to us and our posterity for ever.—Your father, of ever blessed and famous memory, had a reign like Solomon's; for religion, no man knew more; nor no man's knowledge was of higher lustre and advantage to it: This age shall deliver it to the next, and all ages shall see it in his kingly works.—But while under his glorious reign, we abounded in peace and plenty, our hands had forgot to war, and our fingers to fight, till at last, by your princely mediation, upon the humble suit of both these houses, the two Treaties were dissolved; and a foundation laid for your maj: to restore us to our antient and military honour; which I doubt will not quickly be.—Eritis sicut dii, was the serpent's counsel, and ruined mankind; nor is it fit for private men, much less for me, to seafth into the counsels or actions of kings: only, sir, give me leave, from an heart full of zeal to your glory and greatness, to say to your maj. The times require you, religion calls upon you, to go on with that kingly courage you have begun, till the state of Christendom be settled in the right balance again.—We see how the eagle spreads his wings in Germany, reaching with his talons as far as the Sound and Baltic sea, Denmark and Sweden in danger of utter ruin; we see all the electorates, the choice of the empire, invested, in a manner, solely in the house of Austria; our religion in France, and every where, never so near a period: and we know who it is for whom all this works; he of whom the boast is made, Ille cui monarchia mundi nascitur; who, by the ruin of us and our religion, will make a new Zodiack, and draw his Ecliptic Line through the east and West Indies: but He that sits on high, will, in his good time, laugh them to scorn; and, as that wise woman said to king David, 'God will make to my lord the king a sure house, if my lord the king will fight the battles of Jehovah' and let all England say, Amen.—I have presumed too far upon your royal patience, and therefore I will conclude with a few words for them that sent me, who are humble suitors to your excellent maj.: 1. For better attending the public and important services of the house, that ourselves and necessary attendance may be free, both in our persons and goods, from all arrests and troubles, according to our antient privileges and immunities. 2. That since, in all great counsels where difference of opinion is, truth is best discovered by free debates; your majesty, according to our like antient use and privilege, will be graciously pleased to allow us liberty and freedom of speech; and, I assure myself, we shall not pass the latitude of duty and discretion. 3. That upon all occurrences of moment, fit for resort to your own person, your maj. upon our humble suit, at your own best leisure, will vouchsafe us access to your royal person. 4. That all our proceedings, being lodged in our heart with belief of our zeal and loyalty, we may reap the fruits of it by your maj.'s gracious and favourable interpretation of all our actions.—One word more I humbly beg for myself: 'That though it be but the beginning of a parliament, I may now and ever enjoy your maj.'s most gracious, general and free pardon.'

The Lord Keeper's Answer.] To this the Lord. Keeper answered: *—"Mr. Speaker, His majesty, with no less content than attention, hath heard your eloquent discourse: he observes your beginning with his gracious encouragement and advice; not forsaking your humble modesty, but adding to it thankfulness, alacrity, and joy of heart; a just and right temper. He observes you derive these aright. First, from the Throne of Heaven: he looks thither with you, and joins in prayer, that both he and all this assembly may, by that divine hand and power, be moulded into unity for the honour, safety, and good of the church and kingdom. Next, you apply yourself to the throne on earth: his maj. doth graciously accept your protestations of the truth of your heart, the fulness of your zeal and duty to his maj. and the public: he believes it; and that not in you alone, but in all this assembly, so that you are secure not only from wilful and pregnant errors, but from doubt of sinister interpretation.—My lord the king is as an angel of God, of a quick, of a noble and just apprehension; he strains not at gnats; he will easily distinguish between a vapour and a fog, between a mist of error and a cloud of evil; right he knows if the heart be right: for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh.—You proceed to a survey of the lustre of this great and glorious assembly; and in that, as in a curious crystal, you observe the true happiness which we all here enjoy. You have distributed and divided aright; and whosoever sees it otherwise hath an evil eye, or a false glass. We have enjoyed it long, through the happy means of gracious and good princes; and the way to enjoy it still, is to know and heartily to acknowledge it, and that 'God hath not done so to any other nation.'—The prime cause or means of this our happiness is, as you mention, the form of government under which we live; a monarchy, and the best of monarchies, where sovereignty is hereditary; no inter regnum or competition for a crown; descent and succession are all one. The spirit of God, by the mouth of the wisest of kings, long since proclaimed this happiness, 'Blessed art thou, O land, when thy king is the son of nobles.'—The frames of other states are subject, some to inconstant levity, some to faction, some to emulation and ambition; and all to manifold distempers, in which the people go to wreck. Monarchy is the most natural, and in it unity is the best cement of all government; principally in respect of the unity of the head, which commands the rest. And, therefore, other states, when they have tried a while, do, for the most part, resolve into this; as into the best, for peace, for strength, and for continuance. But forms of other governments, though never so exact, move not of themselves, but are moved of their governors: and, therefore, our monarchy, (as you have truly said) and this glorious assembly, the lively image and representation of our monarchy, are made happy and perfect by the royal presence, that sits here in his highest royal throne; the throne of the law-giver, glorious in itself, glorious by those happy laws and oracles which have issued from it, and most glorious by them that sit on it, his maj. and his royal progenitors; incomparable kings, that, with so much honour, have swayed the scepter of this kingdom so many successions of ages.—In the next place, after the throne of maj. you look into the chair of doctrine, the reverend prelates; and upon the state of religion, their proper charge. This is the blessing of all blessings, the pledge and assurance that secures to us all the rest; that as our religion is most sincere and orthodox, so our clergy are eminent, both for purity of doctrine and integrity of life; our priests are clothed with righteousness, and their lips preserve knowledge; and, therefore, God's saints may and do sing with joyfulness. I must join with you in attributing this our transcendent blessing, as in the first place, to God's goodness; so, in the second, to his majesty's piety; who, following the steps of his ever-blessed father, is careful that all the lamps of the church may be furnished with oil; and especially those, which are set on golden candlesticks, with the purest oil. The schools also, and nurseries of learning, never so replenished, especially with divinity, as in this last age; and as they all shew his majesty's piety, so are they infallible arguments of his constancy.—The trial, which you call the fiery trial, undergone by his maj. in a place of danger, and against the power and policy of Rome and Spain, have approved his resolution immutable; and his own remarkable example in his closet and his chapel, his strict oversight of, and command to his household servants, and his charge to his bishops and judges, his edicts, his proclamations and commissions, and the like for the execution of the laws, and his general care to preserve the fountain pure both from schism and superstition, are fair fruits and effects of a pious and zealous government.—From the chair of doctrine, you turn to the state of honour, unto the nobles and barons of England. These are robur belli, who, for the service of the king and kingdom, are to make good with their swords what the churchmen must hallow and bless by their prayers. And therefore, as the prelates are the great lights of the church, so the nobility are the stars of the state; and you know that the stars have fought, and fought powerfully, against the enemies of God.—

From the state of honour, you come to the state of justice, and to the 12 lions under Solomon's throne, the judges and sages of the law; and as their peculiar charge intrusted to them by our sovereign, the laws of the kingdom: laws undoubtedly fitted to the constitution of this people, for Leges Angliæ et Consuetudines Angliæ are synonymous, and Consuetudo est altera natura; so as, besides the justice and rightness of the laws, they are become natural to our people; and that is one of the powerfulest means which begetteth obedience: and such laws, in the mouths of learned and upright judges, are like waters in a pure channel; which the fairer it runs, the clearer they run, and produce that wherewith Solomon speaks, 'When the righteous are in authority, the people rejoice.'—From the law, you pass to the knights, citizens and burgesses, or the third estate, who represent the commons of England, in whom the scripture is verified; 'In the multitude of people is the king's honour:' and, therefore, you may be sure that distance of place and order breeds no distance in affection; for wise kings ever lay their honour next to their hearts, kings are pastores populi; and the shepherd's care is nothing less to the furthest, then to the next part of this flock; and it is as much towards the least of his lambs, as towards the greatest cattle. And as in the natural body, no member is so remote, but it is still within the care of the head: so in this great politic body of the kingdom, no rank or order of people is so low, or at such distance from the throne, but it daily feels the influence and benefit of the king's care and protection. And, to say the truth, in a well-governed kingdom, the superior ranks of nobles, of judges, and of magistrates, are not ordained for themselves, but as conduits for the king's justice, protection and goodness to the lower ranks of his people: and as the people are, so it is just cause they should be, constant to the poles of love and loyalty.—And thus having pursued both houses by divided parts, you join them together; and in that junction, you observe truly and materially that the greatest denial of their joint requests, is, "The king will advise." A note very remarkable: it shews the indulgence of kings; it shews also the wisdom and judgment of the houses; the king not willing to deny his people; people not willing to press their king to a denial: the one wise and modest in their requests, and the other moderate and sweet in the answer; this is the antient and right way of union in parliament. May the God of Unity keep it in this, and all ensuing parliaments! This union you rightly call the union of hearts, and a greatness beyond the kingdoms which the king inherits: so then it is a present fit for a wise people to offer to their gracious king. Wise and magnanimous kings are a special gift from God, having hearts capable of greatness: union of hearts is greatness, and greatness was never unwelcome to kings; and therefore present and offer it to your king, and you cannot doubt of acceptance.—Having spoken of union, you fall presently into a memorial of the great and glorious actions of his majesty's predecessors, and into the height and contemplation of greater that remain. If I mistake not your meaning, you would have it understood, that he union of prince and people made way to those remarkable acts of former times; and that we that wish the like success in our time, should look back upon our forefathers. Wisdom requires it; honour and the times require it, that we should shew ourselves the sons of our ancestors, at least, in holding that which they left us. The pride of Rome abated, as we say, by England, now lifts up her horns again: religion, God's vine planted and deeply rooted here, over-spread into our neighbour countries, hath of late lost many of her bodily branches. The Austrian Eagle, that ranted feathers till of late, now soars and reys at will over all. Spain, so often foiled by us, hath, by disguised treaties, despoiled of her patrimony those princely branches of our royal cedar; and posts apace to his universal monarchy, to the ruin of us, our friends and religion. God hath his time, and I trust time to stop their course: I know not but we may expect it as well now as ever. There is resolution in our king, and there is, I trust, (for I am sure there was) a resolution in our parliament, for great actions. Our king as he was a Solomon, so hath he many Davids in him: he glorious catalogue of his royal descent; he hath linked himself to the house of Henry the Great, who bears a glorious and auspicious name suitable to his thoughts and desires: and, therefore, since honour and religion all for it; and since you have encouraged him to fight Jehovah's battles, let all put to their hands, that our king and nation may have the honour to set Christendom in her right balance.—And now to come to the petition you have made for the house. His majesty hath graciously and readily grants them all, according to your true and antient rights and privileges of parliament; which, his majesty trusts, he will take care not to exceed or transgress; and, therefore, you may go cheerfully together, and speedily set about the public affairs. And may Almighty God prosper the works of your hands, I say, the Almighty God prosper your handy-work!"

The Commons receive the Sacrament.] Mar. 20. It was ordered, 'That all the members of that house should receive the communion at St. Margaret's church, Westminster; on Sunday the 6th of April next.' Particular persons were assigned to see that each member took the same; who were to have, and produce in his house, certificates of it, before they were allowed to sit there. But, lest this act of devotion should be termed, as it had been, an old stale trick to catch concealed papists by, it was followed by a motion for a committee to be appointed, to draw up a Petition to the king, for a General Fast, to be observed throughout the kingdom. This Petition was drawn, read and agreed unto, the next day; and the lords were desired to concur with them in it; which, being also consented to, the petition was presented to the king, in hæc verba:

Petition of both Houses for a Fast.] "Most Gracious Sovereign, We your most humble and loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled; upon a tender and compassionate sense of the extreme calamities of the Reformed Churches abroad; and with much sorrow, apprehending the displeasure of Almighty God, declared against ourselves, by the manifold evils already fallen upon us and those which are further threatened; (as by your sacred majesty were intimated unto us) even to the utter destruction and subversion of this church and state, all which our sins have most justly deserved: and being now, by your majesty's gracious favour, assembled in parliament, (as the Great Council of this your kingdom) to consult of such means, as we think fittest, to redress the present, and prevent the future evils; wherein we, through God's blessing, intend to employ our utmost endeavours, with as good hearts to your majesty and the public service, as ever people did, humbly beseech your majesty that by your special command, one or more days may be, forthwith, solemnly set apart; wherein, both ourselves and the whole kingdom may by fasting and prayers, seek reconciliation at the hands of Almighty God; and with humble and penitent hearts beseech him to remove those miseries that lie upon us and our neighbour churches; to avert those which are threatened; to continue the favours we yet enjoy; and, particularly, to bestow his abundant blessing upon your majesty and this present parliament; so that all our councils and resolutions, being blessed by his Divine Assistance, may produce much honour, safety, and happiness to your majesty, your people, and allies."

The King's Answer.] To the above Petition, the king returned this answer. "His majesty is well pleased with the petition, and is well content to have a Fast: as for the time of keeping it, he appoints Saturday, April 5, in London, Westminster, and by both houses. Before which time it may be hoped that we shall have cause to praise God for the good success of what we shall, by that time, resolve on; as, also, beg his mercies towards others, of our religion, now in danger and calamities, and both these in one." The king appointed the 21st of April for a general Fast throughout the rest of the kingdom.

Debate upon Public Grievances.] The commons went now upon the old topic of Grievances; and many complaints were made against the government, for Billetting of Soldiers; Raising Money by Loans, by Benevolences and Privy Seals: and, what was too fresh in memory, the Imprisonment of certain gentlemen, who refused to lend, upon that account, and afterwards, bringing their Habeas Corpus, were, nevertheless, remanded to prison. All these took place before the Supply;

nor did the house incline to grant any till these Grievances were redressed. In the debate upon these matters, several speeches of the members are preserved both in print and manuscript; all which we have ranged in the best order we could, distinguishing the several authorities from whence they are taken: it happened on the 22nd of March, and was opened by sir Francis Seymour, to the following effect:*

Sir Francis Seymour. 'This is the great council of the kingdom; and here, if not here alone, his maj. may see, as in a true glass, the state of the kingdom. We are all called hither, by his writs, to give him faithful counsel; such as may stand with his honour; but that we must do without flattery: and being chosen by the commons to deliver up their just Grievances, this we must do without fear. Let us not be like Cambyse's judges; who, being asked by him concerning something unlawful, said, 'Tho' there were no written law, the Persian kings might do what they list.' This was base flattery, fitter for reproof than imitation; and as flattery, so fear taketh away the judgment. I shall shun both these; and speak my mind with as much duty to his maj. as any man, not neglecting the public. But how can we speak our affections while we retain our fears, or speak of giving, till we know whether we have any thing to give: for if his maj. may be persuaded to take what he will, what need we to give? That this hath been done, appeareth by the Billetting of Soldiers; a thing no way advantageous to his service, and a burthen to the commonwealth: the Imprisonment of gentlemen for the Loan; who if they had done the contrary for fear, their faults had been as great as those who were the projectors of it. To countenance these proceedings, hath it not been preached in the pulpit, or rather prated, 'All we have is the king's jure divino?' But when preachers forsake their own calling, and turn ignorant statesmen; we see how willing they are to change a good conscience for a bishoprick. It is too apparent the people suffer more now than ever: will you know the true reason? We shall find those princes have been in greatest wants and necessities, that have exacted most of their subjects. The reason is plain: a prince is strongest by faithful and wise counsel: I would I could truly say such had been employed abroad. I speak this to shew the defect proceeded not from this house. I must confess he is no good subject that would not willingly and freely lay down his life, when the end may be the service of his maj. and the good of the commonwealth: but he is no good subject, but a slave, that will let his goods be taken from him against his will, and his liberty against the laws of the kingdom. In doing this we shall but tread the steps of our forefathers, who still preferred the public interest before their own rights, nay, before their own lives. It will be a wrong to us, to our posterities, to our consciences, if we shall forego this. This we shall do well to present to his maj. I offer this in the general, thinking the particulars fitting for committees. What I may now say, or shall then, I submit to better judgments.'

Sir John Elliot did passionately and rhetorically set forth our late Grievances; he disliked much the violating of our laws, urged many good arguments for our propugning them; and concluded for a committee.*

Sir Humphrey May. 'Let us take heed of distrusting the king, who is young and vigorous, full of spirit and courage, and may be won to our desires by our complying: he alledged all these illegal proceedings were actions of necessity, and the like; with other things, by way of excuse.*'

Sir Tho. Edmonds. 'The king congratulating this present parliament, he prays for a speedy Supply; he assures us of his gracious inclination towards us, and of the consequences of this meeting; doth intimate how much the safety of ourselves and confederates abroad depends upon the good success thereof, and he wisheth a general oblivion of things that are past, lest they cause distractions anew, without a primary and free Supply to his majesty.*'

Sir Kob. Philips. 'I read of a custom among the old Romans, that once every year they had a solemn feast for their slaves; at which they had liberty, without exception, to speak what they would, thereby to ease their afflicted minds; which being finished, they severally returned to their former servitude. This may, with some resemblance and distinction, well set forth our present state; where now, after the revolution of some time, and grievous sufferance of many violent oppressions, we have, as those slaves had, a day of liberty of speech; but shall not, I trust, be hereafter slaves, for we are free: yet what new illegal proceedings our states and persons have suffered under, my heart yearns to think, my tongue falters to utter. They have been well represented by divers worthy gentlemen before me: yet one Grievance, and the main one, as I conceive, hath not been touched, which is our Religion: religion, Mr. Speaker, made vendible by commission; and men, for pecuniary annuities, dispensed withal; whereby Papists may without fear of law, practise idolatry. For the oppressions under which we groan, I draw them under two heads; Acts of Power against Law, and Judgments of Law against our Liberty. Of the first sort are, strange Instructions; violent Exactions of Money thereupon Imprisonment of the Persons of such who (to deliver over to their posterity the liberty they received from their forefathers, and lawfully were in possession of) refused so to lend; and this aggravated by the remediless continuance and length thereof: and chiefly, the strange, vast, and unlimited power of our lieutenants and their deputies; in billeting of soldiers, in making rates, in granting warrants for taxes as their discretions shall guide them: and all this against the law. These last are the most insupportable burdens that, at this present, afflict our poor country; and the most cruel oppression that ever yet the kingdom of England endured. These upstart deputy-lieutenants (of whom, perhaps, in some cases and times, there may be good use, being regulated by law) are the worst of grievances; and the most forward and zealous executioners of those violent and unlawful courses which have been commended unto them; of whose proceedings, and for the qualifying of whose unruly power, it is more than time to consult and determine. Judgments of law against our liberty there have been 3; each latter stepping forwarder than the former, upon the Right of the Subject; aiming in the end to tread and trample under foot our law, and that even in the form of law. The 1st was the judgment of the Postnati (the Scots); whereby a nation (which I heartily love for their singular good zeal in our religion, and their free spirits to preserve our liberties far beyond many of us) is made capable of any the like favours, privileges, and immunities as ourselves enjoy; and this especially argued, in the Exchequer-chamber, by all the Judges of England. The 2d, was, the Judgment upon Impositions, in the Exchequer-court by the barons; which hath been the source and fountain of many bitter waters of affliction unto our merchants. The 3rd was, that fatal late Judgment against the Liberty of the Subject imprisoned by the king, argued and pronounced but by one judge alone.—I can live, although another who has no right be put to live with me; nay, I can live although I pay excises and impositions more than I do; but to have my liberty, which is the soul of my life, taken from me by power; and to have my body pent up in a gaol, without remedy by law, and to be so adjudged: O improvident ancestors! O unwise forefathers! To be so curious in providing for the quiet possession of our laws, and the liberties of parliament; and to neglect our persons and bodies, and to let them lie in prison, and that durante bene-placito, remedies! If this be law, why do we talk of liberties? Why do we trouble ourselves with a dispute about law, franchises, property of goods, and the like? What may any man call his own, if not the Liberty of his Person? I am weary of treading these ways; and therefore conclude to have a select committee deputed, to frame a Petition to his maj. for redress of these things; which being approved by the house, may be delivered to the king; of whose gracious Answer we have no cause to doubt, our desires being so reasonable, our intentions so loyal, and the manner so humble: neither need we fear this to be the critical parliament, as was insinuated, or this a way to distraction; but assure ourselves of a happy issue. Then shall the king, as he calls us his great council, find us his true council, and own us his good council. Which God grant!"

Mr. Godwin. "It hath pleased his maj. in his last speech, to intimate unto us the cause of our meeting; which is to grant Supply against the great and common dangers that threaten the ruin of this kingdom; and as the time of our sitting cannot be long, he therefore wisheth us to avoid all tedious resolutions. In conformity whereunto I propound; That, laying aside all other matters, we address ourselves to that for which we were called hither; wherein, as in the first place, we have well begun, in our pious humiliation towards Almighty God, so let us now proceed to serve and supply the king; yet so as to satisfy our country that sent us hither, and preserve our rights and privileges; which have as surely been broken and infringed, as undoubtedly they belong to us."

Sir Benj. Rudyard. "It is the goodness of God, and the favour of the king, that hath brought us again to this place, and if we be thankful to both, as our duty to both requires, our meeting certainly will be crowned with a blessing. This is the crisis of parliaments; by this we shall know whether parliaments will live or die; besides, the eyes of Christendom are upon us; the king and the kingdom will be valued, and disvalued, both by enemies and friends, according to the success of this parliament. The council here in this house will have an expectation upon all the councils of Christendom; our lives, our fortunes, and our religion depend upon the dissolution of this assembly, wherefore we had need to be wise. His maj. hath already begun in affection, proclaiming, through the whole kingdom, that he relies wholly upon our loves; which, if we do not answer in our actions, we are worse than unworthy of his. The cause why we are called hither is, to save ourselves; and self-preservation is a thing so natural, as sure no man needs to be persuaded to it. We are not now upon the benches of the kingdom, we are upon the very essence of it; whether we shall be a kingdom or no; when we have made it sure that England is ours, then may we have time to prune and to dress it. Is it a small matter think you, that we have actually invaded the territories of two of the most powerful kings of Christendom, provoking them only, without weakening them at all? Nay, that they are both united and become better friends, than ever they meant to have been? Seems it a small thing unto you, that we have beaten ourselves, more than our enemies could have done? And shall we still continue to do so by our divisions, by our distractions? Men and brethren, what shall we do? Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no remedy here? Then is it no where to be found, but in ruin? If we persevere, the king to draw one way, the parliament another, the common-wealth must sink in the midst: but I hope better things of so grave, so wise an assembly. I am no man's advocate, for I ever held it a thing beneath the dignity, against the integrity of this house, to respect any particular, but as he concerns the general; neither am I so wise or so presumptuous, as to condemn whatsoever hath been determined by a major part, in this place. Yet, sir, give me leave to say this, that one parliament may instruct another, as one day telleth another. Out of which consideration, I humbly beseech this house, to be curiously wary and careful to avoid all manner of contestation, personal or real. The hearts of kings are great, as are their fortunes; then are they fitted to yield, when they are yielded unto. It is comely and mannerly, that princes, in all fair appearance, should have the better of their subjects. Let us give the king a way to come off like himself; for I do verily believe, that he doth, with longing, expect the occasion. Notwithstanding, it is not only lawful for us, but it is our duty, both to advertise and advise the king, concerning the weighty affairs of the kingdom, else are we so far from being a great council, as we are no council at all. But the way to shew that we are the wise counsellors that we should be, is, to take a right course to attain the end of our counsels, which in my opinion, may, by this means, be compassed: by trusting the king, thereby to breed a trust in him towards us; for, without mutual confidence, a good success is not to be expected; by giving a large and ample Supply, proportionable to the greatness and importance of the work in hand; for counsel without money is but a speculation: by prostrating our grievances and advices, modestly and humbly at his majesty's feet; for from thence are they likeliest to find a way to his majesty's heart: by making it appear, that whatsoever we shall omit or abate, proceeds merely out of a dutiful and awful respect to the king only; for the body of a parliament acknowledgeth but one head: and, to say all at once, let our whole labours and endeavours be, to get the king on our side, for then shall we obtain whatsoever we can reasonably expect or desire. And this may be no hard matter to effect, considering the nearness of relation, between the king and his subjects, is such, as neither can have existence without the other. As concerning the bill brought in by that hon. and reverend person, (Sir Edw. Coke) it is, no doubt, necessary for the preservation of the Liberty of the Subject; for this I speak resolutely, he, that is not safe in his person and his goods, dwells not at home.*

Sir Tho. Wentworth. 'May this day's resolution be as happy as I conceive the proposition which now moves me to rise, to be seasonable and necessary: for whether we shall look upon the king or his people, it did never more behove this great physician, the parliament, to effect a true consent amongst the parties than now. This debate carries with it a double aspect; towards the sovereign, and towards the subject; though both be innocent, yet both are injured; both to be cured. In the representation of injuries I shall crave your attention; in the cure, I shall beseech your equal cares and better judgments. In the greatest humility I speak it, these illegal ways are Punishments and marks of indignation; the raising of money by Loans, strengthened by commission, with unheard of instructions; the billeting of Soldiers by the lieutenants, have been as if they could have persuaded Christian princes, nay worlds, that the right of empire was to take away goods by strong hand; and they have endeavoured, as far as was possible for them, to do it. This hath not been done by the king, (under the pleasing shade of whose crown, I hope we shall ever gather the fruits of justice) but by projectors; these have extended the prerogative of the king beyond its just limits, which mars the sweet harmony of the whole. They have rent from us the light of our eyes; enforced companies of guests worse than the ordinances of France, vitiated our wives and daughters before our faces, brought the crown to greater want than ever it was, by anticipating the revenue: and can the shepherd be thus smitten, and the flock not be scattered? They have introduced a privy council, ravishing, at once, the spheres of all antient government; imprisoning us without bail or bond. They have taken from us, what shall I say? Indeed what have they left us? They have taken from us all means of supplying the king, and ingratiating ourselves with him, by tearing up the roots of all property; which, if they be not seasonably set into the ground by his majesty's hand, we shall have, instead of beauty, baldness. To the making of all these whole I shall apply myself, and propound a remedy to all these diseases. By one and the same thing hath the king and people been hurt, and by the same must they be cured: to vindicate what? New things? No; our antient, lawful, and vital liberties, by reinforcing of the antient laws made by our ancestors; by setting such a stamp upon them, as no licentious spirit shall dare hereafter to enter upon them. And shall we think this a way to break a parliament? No: our desires are modest and just. I speak truly, both for the interest of the king and people. If we enjoy not these, it will be impossible to relieve him: therefore let us never fear but they will be accepted by his goodness. Wherefore I shall descend to my motion, which consists of four parts; two of which have relation to the Persons, and two to the Property of our goods. 1st. For our Persons, the freedom of them from imprisonment, and from employments abroad, against our own consents, contrary to the antient customs of this kingdom. The 2nd, for our Goods, That no levies may be made but by parliament; and no billeting of soldiers. It is most necessary that these be resolved, that the subjects may be secured in both. Then, for the manner, it will be fit to determine it by a grand committee.*

Sir Edw. Coke. "Dum tempus habemus, iocundum operemur. I am absolutely for giving supply to his maj. yet with some caution. To all you of foreign dangers and inbred evils, I will not do it; the state is inclining to a consumption, yet not incurable; I fear not foreign enemies; God send us peace at home: for this cause, I will propound remedies; I will seek nothing out of my own head, but from my heart; and out of acts of parliament. I am not able to fly at all Grievances, but only at means. Let us not flatter ourselves. Who will sue Subsidies, if the king may impose what he will? And if, after parliament, the king may balance what he pleaseth; I know the king will not do it. I know he is a religious king, not from personal vices; but he deals with other men's hands and sees with other men's eyes. Will any give a subsidy, if they are to be taxed after parliament at pleasure? The king cannot lawfully tax any by way of Loans, differ from them, who would have this of us go amongst Grievances; for I would have it go alone.—I'll begin with a noble record: it bears me to think of it, 26 Edw. 3. It is worthy to be written in letters of gold: 'Loans against the will of the subject, are against reason, and the franchises of the land, and they are restitution.' [Vol. 1. p. 117.] What a word is that franchise? The lord may tax his man high or low, but it is against the franchises of the land, for freemen to be taxed, but by their consent in parliament. Franchise is French word, and in Latin it is Libertas. In Magna Charta it is provided, that 'Nullus liber homo capiatur vel imprisonetur, aut disseisetur a libero tenemento suo, &c. nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum, vel per legem terræ.' This Charter hath been confirmed by sundry good kings, above thirty times.*

Sir John Cooke, (secretary of state.) 'I had rather you would hear any man than me. I did not answer what hath been already spoken. My intent is not to stir, but to quiet; not to provoke, but to appease: my desire is, that every one resort to his own heart to re-unite the king and the state, and to take away the scandal from us. Every one speaks from the benediction of his heart: I do conclude, out of every one's conclusion, both to give to the king, and to redress Grievances; all the difference is about the manner. We are all inhabitants in one house, the common-wealth. Let every one amend his own house, for something is amiss in every one; but if all the house be on fire, will ye then think of mending what is amiss? Will ye not rather quench the fire?

The danger all apprehend; the way that is propounded, I seek not to decline. Illegal courses have been taken, it must be confessed; the redress must be by laws and punishment: but, withal, add the law of necessity: necessity hath no law, you must enable the state to do, what you do, by petition, require. It is wished that we begin with Grievances: I offer not that we prepare them, but shall we offer them first? Will not this seem a condition with his maj.? do we not deal with a wise king, jealous of his honour? all the Subsidies we can give cannot advantage his maj. so much, as that his subjects do cheerfully agree to supply him: this will amaze the enemy more than ten subsidies: begin therefore, with the king, and not with ourselves.'

But neither this day, nor the next, produced any resolutions; the time being spent in a general opening of Grievances from all parts of the kingdom.

[DEBATES ON THE SUPPLY.] We are obliged to Rushworth for the following Debates on the Supply, &c. which were opened by Mr. Secretary Cooke, on the 24th March, to this effect.

Mr. Secretary Cooke. 'We all think fit, that both Supplies and Grievances go hand in hand together; but let me put you in mind of that which concerns the king: let him have the precedency of honour, if not of time: let the heads of the king's Supply first be propounded; this will be an honour to the king, and will do service to the house; the end of this parliament is the subsistence of the king, as he himself hath declared; and such a command is not now to be slighted: the king himself propounded it, and then he will agree with us in other requests that are fit for a king to give: we, that have the happiness to attend his maj. can tell you, that no king is more ready to hear the complaints of his subjects; and, withal, you know no king is more sensible of all reproaches which touch his honour. Will it not be fit to grant him this honour, to have the precedency? It was the speech of an anti-parliament man, Let us deal gently with our king: by these laws that we make, we do bind ourselves, and it is an addition to his power: none dies, but he leaves his heir to the favour of the king: we having made our first union with God, it is next intended, that we be at one with our king: is it not fit we lie at peace with our head? his maj. desires it, and expects it. After this unity with our head, there is consideration to be had of unity with ourselves: after this, we shall be all knit in one body, we shall all pronounce clearly Shiboleth; and we shall consider of the grievances and irregularities of the times, which none desires to be reformed more than his maj. and those whom you think most averse: let us take the best way for reformation: and will not this be an happy union if the whole body concur to reduce all into regularity? If laws be our birth-rights, we shall thereby recover them and their splendor: this will have a good aspect abroad, and will give courage to our men that have been despised; it will prevent practices to continue divisions amongst us, both at home and abroad.—The first sower of seeds of distractions amongst us, was an agent of Spain, Gondomar, that did his master great service here and at home. Since that we have had other ministers that have blown the fire: the ambassador of France told his master at home, what he had wrought here the last parliament, namely, divisions between king and people; and he was rewarded for it. Whilst we sate here in parliament, there was another intended Parliament of Jesuits in Clerkenwell, and other well-willers, within a mile of this place: that this is true, was discovered by letters sent to Rome; the place of their meeting is changed, and some of them are there where they ought to be: if you look in your kalendar, there is a day of St. Joseph; it was called in the letter the oriental day, and that was the day intended for their meeting. I speak this, to see God's hand to work our union by their division; they are not more rent from us, than they are from themselves. I desire the meanest judgment to consider what may follow by giving precedence to his maj.; and, by so doing, we shall put from ourselves many imputations. If we give any occasion of breach, it is a great disadvantage; if otherwise, it is an obligation to the king, which his maj. will not forget.—Then he made a motion, That the same committee may hear Propositions of general Heads of Supply, and afterward go to other businesses of the day for Grievances. Others preferred the consideration of Grievances, as a particular root that invades the main Liberty of the Subject. It is the law, said they, that glorious fundamental right, whereby we have power to give; we desire but that his maj. may see us have that right therein, which, next to God, we all desire; and then, we doubt not, but we shall give his maj. all the Supply we can.

March 25. Mr. Secretary Coyke tendered the house certain Propositions from the king touching Supply; and told them, That his maj. finding time precious, expects that they should begin speedily, lest they spend that time in deliberation, which should be spent in action: that he esteems the Grievances of the house his own, and stands not on precedence in point of honour: therefore to satisfy his maj. let the same committee take his maj.'s Propositions into consideration, and let both concur, whether to sit on the one in the forenoon, or the other in the afternoon; it is all one to his majesty.

Hereupon the house went into a committee; and commanded Edw. Littleton, esq. into the chair; and ordered the committee to take into consideration the Liberty of the Subject, in his person and in his goods; and also to take into consideration his maj.'s Supply. In this debate, the Grievances were reduced to 6 heads, as to our Persons. 1. Attendance at the Council-board. 2. Imprisonment. 3. Confinement. 4. Designation to Foreign Employment. 5. Martial Law. 6. Undue Proceedings in Matter of Judicature.—The first matter debated, was the subject's Liberty in his Person: the particular instance was, in the case of sir John Heveningham, and those other gentlemen, who were imprisoned about Loan-money; and thereupon having brought their Habeas Corpus, had their case argued, and were nevertheless remanded to prison; and judgment, as it was then said, was entered.—Hereupon

Mr. Creskeld, (of Lincoln's-inn,) spake to this purpose:—"I stand up to speak somewhat concerning the point of the Subject's Grievance, by Imprisonment of their Persons, without any declaration of the cause; contrary to, and in derogation of, the fundamental laws and liberties of this kingdom. I think I am one of the puisnes of our profession, that are members of this house; but howsoever, sure I am, that, in respect of my own inability, I am the puisne of the whole house: therefore, according to the usual course of students in our profession, I may, as the puisne, speak first in time, because I can speak least in matter. In pursuance of which course I shall rather put the case, than argue it; and therefore I shall humbly desire, first of all, of this hon. house in general, that the goodness of the cause may receive no prejudice by the weakness of my argument; and next, of my masters here of the same profession in particular, that they, by their learned judgments, will supply the great defects I shall discover by declaring of my unlearned opinion. Before I speak of the question, give me leave, as an entrance thereunto, to speak first of the occasion. Ye all know that justice is the life and the heart's blood of the commonwealth; and if the commonwealth bleed in that master-vein, all the balm in Gilead is but in vain to preserve this our body of policy from ruin and destruction. Justice is both columna & corona reipublicæ; she is both the column and the pillar; the crown and the glory of the commonwealth. This is made good in Scripture by the Judgment of Solomon, the wisest king that ever reigned on earth. For 1st, she is the pillar; for he saith, 'That by justice the throne is established.' 2dly, she is the crown; for he saith 'that by justice a nation shall be exalted.' Our laws, which are the rules of justice, are the ne plus ultra to both the king and the subject; and, as they are Hercules's pillars, so are they the pillars of Hercules to every prince which he must not pass. Give me leave to resemble justice to Nebuchadnezzar's tree; for she is so great, that she doth shade not only the palace of the king, and the house of nobles but doth also shelter the cottage of the poorest beggar. Wherefore, if either now the blast of indignation, or the irresistible violator of laws, necessity, hath so bruised any of the branches of this tree, that either our persons or goods, or possessions, have not the same

shelter as before; yet, let us not therefore neglect the root of this great tree; but rather, with all our possible means, endeavours, and unfeigned duties, both apply fresh and fertile mould unto it, and also water it even with our own tears; that so these bruised branches may be recovered, and the whole tree again prosper and flourish. For this I have learned from an ancient father of the church, that though preces egum sunt armatæ, yet arma subditorum are not only preces & lachrymæ. I know well but cor regis inscrutabile, and that kings, although they are but men before God, yet they are gods before men. And therefore to my gracious and dread sovereign, (whose virtues are true qualities ingenerate, both in his judgment and nature) let my arm be cut off; nay, let my soul not live that day, that I shall dare to lift up my arm to touch that forbidden fruit; those flowers of his princely crown and diadem. But yet in our Eden, in this garden of the commonwealth, as there are the flowers of the sun, which are so glorious that they are to be handled only by royal maj.; so are there also some daisies and wholesome herbs, which every common hand, that lives and labours in this garden, may pick and gather up, and take comfort and repast in them. Amongst all which this oculus diei, this bona libertas of which I am now to speak, is not one only, but the chief.—Thus much, in all humbleness, I presume to speak for the occasion. I will now descend to the question: wherein I hold, (with all dutiful submission to better judgments) that these acts of power, in imprisoning and confining of his majesty's subjects, in such manner, without any declaration of the cause, are against the fundamental laws and liberties of this kingdom. And for these reasons, thus briefly drawn, I conclude. 1. From the great favour which the law doth give unto, and the great care which it hath ever taken of, the liberty and safety of the bodies and persons of the subjects of this kingdom. I shall not need to take the question in pieces, nor handle it in the parts dividedly, but as one entire body; because I hold no other difference between imprisonment and confinement than only this, that the one hath a less and straiter, the other a greater and larger prison. And this word 'Confinement' not being to be found in any one case of our law, if therefore it is become the language of state, it is too difficult for me to define.—To proceed therefore in maintenance of my first reason; I find our law doth so much favour the liberty of the subject's person, that the body of a man was not liable to be arrested or imprisoned for any other cause at the common law, but for force and things done against the peace: for the common law, being the preserver of the peace of the land, so abhorreth force, that those that commit it, she accounts her capital enemies; and therefore did subject their bodies to imprisonment. But by the statute of Marlborough, which was made 52 Hen. 3. because bailiffs would not render accounts to their lords, it was enacted,

That their bodies should be attached. And afterwards by the statute 25 Edw. 3. because men made no conscience to pay their debts, it was enacted, That their bodies should likewise be attached: but, before these statutes, no man's body was subject to be taken, or imprisoned, otherwise than as aforesaid; whereby it is evident how much the common law favoured the liberty of the subject, and protected his body from imprisonment.—I will enforce this reason further by a rule in law, and some cases in law upon that rule.—The rule is this, That 'Corporalis injuria non recipit estimationem de futuro:' so that if the question be for a wrong done to the person, the law will not compel him to sustain it, and afterwards expect a remedy; for the law holds no damages a sufficient recompence for a wrong which is corporal. The cases in law to prove this rule shall be these. If one menace me in my goods, or that he will burn the evidences of my lands, which he hath in his custody, unless I make unto him a bond: there I cannot avoid the bond by pleading of this menace. But if he restrains my person, or threatens me with battery, or with burning my house, which is a protection for my person, or with burning an instrument of manumission, which is an evidence of my enfranchisement; upon these menaces, durance, or dares, I can avoid the bond by plea. So if a trespasser drives my beast over another man's ground, and I pursue to rescue it; there I am a trespasser to him on whose ground I am: but if a man assault my person, and I, for my safety, fly over into another man's ground, there I am no trespasser to him; for 'Jure evenit, ut quod quis, ob tutelam sui corporis, fecerit, id jure fecisse existimatur.' Nay, which is more, the common law did favour the liberty not only of freemen, but even of the persons of bondmen and villains, who have no right of property, either in lands or goods, as freemen have: and therefore, by the laws, the lord could not maim his villain; nay, if the lord commanded another to beat his villain, and he did it, the villain should have his action of battery against him for it. If the lord made a lease for years to his villain; if he did plead with his villain; if he tendered his villain to be companion for him in a writ of right; any of those acts, and many others which I omit, were, in law, enfranchisements, and made these villains freemen; nay in a suit brought against one, if he, by attorney, will plead that he is a villain, the law is so careful of freedom, that it disallows this plea by attorney; but he must do it propria persona, because it binds his posterity and blood to be villains also. And thus much in the general for my first reason.—2. My next reason is drawn by an argument a minori ad majus: I frame it thus. If the king has no absolute power over our lands or goods, then, à fortiori, not over our persons, to imprison them without declaring the cause: for our persons are much more worthy than either our lands or goods, which is proved by what I have already said; and Christ himself makes it clear, where he saith 'Is not the body more worth than raiment?' where the canonists say, that raiment comprehended all outward things, which are not in the same degree with that which is corporal. And our law maketh it also plain; for if a villain purchase frank-land, this maketh it villain-land, according to the nature of his person; but it holds not, e converso, frank-land shall not free the person. Now, that the king hath no absolute power over our lands or goods, I will only at this time put a case or two; for without proof of the premisses, my conclusion would not follow. 1st. for Land: The king cannot by his letters patent, make the son off an alien heir to his father, nor to any other; for he cannot disinherit the right heir, saith the book, nor do prejudice to the lord of his escheat. The king, by his prerogative, shall pay no toll for things bought in fairs and markets; but a custom for paying toll to go over the soil and freeholds of another shall bind the king; for this toucheth the inheritance of the subject, and therefore the king shall not have so much as a way over his lands without payment; and, if not a way, then certainly not the land itself.—Next, for Goods: If a man hath a jewel in gage for 10*l.* &c. and is attainted for treason, the king shall not have this jewel, if he pays not the 10*l.* So, if cattle be distrained and the owner of them afterwards be attainted; yet the king shall not have them until the party be satisfied for that for which they were distrained. And if in these cases, where the owners of goods are such capital offenders, the king cannot have them; much less shall he have their when the owner is innocent and no offender. Nay, I may well say, that almost every leaf and page of all the volumes of our common law prove this right of property: this distinction of meum and tuum, as well between king and subject as one subject and another: and therefore my conclusion follows, That if the prerogative extend neither to land nor to goods; then, a fortiori, not to the person; which is of more worth than either lands or goods, as I said before. And yet I agree that, by the very law of nature, the service of the person of the subject is due to the sovereign; but this must be in such things which are not against the law of nature: but to have the body imprisoned, without any cause declared, and so to become in bondage, I am sure is contrary unto and against the law of nature, and therefore not to be enforced by the sovereign upon his subjects.—3. My next reason is drawn ab inutili & incommodo. For the statute, de frangentibus Prisonam, made 1. Ed. 2. is, quod nullus, qui Prisonam frerit, subeat judicium vite vel membrorum pro fractione prisonæ tantum; nisi causa, pro qua captus et imprisonatus fuerit, tale judicium requirat. Whence this conclusion is clearly gathered, That if a man be committed to prison, without declaring for what cause; and then, if either the malefactor do break the prison, or the jailer suffer him to escape, albeit the prisoner so escaping had committed crimen læsæ majestatis; yet neither the jailer, nor any other that procured his escape, can, by law, suffer any corporal punishment for setting him at large; which, if admitted, might prove, in consequence, a matter of great danger to the common-wealth.—4. My next reason is drawn à regis honore, from that great honour the law doth attribute unto sovereign majesty; and therefore the rule of law is, that solum rex hoc non potest facere, quod non potest injuste facere; and therefore if a subject hath the nomination and the king the presentation to a church, whereunto the king presents without the subject's nomination; here the quare impedit lies against the incumbent tantum, and the king is in law no disturber. And Hussey, chief justice in 1. Hen. 7. fol. 4. saith, That sir John Markham told king Edward 4 he could not arrest a man either for treason or felony, as a subject might: because that if the king did wrong, the party could not have his action against him. What is the reason that an action of false imprisonment lies against the sheriff, if he doth not return the king's writ, by which he hath taken the body of the subject, but this; because the writ doth breviter enarrare causam captionis; which, if it doth not, it shall abate and is void in law; and being returned, the party, when he appears, may know what to answer, and the court what to judge. And if the king's writ, under his great seal, cannot imprison the subject, unless it contains the cause, shall then the king's warrant otherwise do it without containing the cause; that so his judges upon return thereof, may likewise judge of the same, either to remand, bail, or deliver the party imprisoned?—I should argue the point more closely upon the statute of Magna Charta, c. 29. quod nullus liber homo impri-sonetur: the statute of Westminster 1. c. 15. for letting persons to bail; and the judgment lately given in the king's bench: but the latter of these statutes having been by that bo-^{gent} (to whom the professors of the law, both in this and all succeeding ages, are, and will be much bound) already expounded unto us; and that also fortified by those many contemporary expositions and judgments by him learnedly cited; and there being many learned lawyers here, whose time I will not waste, who were present, and some of them perhaps of counsel in the late cause adjudged in the king's bench; where you, sir,† to whose person I now speak, do well know I was absent, being then of counsel in a cause in another court; and my practice being in the country, far remote from the treasures of antiquity and records, conducing to the clearing of this point; therefore the narrowness of my understanding commends unto me sober ignorance, rather than presumptuous knowledge; and so commands me no further to trouble your patience.—But I will conclude with that which I find reported by sir John Davis, who was the king's serjeant; and so, by the duty of his place, would no doubt maintain, to the uttermost of his power, the king's prerogative royal; and yet it was by him thus said, in those Reports of his upon the case of Tanistry Customs, That the kings of England always have had a monarchy royal, and not a monarchy signoral; where, under the first, the subjects are free men, and have property in their goods, and freehold and inheritance in their lands; but, under the latter, they are as villains and slaves, and have property in nothing. And therefore, when a royal monarch makes a new conquest, yet, if he receives any of the nation's antient inhabitants into his protection; they, and their heirs after them, shall enjoy their lands and liberties according to the laws.' And there he voucheth this precedent and judgment following, given before William the Conqueror himself, viz. That one Sherborn, at the time of the Conquest, being owner of a castle and lands in Norfolk, the conqueror gave the same to one Warren, a Norman; and, Sherborn dying, the heir claiming the same by descent according to the law, it was before the conqueror himself adjudged for the heir, and that the gift thereof by the conqueror was void.—If then it was thus in the conqueror's time, and by his own sentence and judgment, and hath so continued in all the successions of our kings ever since, what doubt need we have, but that his most excellent maj. upon our humble petition prostrated at his feet (which, as was well said, is the best passage to his heart) will vouchsafe unto us our antient liberties and birthrights, with a thorough reformation of this and other our just grievances: and so I humbly crave pardon of this hon. house, that I have made a short lesson so long, by making more rests than notes.'

A Committee appointed to inquire concerning the Judgment against the Refusers of the Loan.] Upon this and other arguments made in this case of the Habeas Corpus, the house referred the whole business to a committee, to examine all the proceedings; concerning which Mr. Selden afterwards made report to the house, "That Mr. Waterhouse, a clerk in the crown-office, being examined before the committee, did confess, That, by direction from Sir Rob. Heath, the king's attorney general, he did write the draught of a Judgment in the case before mentioned; which was delivered to Mr. Attorney. And Mr. Keeling, being examined before the committee, did confess, That after Michaelmas Term last, the attorney-general wished him to make a special entry of the Habeas Corpus. To which he answered, He knew no special entry in those cases, but only a remittitur: but said to Mr. Attorney, that if he pleased to draw one, and the court should afterwards assent to it, he would then enter it. The attorney did accordingly make a draught; and the copy thereof Mr. Keeling produced to the committee. And further said, That he carried this draught to the judges; but they would not assent to a special entry: nevertheless the attorney-general divers times sent to him, and told him, There was no remedy, but he must enter it. Yet a week before the parliament met, the attorney-general called for the draught again; which accordingly he gave unto him, and never heard of it more."

Sir Rob. Philips, upon this report, gave it as his opinion, 'That this intended Judgment in the Habeas Corpus, was a draught made by some man that desired to strike us all from our liberties; though the judges justly refused it: but if the judges did intend it, we sit not here to answer the trust we are sent for, if we present not this matter to his maj. Let this business be farther searched into, and see how this judgment lies against us, and what the judges do say concerning the same.'

Sir Edw. Coke. 'This draught of the Judgment will sting us, quia nulla causa fuit ostenta; being committed by the command of the king, therefore he must not be bailed! What is this but to declare upon record, that any subject, committed by such absolute command, may be detained in prison for ever? what doth this tend to, but the utter subversion of the choice liberty and right belonging to every free-born subject of this kingdom? I fear were it not for this parliament, that followed so close after that form of Judgment was drawn up, there would have been hard putting to have had it entered: but a parliament brings judges, officers, and all men into good order.'

The commons afterwards, upon further debate of this matter, desired, That the Judges of the King's Bench might declare themselves concerning this business; which was ordered accordingly, and will appear in the sequel.

The King's Propositions for Supply.] March 25. The Propositions, which had been tendered by Mr. Sec. Cook, from his maj. were received and read, but the debate thereof was referred to the 2d of April. The Propositions were these, viz. 1. To furnish with men and victuals 30 ships, to guard the narrow-seas, and along the coasts. 2. To set out 10 other ships for the relief of the town of Rochelle. 3. To set out 10 other ships for the preservation of the Elbe, the Sound, and Baltic-Sea. 4. To levy arms, cloaths, victuals, and pay, for transporting an army of 1000 horse and 10,000 foot, for foreign service. 5. To pay and supply 6000 more, for the service of Denmark. 6. To supply the forts of the office of ordnance. 7. To supply the Stores of the Navy. 8. To build 20 ships yearly for the increase of the Navy. 9. To repair the forts within the land. 10. To pay the arrears of the office of ordnance. 11. To pay the arrears of the Victualler's Office. 12. To pay the arrear of the Treasurer of the Navy. 13. To pay the arrears due for the Freight of divers Merchant Ships employed in his majesty's service. 14. To provide a Magazine for Victuals for Land and Sea-Service."

Conference concerning enforcing the Laws against Recusants.] March 26. A conference was desired by the lords with the commons, about joining with them in a Petition to the king, for putting the laws in execution against Recusants; at which, Mr. Secretary Cook, who was appointed to manage this conference, spoke to this effect:

"We are sent to attend this conference from the knights, citizens and burgesses of the house of commons. And first we acknowledge all due honour both unto the rev. fathers of the church, and to you, noble lords; in that you have shined before us, as worthy lights in the encouragement and maintenance of God's true religion, being the true support of all your dignities and honours. And this forwardness of yours is the more remarkable, when that viperous generation, as your lordships justly stiled them, do, at ease, with tooth and nail, essay to rent the bowels of their mother. For, give me leave to tell you what I know, that these now both vaunt at home, and write to their friends abroad, that they are now in peace; that they hope all will be well, and doubt not to prevail, and win ground upon us. And a little to awake the care and zeal of our learned and grave fathers, it is fit that they take notice of that hierarchy which is already established in competition with their lordships; for they have a bishop consecrated by the pope; this bishop hath his subalternate officers of all kinds, as vicars-general, archdeacons, rural-deans, apparitors, and such like. Neither are these nominal or titular officers alone; but they all execute their jurisdictions, make their ordinary visitations through the kingdom, keep courts, and determine ecclesiastical causes; and, which is an argument of more consequence, they keep ordinary intelligence by their agents at Rome, and hold correspondence with the nuncios and cardinals both at Brussels and in France. Neither are the seculars alone grown to this height, but the regulars are more active and dangerous, and have taken deep root; they have already planted their societies and colleges of both sexes; they have settled revenues, houses, libraries, and vestments, with all necessary provisions to travel or stay at home; nay, even at this time, they intend to hold a concurrent assembly with this parliament. But now, since his sacred maj. hath extended his royal arm, and since the lords of his council have by their authority caused these nests of wasps to be dugged out of the earth, and their convocations to be scattered; and since your lordships join in courage and resolution, at least to reduce this people to their lawful restraint, that they may do no more hurt; we conceive great hope and comfort, that the Almighty God will, from henceforth, prosper our endeavours both at home and abroad. But now, my lords, to come to the chief errand of this our meeting; which is to make known to you the approbation of our house of that Petition to his maj. wherein you were pleased to desire our concurrence. The house hath taken it into serious consideration, and from the beginning to the end approves of every word, and much commends your happy pen; only we are required to present unto you a few Additions, whereby, we conceive, the Petition may be made more agreeable to the statutes which are desired to be put in execution; and to a former Petition granted by his maj. recorded in both houses, confirmed under the great seal of England, and published in all our ordinary courts of justice. But these things we propound not as our Resolutions, or as matters to raise debate or dispute, but commend them only as our advice and desire; being ready, notwithstanding, to join with your lordships in the Petition, as now it is; if your lordships shall not find this reason to be of weight."

The Petition of both Houses concerning enforcing the Laws against Recusants, with the King's Answers.] These Additions, which were but few, were approved of by the lords, and inserted in the Petition, on the 29th of March. Two days after it was presented to the king by both houses; and, at the delivery thereof, the Lord-Keeper made the following speech:

"Most gracious sovereign, The lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, out of the due care of the glory of Almighty God, and of the honour and safety of your maj. do, with all humbleness, and with one unanimous consent, present to your royal hands, the most loyal desires of all their hearts; which is set down in a most dutiful Petition, which is; to quicken the laws against the perturburs of the peace of the state: we cannot, nor do not forget your maj.'s most gracious acts and answers on the like Petition; they are visible to the world, to your maj.'s honour and comfort: we bend our knees and hearts, blessing God and your maj. therefore; yet let it not seem needless, that we repair again to your maj.: the husbandman knows, that weeds are not destroyed at one weeding: these are growing evils, they are weeds of a spreading nature: and, we, that come from all parts, do think it our duty to tell your maj. that God's vineyard is not yet cleansed. And God himself requires, that we pray to him often, even for what he means and promiseth to bestow on us. But my message comes from the pen of both houses; and, therefore, I humbly beseech your maj. to lend a gracious ear to hear me read the Petition."—After the reading thereof, his majesty made this short speech.

"My lords and gentlemen, I do very well approve the method of your proceedings in this parliament, a Jove Principium; hoping that the rest of your consultations will succeed the happier. And I like the preamble of my lord-keeper; otherwise I should have a little suspected, that you had thought me not so careful of religion as I have been, and ever shall be, wherein I am as forward as you can desire. And for the Petition, I answer first in general, That I like it well, and will use these as well as other means, for the maintenance and propagation of that religion, wherein I have lived, and do resolve to die. But for the particulars, because they consisted of many points, you shall receive a more full Answer hereafter. And now will I only add this, That as we pray to God to help us, so we must help ourselves: for we can have no assurance of his assistance, if we do lie in bed, and only pray, without using other means. And, therefore, I must remember you, that if we do not make provision speedily, we shall not be able to put one ship to sea this year. Verbum sapienti sat est."

Afterwards the lord-keeper signified unto the house, That his maj. had now given his Answer unto the Petition exhibited by both houses against Recusants: and had commanded him to read the same Answer in this house; and Mr. Secretary to read it in the commons. Whereupon the clerk read the first Article of the said Petition; and the lord-keeper read his maj.'s Answer unto the same, and to each Article thereof. The which Petition, with the Answers, follow, in hæc verba.

"Most gracious sovereign; We your maj.'s most loyal and obedient subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in parliament assembled, having to our singular comfort, obtained your maj.'s pious and gracious assent for a Public Fast, to appease the wrath of Almighty God kindled against us; and to prevent those grievous judgments which do apparently press upon us, do in all humility, present unto your sacred maj. all possible thanks for the same. And, because the public and visible sins of the kingdom are the undoubted causes of those visible evils that are fallen upon us; amongst which sins, (as is apparent by the word of God) idolatry and superstition are the most heinous and crying sins; to the end that we may constantly hope for the blessing of God, to descend upon this our public humiliation, by abandoning those sins which do make a wall of separation betwixt God and us."

Article I. "We most humbly and ardently beg, at the hands of your most sacred maj. That your maj. will be pleased to give continual life and motion to all those laws, that stand in force against Jesuits, Seminary Priests, and all that have taken orders by authority of the see of Rome, by exacting a more due and serious execution of the same: amongst which number, those, that have highly abused your majesty's clemency, by returning into the kingdom after their banishment, contrary to your highness's express proclamation, we humbly desire, may be left to the severity of your laws, without admitting of any mediation or intercession for them. And that such of your maj.'s unsound and ill-affected subjects, as do receive, harbour, or conceal any of that viperous generation, may, without delay, suffer such penalties and punishments, as the laws justly impose upon them."

His Majesty's Answer.—"To the first point, his maj. answereth, That he will, according to your desire, give both life and motion to the laws that stand in force against Jesuits, Seminary Priests, and all that have taken orders by authority of the see of Rome; and, to that end, his maj. will give strict order to all his ministers, for the discovering and apprehending of them, and so leave them, being apprehended, to the trial of the law. And, in case, after trial, there shall be cause to respite execution of any of them, yet they shall be committed, according to the example of the best times, to the castle of Wisbech, and there be safely kept from exercising their functions, or spreading their superstitious and dangerous doctrine; and the receivers and abettors shall be left to the law."

II. "That your maj. would be pleased to command a surer and straiter watch, to be kept in and over your maj.'s ports and havens; and to commit the care and charge of searching of ships, for the discovery and apprehension, as well of Jesuits and Seminary Priests brought in, as of children and young students, sent over beyond the seas, to suck in the poison of rebellion and superstition, unto men of approved fidelity and religion: and such as shall be convicted to have connived or combined at the bringing in the one, or conveying of the other out, that the laws may pass upon them with speedy execution."

Answer. "To the 2nd Article, his maj. granteth all that is desired therein; and, to this end, will give order to the lord-treasurer, lord admiral, and lord warden of the cinque ports, that, in their several places, they be careful to see this article fully executed; giving strict charge to all such as have place and authority under them, to use all diligence therein. And his maj. requireth them, and all other his officers and ministers, to have a vigilant eye upon such as dwell in dangerous places of advantage or opportunity, for receiving or transporting of any such as are here mentioned. And his maj. will take it for good service, if any will give knowledge of any such, as have connived or combined, or shall connive or combine, as is mentioned in this Article, that justice may be strictly done upon them."

III. "That considering those dreadful dangers, never to be forgotten, which did involve your maj.'s sacred person, and the whole representative body of your maj.'s kingdom, plotted and framed by the free and common access of Popish Recusants to the city of London; and to your maj.'s court; your maj. would be graciously pleased to give speedy command for the present putting in practice those laws, that prohibit all Popish Recusants to come to the court, or within ten miles of London, as, also, those laws that confine them to the distance of 5 miles from their dwelling-houses; and that such, by past licences not warranted by law, as have been granted unto them, for their repair to London, may be discharged and annulled."

Answer. "To the 3rd; his maj. will take order to restrain the resort of Recusants to the court; and, also, for the other points in this Article, his maj. is well pleased, that the laws be duly executed; and that all unlawful licences be annulled and discharged."

IV. "That whereas it is more than probably conceived, that infinite sums of money have, within these 2 or 3 years last past, been extracted out of the Recusants, within the kingdom, by colour of composition; and a small proportion of the same returned unto your maj.'s coffers, not only to the sudden enriching of private persons, but to the emboldening of Romish Recusants, to entertain massing priests into their private houses; and to exercise all their mimique rites of their gross superstition without fear or controul, amounting, as, by their daily practice and ostentation, we may conceive, to the nature of a concealed toleration; your maj. would be graciously pleased to take this particular, more nearly, into your princely wisdom and consideration; and to dissolve this mystery of iniquity, patched up of colourable leases, contracts, and pre-conveyances; being but masks, on the one part, of fraud to deceive your maj.; and stales, on the other part, for private men to accomplish their corrupt ends."

Answer. "To the 4th Article; his maj. is most willing to punish, for the time past, and prevent, for the future, any of the deceits and abuses mentioned in this article; and will account it a good service in any, that will inform himself, his privy-council, officers of his revenues, judges, or learned council, of any thing that may reveal this mystery of iniquity. And his maj. doth strictly command every of them, to whom such information shall be brought, that they suffer not the same to die, but do their uttermost endeavour to effect a clear discovery, and bring the offenders to punishment. And to the intent no concealed toleration may be effected, his maj. leaves the laws to their course."

V. "That as the persons of ambassadors from foreign princes, and their houses, be free for the exercises of their own religion, so their houses may not be made free chapels and sanctuaries unto your maj.'s subjects, popishly affected, to hear mass, and to participate in all other rites and ceremonies of that superstition, to the great offence of Almighty God, and scandal of your maj.'s people, loyally and religiously affected: That either the concourse of Recusants to such places may be restrained; or, at least, such a vigilant watch set upon them, at their return from those places, as they may be apprehended, and speedily proceeded against, ut qui palam in luce peccaverunt, in luce puniantur."

Answer. "To the 5th; his maj. is well pleased to prohibit and restrain their coming and resort to the houses of ambassadors; and will command a vigilant watch to be set, for their taking and punishing, as is desired."

VI. "That no place of authority and command, within any of the counties of this your maj.'s kingdom, or any ships of your maj.'s, or, which shall be employed in your maj.'s service, be committed to Popish Recusants, or to Non-Communicants, that have been so by the space of a year past; or to any such persons, as, according to direction of former acts of state, are justly to be suspected: as the place and authority of lords-lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, justices of the peace, or captains, or other officers or ministers mentioned in the statute, made in the 3rd year of the reign of your father of blessed memory: and that such, as by connivance, have crept into such places, may, by your maj.'s command, be discharged of the same."

Answer. "To the 6th; his maj. is persuaded, that this article is already observed with good care; nevertheless, for the avoiding, as much as may be, all errors and escapes in that kind, his maj. will give charge to the lord-keeper, that, at the next term, he call unto him all the judges, and take information from them, of the state of their several circuits; if any such, as are mentioned in this Article, be in the commission of the peace, that due reformation may be made thereof; and will likewise give order to the lord-admiral, and such others, to whom it shall appertain, to make diligent enquiry; and certify to his maj. if any such there be in place of authority and command, in his ships or service."

VII. "That all your maj.'s judges, justices, and ministers of justice, unto whose care and trust, execution, which is the life of your maj.'s laws, is committed, may, by your maj.'s proclamation, not only be commanded to put into speedy execution those laws which stand in force against Jesuits, Seminary Priests, and Popish Recusants; but that your maj. would be further pleased to command the said judges and justices of assize, to give a true and strict account of their proceedings at their returns out of their circuits unto the lord keeper; by him to be presented unto your majesty."

Answer. "To the 7th, his majesty doth fully grant it."

VIII. "And for a fair and clear eradication of all popery for the future; and for the breeding and nursing up of a holy generation and a peculiar people, sanctified unto the true worship of Almighty God; that, until a provisional law can be made, for the training and educating of the children of Popish Recusants in the grounds and principles of our holy religion, which we conceive will be of more power and force, to unite your people unto your maj.'s fastness of love, religion, and loyal obedience than all pecuniary mulcts and penalties that can possibly be devised: your maj. would be pleased to take into your own princely care and consideration, these our humble Petitions, proceeding from hearts and affections loyally and religiously devoted to God and your majesty's service, and to the safety of your maj.'s sacred person; which we most zealously present to your princely wisdom, craving your maj.'s cheerful and gracious approbation thereof."

Answer. To the 8th, his maj. doth well approve it, as a matter of necessary consideration; and the parliament now sitting, he doth commendeth to both houses the preparation

a fitting law to that effect. And his maj. doth further declare, that the mildness that hath been used towards those of the Popish religion hath been upon hope, that foreign princes thereby might be induced to use moderation towards their subjects of the reformed religion; but not finding that good effect which was expected, his maj. resolveth, unless he shall very speedily see better fruits, to add a further degree of severity than that which, in your Petition, is desired.

DEBATE ON THE SUPPLY.] April 2. The king's Propositions concerning the Supply were taken into consideration; and a debate ensued upon them in the house of commons. The members who spoke, and the arguments they made use of, were these:*

Mr. Alford said, 'That to answer punctually to every article was but to discover the king's wants, which is neither safe nor fit as the world now goes; nor is it good for him to ask more than we can give, nor for us to offer disproportionately; withal it might be drawn to a precedent for the subjects to make and maintain wars.'

Sir Robert Mansell. 'It had been much better for us to have taken care for these propositions 3 years ago. His maj.'s desire is not to have us overburthened, yet 7 of these Propositions are not to be neglected, viz. the safe guarding of the coasts, the defence of the Elbe, the defence of Rochelle, the increasing of the navy, the repairing of the forts, the discharge of the arrears of merchant ships, and the defence of the king of Denmark. The other seven may be deferred till our next meeting at Michaelmas.'

Sir F. Seymour. 'It is said, that the greatest grievance is want of Supply; but I hold it greater grievance that his maj. is brought into these necessities; especially considering the supplies that of late have been given him; 2 subsidies granted by parliament, over and above privy-seals and the late Loan, whereby the Subsidies were forcibly and unadvisedly taken; and we have yet purchased to ourselves nothing by all these, but our own dishonour; we have drawn and provoked two powerful enemies upon us. It is not then what the subjects do give, unless his maj. employ men of integrity and experience to disburse, otherwise all that we give will be cast into a bottomless sea.'

Sir Nath. Rich. 'Some propositions we shall not meddle with; as, a sovereign army to be transported: we are not fit for that yet, but we will not reject it; for great princes, who live out rumours of raising great armies, do put their enemies to great fears. Then the defence of our coasts: nothing is more necessary; but the bill of poundage is for that particular supply. And how far it may prejudice us for a future precedent, to give other supply, let us be advised.'

Sir Peter Hayman. 'Vast propositions are delivered to us in shew, which I desire the gentleman that first brought them in may give an estimate of.'

Mr. Pym. 'In no case is it fit to examine the Propositions, especially of the arrearsages of the merchant ships, and for preparation for the foreign wars.'

Mr. Secretary Cooke, observing a distinction upon the Propositions, as if some of them were to be omitted, said, 'I know you will do it upon deliberation: some there are not possible to be omitted; as, the guarding of the seas; defence of the Elbe and Rochell; and these draw on all the rest. Ships must have men and munition, and we cannot divide any of these. This house is tender of the country. The king will not lay a burden that cannot be borne. We may supply his majesty without this. Give we now what we please, the king may delay making use of it, till the people are able to pay; and by this we shall not only make his maj. subsist, but, advance his reputation in the world, by the unity of his people, more than by any treasure.'

Sir D. Diggs. 'To try and examine faithfully the Propositions. I refer it to the judgment of the house, whether it be fit to handle the business in order, or to give in gross; considering that the bill of Tonnage and Poundage is now brought into the house; which, I think, is to be given for the safe-guarding of the seas.'

Mr. Spencer. 'In no case enter into particulars. There hath formerly 5 subsidies been given for the repairing of the forts, and not one penny has been bestowed on them, but the money wasted in dishonour.'

Sir John Elliot. 'Indeed there may be some necessity for a war offensive; but, looking on our late disasters, I tremble to think of sending more abroad. Let us consider those two great undertakings at Cadiz and Rhee; at Cadiz, that was so gloriously pretended, where our men arrived and found a conquest ready, namely, the Spanish ships, a satisfaction sufficient and fit for us; and this confessed by some then employed; and, never but granted by all, that it was feasible and easy: why came this to nothing? After that opportunity lost, when the whole army was landed, with destruction of some of our men; why was nothing done? If nothing was intended, why were they landed? And, why were they ship'd again? For Rhee's voyage, was not the whole action carried against the judgment of the best commanders? Was not the army landed? Not to mention the leaving of the wines; nor touch the wonder that Cæsar never knew, the enriching of the enemy by courtesies. Consider what a case we now are in, if, on the like occasion, or with the like instruments, we shall again adventure another expedition. It was ever the wisdom of our ancestors here, to leave foreign wars wholly to the State, and not to meddle with them.'

Sir Edw. Coke. 'When poor England stood alone, and had not the access of another kingdom, and yet had more and as potent enemies as now it hath, yet the king of England prevailed. In the parliament-roll, 42. Edw. 3. the king and parliament gave God thanks for his victory against the kings of Scotland and France; he had them both in Windsor Castle as prisoners. What was the reason of that conquest? 4 reasons were given. 1. The king was assisted by good counsel. 2. There were valiant men. 3. They were timely supplied. 4. Good employment. In 3. R. 2. The king was invironed with Flemings, Scots, and French, and the king of England prevailed. In 13. Rd. 2. the king was invironed with Spaniards, Scots, and French, and the king of England prevailed. In 17. Rd. 2. Wars were in Ireland and Scotland, and yet the king of England prevailed, and thanks were given to God here; and I hope I shall live to give God thanks for our king's victories. In 7 Henry 4 one or two great men about the king so mewed him up, that he took no other advice but from them; whereupon the chancellor took this text and theme in his speech at the parliament, 'Multorum consilia requiruntur in magnis, in bello qui maxime timent sunt in maximis periculis.' Let us give, and not be afraid of our enemies; let us supply bountifully, chearfully, and speedily, but enter not into particulars. Solomon's rule is, 'Qui repetit separat,' nay separat federatos. We are united in duty, &c. to the king: the king hath fourscore thousand pounds a year for the navy, and to scour the narrow seas; it hath been taken, and we are now to give it, and shall we now give more to guard the seas? Besides, when that is taken of our gift, it may be diverted another way. It shall never be said we deny all Supply; I think myself bound, where there is commune periculum, there must be commune auxilium.'

Sir Tho. Wentworth. 'I cannot forget that duty which I owe to my country, and unless we be secured in our liberties, we cannot give. I speak not this to make diversions, but to the end, that giving, I may give chearfully. As for the Propositions to be considered of, I incline to decline them, and to look upon the state of our country, whether it be fit to give or no. Are we come to an end for our country's liberties? Have we trenched on the rates of the deputy-lieutenants? Are we secured for time future?'

Sir Henry Martin. 'We all desire remedies for our grievances, and, without them, we shall neither be willing nor able to give; for my part, I heartily desire remedy; but which is the best and wisest way, that is the question: as we have made some progress in our Grievances, so let us now go on to Supply. There is a proverb, 'Non bis ad idem.' Dash not the common wealth twice against one rock. We have grievances; we must be eased of them; who shall ease us; no nation hath a people more loving to the king than we; only let the king think it and believe it; there is a distance betwixt him and us; which, before we can have his heart, we must remove. Our disease is not so great, but that it may be cured: it is the King's Evil, which must be cured with gold. Let us imitate Jacob, who wrestled with the angel, and would not let him go: I would we could wrestle with the king in duty and love, and not let him go, in this parliament, till he comply with us. We must take heed of too much repetition, and over-beating of grievances; it is dangerous, and may make a further separation: he that talks too much of grievances, makes the party that is the cause of it make an apology, and so justify it; and that is dangerous. Let us do as poets in a tragedy, that sometimes have comical passages; and so a generous mind will sink presently. Sure a due presentation of Grievances to such a king, with moderation, will take place with him. In all deliberations go the safest way: the old way, I have heard, is first to remove Grievances; we must not tie and bind ourselves by all that was done before. I have gone over the Thames in former times, on foot, when it was all an ice; but that is no argument to persuade me to do the like now because I did so once.'

Mr. Kirton. 'He desires to know the rock, to the end we may avoid it, and not go back, but forward in our consultations.'

Sir Rob. Philips. 'His good hopes are in his majesty's royal care and wisdom. The free and great council is the best; but time and hope of change is coming towards of Rome and Spain trench deeply into our counsels. That heretofore there hath been a progress on both parts, according to the saying of the late king, 'If the parliament did, or should give more than the country could bear, they gave him a purse with a knife in it.'

Serjeant Hoskins. 'That knowing our own rights, we shall be better enabled to give. Two legs go best together, our just Grievances and our Supply, which I desire may not be separated; for, by presenting them together, they shall be both taken or both refused.'

Debate on Confinement.] The common still waving the debate of the Propositions of Supply, proceeded with the Grievances of Confinement; on which point,

Mr. Selden said, 'Confinement is differed from imprisonment, and it is against the law that any should be confined, either to his house or elsewhere. I know of nothing that is call'd a punishment, but there is some ground of it, or mention thereof, either in acts of parliament, law-books, or records; but, for the use of Confinement, I find none: indeed Jews have been confined, in former times, to certain places; as here in London, to the Old Jewry. The civilians have perpetual prisons, and excessive prisons, upon judgments in court. Carping domesticus is a Confinement for madmen.'

Sir Tho. Hobby. 'I was employed in the year 1538 in that service: It was then thought that Recusants should be confined in strong places; but it was not held legal; and when the Spanish navy was dispersed they were set at liberty, and the parliament petitioned the queen for a law to warrant the confinement."

Debate on Designation to Foreign Employment.] April 3. The commons proceeded to the debate concerning Designation to Foreign Employment, in which

Sir Peter Hayman opened his own case thus: 'I have not forgot my employment into the Palatinate. I was call'd before the lords of the council, for what I knew not; but I heard it was for not lending on a privy-seal. I told them, if they will take my estate, let them; I would give it up, lend I would not. When I was before the lords of the council, they laid to my charge my unwillingness to serve the king. I said, I had my life and my estate to serve my country and my religion. They told me, that if I did not pay, I should be put upon an employment of service. I was willing. After ten weeks waiting they told me I was to go with a lord into the Palatinate; and that I should have employment there, and means befitting. I told them I was a subject, and desired means. Some put on very eagerly, some dealt nobly. They said I must go on my own purse. I told them, Nemo militat suis expensis. Some told me I must go. I began to think, what, must I? None were ever sent out in that way. Lawyers told me I could not be so sent. Having this assurance I demanded means, and was resolved not to stir but upon those terms; and, in silence and duty, I denied. Upon this, having given me a command to go, after 12 days they told me they would not send me as a soldier, but to attend on an ambassador. I knew that stone would hit me, therefore I settled my troubled estate, and addressed myself to that service.'

Mr. Hackwell. 'This is a great point, that much concerns the common-wealth, if the king cannot command a subject to his necessary service; and on the other side, it will be little less than an honourable banishment to the subject, if he may. Our books say, The king cannot compel any to go out of the realm; and, upon an action brought against him, he cannot plead in bar, that he is by command from the king in foreign service, but the king may give him his protection. 5 Edw. 3. N. 9. in the Parliament-Roll, there was an ordinance, whereby the king had power to send some to Ireland; it was ordained by the sages of the law, that soldiers, where need shall be, though they refuse to go, and excuse themselves; if their excuses be not reasonable, the king may do to them according to right and reason. If the king, by law, could do this of himself, and send them to Ireland, (his own dominion) he would never have taken power from his parliament; and if men do not according to that law, still there is no imprisonment prescribed.'

Sir Edw. Coke. 'No restraint, be it ever so little, but is imprisonment; and foreign employment is a kind of honourable banishment. I myself was designed to go to Ireland. I was willing to go; and hoped, if I had gone, to have found some Mompessons there: there is difference when the party is the king's servant, and when not. In 46 Edw. 3. was the time when the law was in its height. Sir Rd. Pembroke was a baron and the king's servant, and warden of the cinque-ports: he was commanded to go to Ireland, and to serve as deputy there; which he refused; he was not committed, but the king was highly offended; and having offices and fees and lands, pro servitui sui impenso, the king seized his lands and offices. I went to the parliament roll, 47 Edw. 3. where I found another precedent for foreign employment; They that have offices pro consili, or servitui impenso, if they refuse, those lands and offices so given are seized; but no commitment.'

Sir Tho. Wentworth. 'If any one owes a man displeasure and shall procure him to be put into foreign employment, it will be a matter of high concernment to the subject: we know the honour and justice of the king, but we know not what his ministers or the mediation of ambassadors may do, to work their own malice and resentment upon any man.'

Sir John Elliot. 'If you grant this liberty, what are you the better for other privileges? What difference is there between imprisonment at home, and constrained employment abroad? It is no less than a temporal banishment, neither is it for his maj.'s service to constrain his subjects to employment abroad: honour and reward invite them rather to seek it; but, to be compelled, stands not with our liberty.'—These debates so engrossed the attention of the commons, that the consideration of the Supply was deferred for two days.

A Message from the King in Vindication of the D. of Bucks.] April 3. Mr. Secretary Cooke brought the house this Message from the king:

"His majesty having understood that some rumours were spread abroad of a sharp Message, yesterday delivered by me, and of some malicious words, that the duke should speak yesterday at the council-board; he commanded me to tell you of the malice of those false reports; for that nothing fell from the duke or that board, but what was for the good of this assembly; he would have you to observe the malice of those spirits that thus put in these jealousies. Had the duke so spoken, he should have contradicted himself; for all of us of the council can tell that he was the first mover and persuader of this assembly of parliament to the king. Esteem of the king according to his actions, and not these talks: His majesty takes notice of our purpose that on Friday we will resolve upon Supply, which his majesty graciously accepts of; and that our free gift, without any condition, should testify to the world, that we will be as far from incroaching upon his prerogative, as he will be to incroach upon our liberties: and this shall well appear when we present our Grievances to him; and then we shall know that he hath no intention to violate our liberties; only let us not present them with any asperity of words. He counts it his greatest glory to be a king of freemen, not of villains. He thought to have delivered this Message himself, but that he feared it would take us too much time."

Then Mr. Secretary said he would add a word or two of his own: "Yesterday after dinner we attended his maj. and he asked us what we had done. We said, we had entered into the consideration of Supply, and that the final resolution was deferred till Friday, and that this was done for just reasons, to join the business of his maj. and our country together; that this would further his maj. and give content to the country; and that this union here might be spread abroad in the world. His maj. answered, 'For God's sake, why should any hinder them of their liberties? If they did, I should think they dealt not faithfully with me.' You may thus see a true character of his maj.'s disposition; let us proceed with courage, and rest assured his maj. will give great ear unto us, and let us all join to make a perfect union to win the king's heart: we shall find a gracious Answer from the king, and a hearty co-operation from those that you think to be averse to us.—Upon the delivery of this Message some stood up, and professed they never heard of any such sharp messages, or words the day before: or that any was so bold as to interpose himself. They acknowledged his maj. had put a threefold obligation on them: 1. In giving them satisfaction. 2. In giving them assurance (which is a great law) that he will protect and relieve them. 3. In giving them advice, as may best fit the gravity of that assembly and his own honour. So they concluded to carry themselves as their progenitors before had done; who never were marked for stepping too far on the king's prerogative; and they returned their humble thanks to his majesty."

Resolutions of the Commons relating to the Liberty of the Subject.] This day, Mr. Littleton, one of the committee for taking into consideration the Liberty of the Subject in person and estate, which was set on foot by reason of the late commitments, made a report that they proceeded, in that business, with such gravity and leisure, as would add much to their honour in the following Resolutions. "I. Resolved, That no Freeman ought to be committed, or detained in Prison, or otherwise restrained, by command of the king or the privy-council, or any other; unless some cause of the commitment, detainer, or restraint be expressed, for which, by law, he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained. II. That the Writ of Habeas Corpus cannot be denied, but ought to be granted to every man, that is committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, by the command of the king, the privy-council, or any other; he praying the same. III. That if a freeman be committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, by command of the king, privy-council, or any other; no cause of such commitment, &c. being expressed; and the same be returned upon an Habeas Corpus, granted for the said party; that then he ought to be delivered or bailed. IV. That the ancient and undoubted Right of every Freeman, is, That he hath a full and absolute property in his goods and estate; and that no tax, tallage, loan, benevolence, or other like charge, ought to be commanded, or levied by the king or his ministers, without common assent of parliament."—All these Resolutions of the committee were unanimously agreed to by the whole house.

Report of the Conference with the Lords on the Liberty of the Subject.] Rushworth has given us the substance of the speeches made by a committee, appointed to manage a Conference with the lords to induce them to join in a Petition to the King, for ascertaining the Rights and Liberties of the Subject; which was afterwards called the 'Petition of Right.' The same is in the Lords Journals; entered there as a Report made by the lord-president and three other lords, to that house, of what passed at this Conference, which his lordship introduced in this manner:

"My Lords, The conference which was lately held with the lower-house, was about the Liberty of the Subject; and to set this forth they employed four speakers. The 1st was sir Dudley Diggs, a man of volubility and elegance of speech; and his part was but the introduction. The 2nd was Mr. Littleton, a grave and learned lawyer; whose part was to represent the Resolutions of the house, and the Grounds whereupon they went. The 3rd was Mr. Selden, a great antiquary and a pregnant man; his part was to shew the Law and Precedents in the points. The 4th was sir Edw. Coke, that famous reporter of the law, whose part was to shew the Reasons for all that the others had said; and that it all was but in affirmation of the common-law."—Now, to report the first man, sir Dudley; how his words will come off from my tongue, I cannot tell; I shall acquaint you with the matter of them as well as I can. The knight hoped to begin the conference, auspiciously, with an observation out of Holy Writ. In the days of good king Josiah, when the land was purged of idolatry, and the great men went about to repair the house of God; whilst money was sought for, there was found a Book of the Law, which had been neglected. He was confident, that we would, as cheerfully, join with them, in acknowledging God's Blessings in our good king Josiah, as they did. He thankfully remembered your lordship's truly honourable invitation of them to the late Petition, for cleansing the land from Popish abominations: and, as then, so now, while they were seeking for money, they found, he could not say a book of our law, but main and fundamental points of the law neglected and broken; and this occasioned their desire of a conference. Wherein, he was commanded to shew, That the laws of England are grounded on reason, more ancient than books, consisting much in unwritten customs, yet so full of justice and true equity, that your most honourable predecessors and ancestors often defended them with a nolumus mutari; and so ancient, that, from the Saxon days, notwithstanding the injuries and ruins of time, they have continued in most part the same; as may appear in old remaining monuments of the laws of Ethelbert, the first Christian king of Kent; Ina the king of the West-Saxons; Offa of the Mercians, and of Alfred the great monarch, who united the Saxon Heptarchy, whose laws are, as he says to that end, 'Utpote qui sub uno rege, sub una lege regerentur.' And, though the Book of Litchfield, speaking of the troublesome times of the Danes, says then, 'Jus sopitum erat in regno, leges & consuetudines sopite sunt; and, prava voluntas, vis & violentia magis regnabant quam judicium vel justitia.' Yet, by the blessing of God, the good king Edward, commonly called the Confessor, did awaken those laws; and, as the old words are, 'excitatas reparavit, reparatas decoravit, decoratas confirmavit;' which confirmavit shews, that good king Edward received those laws, and did not give them; which William the Conqueror, and all his successors, since that time, have sworn unto. As we have now, so even in those Saxon times they had their court-barons, and court-lets, and sheriffs-courts; by which, as Tacitus says of the Germans, their ancestors, 'Jura reddebant per pagos & vicos; and I do believe, as we have now, they had their parliaments; where new laws were made, cum consensu prelatorum, magnatum, & totius communis; or as another writes, 'cum consilio prelatorum, nobilium & sapientium laicorum.' I will add nothing but of Glanville, that wrote in the time of Hen. 2. or Beaton in the days of Hen. 3. only præ me leave to cite that of Fortescue, the learned chancellor to Hen. 6. who writing of this kingdom, says, 'Regnum istud moribus nationum & regum temporibus, eisdem, quibus hanc regitur, legibus & consuetudinibus, regitur.' But, my good lords, as the poet snid of Fame, I may say of our common law; 'Injudiciumque solo, et caput inter nubila condit.' Wherefore, the cloudy part being mine, I will make haste to open way for your lordships, to hear more certain arguments. Be pleased then to know, that it is an undoubted and fundamental point of this so antient common law of England, That the subject hath a true property in his goods and possessions, which doth preserve as sacred, that meum & tuum, that is the nurse of industry and mother of courage; and without which, there can be no justice, of which, meum & tuum is the proper object. But the undoubted birthright of free subjects hath, lately, not a little been invaded and prejudiced; by pressures; the more grievous, because they have been pursued by imprisonment, contrary to the franchises of this land: and when, according to the laws and statutes of this realm, redress hath been sought for in a legal way; by demanding Habeas Corpus from the judges, and a discharge by trial according to the law of the land, success hath failed: this now onforceth the commons, to examine, by acts of parliament, precedents and reasons, the truth of the English Subject's Liberty; which I shall leave to a learned gentleman to argue."

The rest of this Report, being very long in the Lords Journals, because of the many law-cases, records, &c. cited, we shall give it as we find it, somewhat abridged in Rushworth.

Mr. Littleton. "Your lordships have heard that the commons have taken into consideration the matter of personal Liberty; and, after long debate, they have, upon a full search, and clear understanding of all things pertinent to the question, unaniously declared, That no freeman ought to be committed, or restrained in prison by command of the king or privy-council, or any other, unless some cause of the commitment, detainer, or restraint be expressed, for which by law he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained: and they have sent me, with others of their members, to represent unto your lordships the true grounds of their resolution; and have charged me particularly, leaving the reasons of law and precedents for others, to give your lordships satisfaction, that this Liberty is established and confirmed by the whole state, the king, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, by several acts of parliament; the authority whereof is so great, that it can receive no answer, save by interpretation or repeal by future statutes. And these I shall mind you of, are so direct in the point, that they can bear no other exposition at all; and sure I am, they are still in force: the first of them is the Grand Charter of the Liberties of England, first granted Anno 16 John, and renewed in 9th Hen. 3. and since confirmed in parliament above 30 times; the words there are, chap. 29. 'Nullus liber homo capiatur, vel imprisonetur, aut disseisietur de libero tenemento suo, vel liberis consuetudinibus suis; aut utlagatur, aut exuletur, aut aliquo modo destruitur; nec super eum ibimus, nec eum mittemus, nisi per legale judicium parium suorum, vel per legem terræ.'—He then proceeded to open, and argued learnedly upon, the several particulars in the last recited clause of Magna Charta; and further shewed, "That no invasion was made upon this personal liberty, till the time of Edw. 3. which was soon resented by the subject; for, in 5. Edw. 3. ch. 9. it is enacted, That no man from henceforth shall be attached on any occasion, nor fore-judged of life or limb, nor his lands, tenements, goods, nor chatties, seized into the king's hands, against the form of the Great Charter, and the law of the land. And in 25 Edw. 3. ch. 4. it is more full, and expounds the words of the Grand Charter; which is thus; Whereas it is contained in the Grand Charter of the Franchises of England, that none shall be imprisoned, nor put out of his freehold, nor free-custom, unless it be by the law of the land; it is awarded, assented, and established, That from henceforth none shall be taken, by petition or suggestion made to our lord the king, or to his council, unless it be by indictment or presentment of his good and lawful people of the same neighbourhood; which such deed shall be done in due manner, or by process made by writ original at the common law; nor that none be ousted of his franchises, office, nor freehold, unless he be duly brought to answer, and be forejudged of the same, by the course of the law; and that if any thing be done against the same, it shall be redressed and holden for none. And 28 Edw. 3. ch. 3. it is more direct; this liberty being followed with fresh suit by the subject; where the words are not many, but very full and significant; 'That no man, of what state and condition he be, shall be put out of his lands or tenements, nor taken, nor imprisoned, nor dismembered, nor put to death, without he be brought to answer by due process of the law.' Several other statutes were cited by him, in confirmation of this point of the Liberty of the Subject."

The king's council afterward made objections to the said argument; yet acknowledged, "That the 7 statutes, urged by the commons, are in force; yet said, That some of them are in general words, and therefore conclude nothing, but are to be expounded by precedents; and some of them are applied to the suggestion of subjects, and not to the king's command simply of itself; and that 'per legem terræ,' in Magna Charta, cannot be understood for process of law and original writ; for that in criminal proceedings, no original writ is usual at all; but every constable, either for felony or breach of the peace, or to prevent the breach of the peace, may commit without process or original writ; and it were very hard the king should not have the power of a constable. They also argued, That the king was not bound to express the cause of imprisonment; because there may be in it matter of state, not fit to be revealed for a time; lest the confederates thereupon make means to escape the hands of justice. Besides, that which the commons do say, That the party ought to be delivered or bailed, is a contradiction in itself; for bailing doth signify a kind of imprisonment still; delivery is a total freeing: and besides, bailing is a grace or favour of a court of justice, and they may refuse it."

To this it was replied, "That the statutes were direct in point; and though some of them speak of suggestions of the subjects, yet they are, in equal reason, a commitment by command of the king, as when the king taketh notice of a thing himself. And for the words, per legem terræ, original writs only are not intended, but all other legal process, which comprehendeth the whole proceedings of the law upon cause other than trial by jury; and the course of the law is rendered by due process of the law; and no man ought to be imprisoned by special command without indictment, or other due process to be made by the law. And, whereas, it is said, there might be danger in revealing the cause; that may be avoided, by declaring a general cause; as for treason, suspicion of treason, misprision of treason, felony, without expressing the particulars; which can give no greater light to a confederate, than will be conceived upon the very apprehension or upon the imprisonment, if nothing at all was expressed. And as for bailing the party committed, it hath ever been the discretion of the judges to give such respect to a commitment, by command of the king or privy-council, which are ever supposed to be done in just and weighty cases; that they will not suddenly set them free, but bail them to answer what shall be objected against them, on the king's behalf; but if any other inferior officer do commit a man without shewing cause, they do instantly deliver him, as having no reason to expect their leisure; so that delivery is applied when the imprisonment is by command of some mean minister of justice; and bailing, when by command of the king or his council: and though bailing is a grace and favour of the court in case of felony and other crimes; for that there is another way to discharge them, in a convenient time, by their trial: yet where no cause of imprisonment is returned, but the command of the king, there is no way to deliver such persons, by trial otherwise, but that of the Habeas Corpus; and if they should be then remanded, they might be perpetually imprisoned without any remedy at all: and, consequently, a man that had committed no offence, might be in a worse case than a greater offender; for the latter should have an ordinary trial to discharge himself, the other should never be delivered."

Mr. Selden. "Your lordships have heard from the gentleman that spoke last, a great part of the grounds upon which the commons, upon mature deliberation, proceeded to their clear Resolution, touching the Right of the Liberty of their Persons: the many acts of parl. which are the written laws of the land, and are expressly to the point, have been read and opened; and such objections as have been, by some, made unto them, and objections also made out of other acts of parl. have been cleared and answered. It may seem now perhaps, that little remains needful to be further added, for the enforcement and maintenance of so fundamental and established a right and liberty belonging to every freeman of the kingdom. The commons taking into consideration that in this question (being of so high a nature, that never any exceeded it in any court of justice whatsoever) all the several ways of just examination of the truth should be used; have also most carefully informed themselves of all former judgments or precedents concerning this great point either way, and have been no less careful of the due preservation of his majesty's prerogative, than of their own rights. The precedents here are of two kinds; either merely matter of record, or else the formal resolutions of the judges, after solemn debate in the point.—This point that concerns Precedents, the commons have commanded me to present to your lordships; which I shall, as briefly as I may, so I do it faithfully and perspicuously: to that end, my lords, before I come to the particulars of any of those precedents, I shall first remember to you, that which will seem as a general key for the opening and true apprehension of all those on record; without which key no man, unless he be versed in the entries and course of the king's bench, can possibly understand. In all cases, my lords, where any right in liberty belongs to the subject by any positive law, written or unwritten; if there were not also a remedy by law for enjoying or regaining of this right or liberty, when it is violated or taken from him, the positive law were most vain, and to no purpose; and it were to no purpose for any man to have any right in any land or other inheritance, if there were not a known remedy; that is, an action or writ, by which, in some court of ordinary justice, he might recover it. And in this case of right of Liberty of Person, if there were not a remedy in the law for regaining it when it is restrained, it were to no purpose to speak of laws that ordain it should not be restrained. The writ of Habeas Corpus, or Corpus cum Causa, is the highest remedy in law for any man that is imprisoned; and the only remedy for him that is imprisoned by the special command of the king, or the lords of the council, without shewing the cause of commitment; and if any man be so imprisoned by any such command, or otherwise whatsoever through England, and desire, by himself, or any other in his behalf, this writ of Habeas Corpus for the purpose in the court of king's bench, that writ is to be granted to him, and ought not to be denied; and is directed to the keeper of the prison, in whose custody the prisoner remains, commanding him, That after a certain day he bring in the body of the prisoner, cum causa detentionis, and sometimes cum causa satisfactionis; and he, with his return, filed to the writ, bringeth the prisoner to the bar at the time appointed, and the court judgeth of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the return; and if they find him bailable, committitur marescallo, the proper officer belonging to the court, and then afterwards traditur in ballium. But if upon the return of the Habeas Corpus it appear to the court, that the prisoner ought not to be bailed, nor discharged from the prison whence he is brought, then he is remanded and sent back again, to continue till by due course of law he may be delivered; and the entry of this is, 'Remittitur quousque secundum legem deliberatus fuerit; or, remittitur quousque,' &c. which is all one, and the highest award of judgment that ever was or can be given upon a Habeas Corpus.—Your lordships have heard the Resolution of the commons, touching the enlargement of a man committed by command of the king or privy council, or any other, without cause shewed of such commitment; which Resolution, as it is grounded upon acts of parliament already shewn, (the reason of the law of the land being committed to the charge of another to open unto you) so it is strengthened by many precedents of records." He then produced 12 precedents, full and directly in the point, to prove that persons so committed, ought to be delivered upon bail; which were distinctly opened and read to their lordships. Then he also offered to their consideration other kind of precedents, which were solemn resolutions of judges, things not of record but yet remaining in authentic copies; which precedents and authorities we omit for the length thereof.—He then proceeded and said, "The commons (desiring with all care to inform themselves fully of the truth of the Resolution of the judges in the 34th year of the late queen, cited in the case of Sir J. Heveningham, by the king's counsel, as arguments against his not being bailed) have got into their hands a book of select cases, collected by the rev. and learned judge, chief justice Anderson, all written with his own hand; which he caused to be read. These precedents, saith he, do fully resolve for the maintenance of the ancient and fundamental point of Liberty of the Person, to be regained by Habeas Corpus when any one is imprisoned."—Then he concluded, "That having thus gone through the charge committed to him by the commons, he should now, as he had leave and direction given him, lest their lordships should be put to much trouble and expence of time, in finding and getting copies at large of those things which he had cited, offer also to their lordships authentic copies of them all; and so left them, and whatsoever else he had said, to their lordships further consideration."

Sir Edward Coke. "Your lordships have heard 7 acts of parliament in point, and 31 precedents summarily collected, and with great understanding delivered; which I have perused, and understand them all thoroughly: 13 of the precedents are in terminis terminantibus, a whole jury of precedents, and all in the point. I am transported with joy, because of the hope of good success in this weighty business, your lordships being so full of justice, and the very theme and subject both promise success; which was corpus cum causa, the freedom of an Englishman, not to be imprisoned without cause shewn; which is my part to shew, and the reason and the cause why it should be so; wherein I will not be prolix; for to gild gold were idle and superfluous."—After that he had cleared some doubts made of the Statute of Westminster, which saith, 'That the sheriff, and others, in some cases, may not replevin men in prison,' he proceeded further and said, "That all those arguments offered unto you in this last conference, are of a double nature. 1. Acts of parliament. 2. Judicial precedents. For the first I hold it a proper argument for your lordships; because you, my lords temporal, and you, my lords spiritual, gave your assent unto those acts of parl.; and therefore, if these cannot persuade you, nothing can. For the 2nd, which are judicial precedents, it is Argumentum ab autoritate, and Argumentum ab autoritate, valet affirmativè; that is, I conceive (through it) to be no good argument to say negatively the present judges gave no opinion in this point. 3. It is good law, which I fortify with a strong axiom, Neminem oportet sapientiorum esse legibus. Now these two arguments being so well pressed to your lordships by my colleagues, I think you may wonder what my part may be: it is short but sweet; it is the Reason of all those Laws and Precedents; and reason must needs be welcome to all men: for all men are not capable of understanding the law, but every man is capable of reason. And these reasons I offer to your lordships, in affirmation of the antient laws and precedents made for the Liberty of the Subject, against Imprisonment, without cause expressed. 1. A re ipsa. 2. A minori ad majus. 3. From the remedies provided. 4. From the extent and universality of the same. 5. From the indefiniteness of the time. 6. A fine.—The first general reason is, A re ipsa, even from the nature of imprisonment, ex visceribus causæ; for I will speak nothing but ad idem, be it close or other imprisonment; and this argument is threefold; because an imprisoned man upon will and pleasure, is. 1. A bond-man. 2. Worse than a bond-man. 3. Not so much as a man; for mortuus homo non est homo; a prisoner is a dead man. 1. No man can be imprisoned upon the will and pleasure of any, but he that is a bond-man and villain; for that imprisonment and bondage are propria quarto modo to villains: now propria quarto modo, and the Species, are convertible; whosoever is a bond man may be imprisoned, upon will and pleasure; and whosoever may be imprisoned, upon will and pleasure, is a bond-man. 2. If Freeman of England might be imprisoned at the will and pleasure of the king, or his commandment, then were they in worse case than bond-men or villains; for the lord of a villain cannot command another to imprison his villain without cause, as of disobedience, or refusing to serve, as it is agreed in the Year-Books.—And here he said, 'That no man should reprehend anything he said out of the books or records. He said, he would prove a freeman, imprisonable upon command or pleasure without cause expressed, to be absolutely in a worse case than a villain; and if he did not make this plain, he desired their lordships not to believe him in any thing else; and then produced two Book-Cases, 7 Edw. 3.; A prior had commanded one to imprison his villain; the judges were ready to bail him, till the prior gave his reason, that he refused to be bailiff of his manor, and that satisfied the judges. Second Case, 88 Edw. 3. Title Trespass 253. in Faux Imprisonment: it was of an abbot, 'who commanded one to take and detain his villain; but the cause being demanded, he gives it, because he refused, being thereunto required, to drive his cattle. Rego; Freeman imprisoned, without cause shewn, are in worse case than villains, that must have a cause shewn them why they are imprisoned. 3. A Freeman imprisoned, without cause, is so far from being a bond-man, that he is not so much as a man; but is indeed a dead man, and so no man. Imprisonment is in law a civil death; perdit domum, familiam, vicinas, patriam, and is to live amongst wretched and wicked men, malefactors, and the like. And that death and imprisonment was the same, he proved by an argument ab effectis, because they both produce the like immediate effects: he quoted a book for this; 'If a man be threatened to be killed, he may avoid feoffment of lands, gifts of goods, &c. So it is if he be threatened to be imprisoned: the one is an actual, the other is a civil death. And this is the first general argument, drawn a re ipsa, from the nature of imprisonment, to which res ipsa consilium dedit.'—The second general Reason he took from his books; 'For, he said, he had no law, but what, by great pains and industry, he learned at his book; for, at ten years of age, he had no more law than other men of like age. And this second reason is, A minori ad majus: he takes it from Bracton, 'Minima poena corporalis est major quolibet pecuniaria.' But the king himself cannot impose a fine upon any man, but it must be done judicially by his judges, per justitarios in curia, non per regem in camera, and so it hath been resolved by all the judges of England. He quoted 8 Ed. 2. The third general Reason is taken from the number and diversity of remedies, which the laws give against imprisonment, viz. Brève de Homme replegiando; de Odio & Atia; de Habeas Corpus; an appeal of imprisonment. Brève de Manucapione. The two latter of these are antiquated; but the writ de odio & atia is revived, for that was given by the statute of Magna Charta, cap. 29. and by statute of 48 Edw. 3. it is declared, That all statutes made against Magna Charta, are void. Now the law would never have given so many remedies, if the freemen of England might have been imprisoned at will and pleasure.—The fourth general Reason is from the extent and universality of the pretended power to imprison; for it would extend not only to the commons of this realm, and their posterities; but to the nobles of the land, and their progenies: to the bishops and clergy of the realm and their successors. And he gave a cause why the commons came to their lordships 'Commune periculum commune requirit auxilium.' Nay, it reacheth to all persons, of what condition or sex, or age, soever; to all judges and officers, whose attendance is necessary, &c. without exception; and therefore imprisonment of such extent, without reason is against reason.—The 5th general Reason is drawn from the indefiniteness of the time; the pretended power being limited to so time; it may be perpetual during life: and this is ver-

hard. To cast a man into prison, nay, to close prison, and no time allotted for his coming forth, is a hard case, as any man would think that had been so used. And here he held it an unreasonable thing, that a man had a remedy for his horse or cattle, if detained, and none for his body thus indefinitely imprisoned; for a prison, without a prefixed time, is a kind of hell.—The 6th and last argument is, ‘A Fine;’ and ‘sapiens incipit a fine;’ and he wished he had begun there also. This argument he made threefold. ‘Ab honesto. This being less honourable. Ab utili. This being less profitable. A tuto. This imprisonment, by will and pleasure, being very dangerous for the king and kingdom.’ 1. Ab honesto. It would be to honour to a king or kingdom, to be a king of bondmen or slaves; the end of this would be both dedecus & damnum, both to king and kingdom, that in former times hath been so renowned. 2. Ab utili. It would be against the profit of the king and kingdom, for the execution of those laws before remembered, Magna Charta. 5 Edw. 3. 28 Edw. 3. 42 Edw. 3. whereby the king was inhibited to imprison upon pleasure. You see, quoth he, that this was non verus quereles, an old question; and now sought in again, after seven acts of parliament; nay, the execution of all these laws are adjudged in parliament to be for the common sort of the king and people; and he quoted the Roll, ‘This pretended power being against the profit of the king, can be no part of his prerogative.’—He was pleased to call this a laudable reason, and to say, ‘That the wit of man could not answer it; that great men kept the Roll from being printed, but that it was prevalent in force to the printed Rolls. 3. A tuto. It is extremely dangerous to the king in two respects; 1. of loss; 2. of destroying the endeavours of men. First, if he be committed without an expression of the cause, though he escape, albeit in truth it were for treason or felony, yet this escape is neither felony nor treason; but if the cause be expressed for suspicion of treason or felony, then the escape, though it be innocent, is treason or felony. He then wrote in print like a reason of the law, ut si remittitur at the rising of the court, the prisoner traditur in ballium, quod breve pignus non facit sufficientem causam; i. e. the king’s command. He quoted another famous case, in commons in parliament, incensed against the duke of Bedford, desire he should be committed: the lords and all the judges, whereof were great worthies, Prescott and Fortescue, were two, delivered a flat opinion, That he might not to be committed without an especial writ. He questioned also the name and etymology of the writ in question, corpus cum causa; ergo, The cause must be brought before a judge, else how can he take notice thereof? Nay, he pressed a place in the gospel, Acts 16. 19. where Festus conceives it an absurd and unreasonable thing, to send a prisoner to a Roman emperor, and not to write along with him the cause alleged against him: send, therefore no man a prisoner, without his causes along with him, hoc fac & vitres. And that was the first reason, a tuto, that it was not safe for the king, in regard of loss, to commit men without a cause.—The 2nd reason is, That such commitments will destroy the endeavours of all men. Who will endeavour to employ himself in any profession, either of war, merchandise, or of any liberal knowledge, if he be but tenant at will of his liberty? for no tenant at will will support or improve any thing, because he hath no certain estate; ergo, to make men tenants at will of their liberties, destroys all industry, and endeavours whatsoever. And so much for these six principal Reasons,

Taken	{	A re ipsa.	Loss of	{	Honour. Profit. Security. Industry.
		A minori ad majus.
		A remedii.
		From the Extent and Universality.
		From the Indefiniteness of the Time.
		A fine.

These were his reasons.—Here he made another protestation, ‘That if remedy had been given in this case, they would not have meddled therewith by no means; but now that remedy being not obtained in the king’s bench, without looking back upon any thing that hath been done or omitted, they desire some provision for the future only. And here he took occasion to add 4 Book-Cases and authorities, all in the point, saying, That if the learned counsel on the other side, could produce but one against the liberties, so pat and pertinent, Oh! how they would hug and call it. 16 Hen. 6. Tit. Monstrance de Fait, 182. by the whole court, the king in his presence cannot command a man to be arrested, but an action of false imprisonment lieth against him that arresteth: if not the king in his royal presence, then none others can do it: Non sic itur ad astra. 20 Hen. 6. 4. Hussey reports the opinion of Markham, chief-justice to Edw. 4. that he could not imprison by word of mouth; and the reason, because the party hath no remedy; for the law leaves every man a remedy of causeless imprisonment: he added, that Markham was a worthy judge, though he fell into adversities at last by the lord Rivers’s means, Fortescue, chap. 18. Proprio ore nullus regum usus est to imprison any man, &c. 4. Bliz. a blessed queen, renowned for justice and religion. Pl. 235. The common law hath so admeasured the king’s prerogative, as he cannot prejudice any man in his inheritance; and the greatest inheritance a man hath, is the Liberty of his Person, for all others are accessory to it; for this he quoteth the Orator, ‘Major hereditas, venit unicuique nostrum, a jure & legibus quam a parentibus. And these are the 4 authorities he cited in this point; now he propounded and answered two objections; 1st. in point of state; 2ndly in the course held by the commons. I. Obj. ‘May not the privy-council commit, without cause shewed, in a matter of state, where secrecy is required? would not this be an hindrance to his maj.'s service? Ans.—It can be no prejudice to the king as to matter of state, for the cause must be of higher or lower nature. If it be for suspicion of treason, misprision of treason, or felony, it may be by general words couched; if it be for any other thing of smaller nature, as contempt, and the like, the particular cause must be shewed; and no individuum vagum, or uncertain cause to be admitted. 2. Obj. 'If the law be so clear as you make it, why needs this declaration and remonstrance in parliament?' Ans. The subject hath in this case sued for remedy in the king's bench, by Habeas Corpus, and found none; therefore it is necessary to be cleared in parliament."—Here sir Edward Coke ended his discourse: and then he made a Recapitulation of all that had been offered unto their lordships, That generally their lordships had been advised by the most faithful counsellors that can be, viz. dead men; these can't be daunted by fear nor muzzled by affection, reward, or hope, of preferment; and therefore your lordships might safely believe them; particularly, their lordships had 3 several kinds of proofs. 1. Acts of Parliaments, judicial precedents, good reasons. 1. You have had many antient acts of parliament in the point, besides Magna Charta; that is, 7 acts of parl. which indeed are 37, Magna Charta being confirmed 30 times; for so often have the kings of England given their royal assents thereunto. 2. Judicial precedents of grave and reverend judges, in terminis terminantibus, that long since departed the world, and they were many in number. Precedents being 12, and the judges 4 of a bench, made 4 times 12 and that is 48 judges. 3. You have, as he termed them, vividæ rationes, manifest and apparent reasons. Towards the conclusion, he declared, That they of the commons have, upon great study and serious consideration, made a great manifestation unanimously, nullo contradicente, concerning this great Liberty of the Subject; and have vindicated and recovered the body of this fundamental liberty, both of their lordships and themselves, from shadows; which some times of the day, are long, sometimes short, and sometimes long again; and therefore we must not be guided by shadows: and they have transmitted to their lordships not capita rerum, heads or briefs; for these compendia are dispensia; but the Records at large, in terminis terminantibus. And so he concluded "That their lordships are involved in the same danger, and therefore, ex congruo & condigno, they desired a conference; to the end their lordships might make the like Declaration as they had done, 'commune periculum commune requirit auxilium;' and thereupon take such further course, as may secure their lordships and them, and all their posterity, in enjoying of their antient, undoubted, and fundamental liberties."

•April 9. After the foregoing Report was made, the lords took into consideration the business sent up by the commons, touching their antient Liberties; and after some debate, it was agreed to hear the king's learned counsel, the morrow, what they could say on the king's behalf, relating to the claim of the commons against him. The arguments made use of by the attorney general, assisted by others of the king's counsel, which we find, by the Journals, lasted two days, are not entered there; nor are they mentioned by Rushworth. What we find in the former authorities, is, That when Mr. Attorney had done, the judges of the king's bench, and the rest of the judges in town were ordered to be sent for to take their opinions in this great affair: and particularly to declare what the judgment was in the king's bench, which the commons complained of. But we shall leave this affair for the present time to return to that house.

Debate on the King's Message to hasten the Supply. April 4. The Supply was again taken into consideration. It was introduced by a Message from the king, delivered by secretary Cooke, to this effect: "His maj. hath again commanded me to put you in mind, how the eye and interest of the Christian world are cast upon the good or ill success of this assembly. He also graciously taketh notice of that which is in agitation amongst us, touching the freedom of our Persons, and Property of our Goods: and that this particular care (which he no way misliketh) may not retard our resolution for the general good, he willeth us cheerfully to proceed in both, and to express readiness to supply his great occasions; upon assurance that we shall enjoy all our rights and liberties, with as much freedom and security in his time, as in any age heretofore, under the best of our kings: and whether we shall think fit to secure ourselves herein, by way of bill or otherwise, so as it be provided for with respect of his honour and the public good (whereof he doubteth not but that we will be careful) he promiseth, and assureth you, that he will give way unto it; and the more confidence you shall shew in his grace and goodness, the more you shall prevail to obtain your desires,"—Hereupon,

Sir Benj. Rudyard spoke as follows: "The dangers and necessities of our present state, Mr. Speaker, are so obvious to every man's eye and understanding; and therefore so well known, as to make a large and particular rehearsal of them would rather astonish our judgments, than refresh our memory: wherefore, in short and in gross, I will only reflect the desperate condition of the king's uncle, the king of Denmark; engaged from hence, (and to the hazard of his own kingdom) in the recovery of that royal and gallant lady his majesty's sister, for the recovery of her and her children's patrimony, with the preservation and establishment of our religion in those countries; that the king is bound in nature, in policy, and in religion, to relieve and assist both the persons and the cause to the utmost of his power. Believe it, the hinge of most of the businesses moved in Christendom turn on the affairs of Germany: for if that great body were once united under one head, it would crush all the rest with the weight of it. Next, let us look a little over into France: there shall we find the poor men of our religion, exposed to the fury of an enraged king; with a juster pretence against them than hath been at any time heretofore: besides, which is worse, the kings of Spain and France are united against them and us, and made better friends than ever they meant to have been: so that, not to succour and support the professors of our religion, will be not only be infidelity and cruelty, but imprudence and folly; for their ill is ours. If Rochelle should be lost, which is now in losing, and his maj. not able to set out one ship to help it; if it should be lost, it would hazard the total extirpation of the religion; besides, it would be an extraordinary advantage to the king of France for shipping, and as great a disadvantage to us in respect of his neighbourhood: and if the Sound should be lost too, how should we escape from being swallowed up by a Spanish invasion? This island will be more like a prison than a kingdom, for we should not then be able to walk abroad. These are dangers too many, yet have I willingly abridged them; for I had rather come to the remedy, and so should we all: this consists only in money, plentifully and speedily brought in, wisely and judiciously laid out. I doubt not but we are all resolved to give: wherefore let us prepare ourselves to give plentifully, to satisfy the public occasions, and to leave his maj. out of necessity; for necessity is the worst counsellor, and I shall be very sorry that we, of all others, should be guilty of placing such ill counsel about the king: and now to think of sparing, when all lies at the stake, were the most undolike kind of frugality. Let us give speedily; delay is the greatest danger of all dangers: we will not only lose that which we give, but we shall also which we would give. And this I repeat, not as the king's business, but our own, wherein every man in this house hath a particular interest; if his fortune, his life, his religion, be any thing unto him. Neither seek I this to divert the great business in hand, but to hasten it, for I love as well Mr. Speaker, to tread upon English ground, as any man here doth.

Mr. Pym. 'In business of weight, dispatch is better than discourse: we came not hither without all motives, that can be, towards his maj. and he never sent in this message: we know the danger of our enemies; we must add expedition to expedition; let us forbear particulars. A man in a journey is hindered by asking too many questions. I do believe our peril as great as can be; every man complains of it, and that doth encourage the enemy. Our duty is to take that which took away our estates; and that is, the enemy: to give speedily is that which the king calls for, 'A word spoken in season is like an Apple of Gold set in Pictures' of Silver, and actions are more precious than words. Let us hasten our resolutions to supply his majesty.'

Five Subsidies voted.] Hereupon after some debate, the commons came to this unanimous Resolve, That 5 Subsidies be given to his maj. and Mr. Sec. Cooke was appointed to acquaint his maj. with the Resolution of the house.

April 7. Mr. Secretary Cooke reported to the house the king's acceptance of the Subsidies; and that his maj. was pleased to ask, 'By how many voices they were gained?' I said, 'But by one.' His maj. asked, 'How many were against him?' I said, 'none; for they were voted by one voice, and one general consent.' His maj. was much affected therewith, and called the lords in council, and there I gave them an account of what had passed: besides it gave his maj. no small content, that although 5 Subsidies be inferior to his wants, yet it is the greatest gift that ever was given in parliament; and now he sees, that with this he shall have the affections of his people, which will be greater to him than all value. He said, 'He liked parliaments at first, yet since, (he knew not how) he was grown to a distaste of them; but was now where he was before; for he loves them; and shall rejoice to meet with his people often. That this day he had gained more reputation in Christendom, than if he had won many battles.' And to secure our further fear, and to create further confidence, he assureth us, that we shall enjoy as great immunities in his time, as ever we did possess, or had, under the reign of any the best kings of this realm.'

Mr. Secretary at the same time acquainted the house, that upon his informing the king of their giving of 5 Subsidies, the duke of Buckingham addressed himself to his majesty at the council-table, as follows:

'Sir; Methinks I now behold you a great king; for love is greater than majesty: the opinion that the people loved you not, had almost lost you in the opinion of the world; but this day makes you appear as you are, a glorious king, loved at home, and now to be feared abroad. This falling out so happily, give me leave, I beseech you, to be an humble suitor to your maj. 1st, for myself, that I, who have had the honour to be your favourite, may now give up that title unto them; they to be your favourites, and I to be your servant. My 2nd suit is, that they having done all so well, you will account of them all as one; a body of many members, but all of one heart. Opinion might have made them differ, but affection did move them all to join with like love in this great gift; for the proportion, although it be less than your occasions may ask, yet it is more than ever subjects did give in so short a time: nor, I am persuaded, will it rest there; for this is but an earnest of their affections, to let you see, and the world know, what subjects you have, that when your honour, and the good of the state is engaged, and aid asked in the ordinary way of parliament, you cannot wait. This is not a gift of 5 Subsidies alone, but the opening of a mine of subsidies that lieth in their hearts. This good beginning hath wrought already these effects; they have taken your heart, and drawn from you a declaration that you will love parliaments. And again this will meet, I make no question, with such respect, that their demands will be just, dutiful, and moderate; for they that know thus to give, know well what is fit to ask. Then cannot your maj. do less than out go their demands, or else you do less than yourself or them; for your message begot trust; their truth and your promises must then beget performances. This being done, then shall I, with a glad heart, behold this work as well ended as now begun; and then shall I hope that parliaments shall be made hereafter so frequent, by the effects and good use of them, as they shall have this further benefit, to deter from approaching your ears all projectors and introducers of innovations, as disturbers both of church and common-wealth. Now, sir, to open my heart, and to ease my grief, please you to pardon me a word more. I must confess I have long lived in pain; sleep hath given me no rest; favours and fortunes no content, such have been my secret sorrows, to be thought the man of separation, that divided the king from his people, and them from him; but I hope it shall appear they were some mistaken minds, that would have made me the evil spirit that walketh between a good master and loyal people, by ill offices; whereas, by your majesty's favour, I shall ever endeavour to approve myself a good spirit, breathing nothing but the best services to them all. Therefore this day I account more blessed to me than my birth, to see myself able to serve them, to see you brought into love with parliaments, to see a parliament express such love to you; and God so love me and mine, as I joy to see this day!"

Sir J. Elliot resents the D. of Bucks Speech.]

Mr. Sec. Cooke also at this time, repeated the substance of the king's Answer to the Petition of both houses concerning Recusants, pursuant to his majesty's order. This being done,

Sir John Elliot stood up and spoke as follows.* 'I presume we have all received great satisfaction from his maj. as at other times, so now in his gracious Answer and Resolution for the business of this house; his Answer to our Petition for Religion so particularly made; his Resolution in that other consideration concerning the point, already settled here, in declaration of our liberties; and for the parliament in general; that he hath taken so good a liking to our manner of proceeding, as it hath gained his promise therein to meet us often; whereby I am confident, as of his grace to us, so of our loyalties, that to thus good a beginning we shall add so happy a conclusion, as shall increase that liking and good opinion in his

maj.; and from henceforth make him more and more in love with parliaments. As thus in general, so in my own particular, I receive great satisfaction herein, that I have not words enough sufficiently to utter it. And yet, I confess, that extremity of joy is not without trouble, which must likewise be declared; to disburden this affection, which cannot, otherwise, so lively and so faithfully, express my devotion to the service of this house, as I had resolved. I know not by what fatality or infortunity it has crept in; but I observe, in the close of Mr. Secretary's relation, mention made of another in addition to his maj.; and that which hath been formerly a matter of complaint, I find here still: a mixture with his maj. not only in his business but in name. Is it that any man conceives the mention of others, of what quality soever, can add encouragement or affection to us, in our duties and loyalties towards his maj.; or give them greater latitude or ease than naturally they have? Or is it supposed, that the power or interest of any man can add more readiness to his maj. in his gracious inclination towards us, than his own goodness gives him? I cannot believe it. And as the sweetness and piety of his maj. which we have in admiration, make me confident in this; so the expression of our duty, so perspicuous and clear as already hath been given, is my assurance for the other. But, sir, I am sorry that is occasion that these things should be argued or this mixture, which was formerly condemned, should appear again. I beseech you, sir, let it not be hereafter; let no man take this boldness within these walls, to introduce it; though I confess, for my own particular, I shall readily commend, nay, thank that man whose endeavours are applied to such offices as may be advantageous for the public; yet in this manner so contrary to the customs of our fathers and the honour of our times, as I cannot, without scandal, apprehend it; so I cannot, without some character or exception, pass it. And therefore I desire that such interposition may be let alone; and that all his majesty's regards and goodnesses, towards this house, may spring alone from his confidence of our loyalties and affections. Now let us proceed to those services that concern him; which I doubt not in the end, will render us so real unto him, that we shall need no other help to endear us to his favour.'

Although it is expressly said before, in Rushworth, that the commons voted a Supply of Subsidies on the 4th of April; there is not one word of it mentioned in the Journals, till several days after; the house seeming to be busy in preparing their 'Petition of Right,' which they were resolved, should go hand in hand with the other. And, it seems very probable that no such vote was yet passed, by what follows in the Collections, which now exactly coincides with the Journals of the commons.

The King's Message desiring the Commons not to make any Recess at Easter.] April

* From the 'Ephemeris Parliamentaria,' corrected by the MS.

10, Mr. Sec. Cooke delivered this message from the king, 'That his maj. desired this house not to make any Recess these Easter holidays, that the world may take notice, how earnest his maj. and we are for the public affairs in Christendom, which, by such a recess, would receive interruption.' This message or non-recess, was not well pleasing to the house.

Sir Rob. Philips first resented it, and took notice, 'That in 12th and 18th Jac. upon the like intimation, the house resolved it was in their power to adjourn or sit: hereafter, said he, this may be put upon us by princes of less sely. Let a committee consider hereof, and of our right herein, and make a declaration.' Accordingly this matter, touching his majesty's desire about the Recess, was referred to a committee, who were to consider the power of the house to adjourn itself; to the end, that it might now yielded unto in obedience to his maj. it might not turn to prejudice in time to come.

Sir Edw. Coke. 'I am as tender of the privileges of this house as my life; and they are the heart-strings of the common-wealth. The king makes a prorogation, but this house adjourns itself. The commission of adjournment we never read, but say, 'This house adjourns itself.' If the king write to an abbot for a corody, for a valet, if it be ex rogatu, though the abbot yields to it, it binds not. Therefore I desire that it be entered, that this is done ex rogatu regis.'

Hereupon a Message was sent to the king, that the house would give all expedition to his majesty's service, notwithstanding their purpose of recess. To which message, his maj. returned this Answer, that the motion proceeded from himself, in regard of his engagement in the affairs of Christendom; that he wished them all alacrity in their proceedings, and that there be no recess at all.

Further Debate on the Supply.] April 11. Mr. Sec. Cook moved the expediting of Subsidies, and turning of the votes into an act: 'We have many petitions to the king, said he, and they are petitions of right. We have freely and bountifully given 5 Subsidies, but no time is appointed; and subsidy without time is no subsidy: let us appoint a time.'

Sir Dudley Diggs. 'We have freely conceded our liberties; we have offered 5 Subsidies; his majesty hath given us gracious answers; we have had good by our beginnings: what have we hitherto done for the king? nothing is done that the king can take notice of. The world thinks that this parliament hath not expressed that resolution that it did at first. How much doth it concern the king, that the world be satisfied with his honour? Our success and honour is the king's. Princes want not those that may ingratiate themselves with them, by doing ill offices. There is a stop; and never did a parliament propound any thing but it hath been perfected sooner than this is. May not the king say, 'What have I done? They grow cold. Have I not told them I will proceed with as much grace as ever king did? He will settle our properties and goods. Have we not had a gracious answer. Are we hand in hand for his Supply? Shall it be said that this day it was moved, but denied? It may put our whole business back: wherein can this disadvantage us? I dare say, confidently, we shall have as much favour from his maj. as ever any subjects had from their king.'

Sir Tho. Wentworth.] 'When we set down the time, let us be sure the subjects liberties go hand in hand together; then to resolve of the time; but not report it to the house, till we have a ground, and a bill for our liberties: this is the way to come off fairly, and prevent jealousies.'—Hereupon the committee of the whole house resolved, That Grievances and Supply go hand in hand.

'His maj. having given timely notice to this house, as well of the pressure of the time, as of the necessity of Supply, hath long since expected some fruit of that which was so happily begun; but finding a stop beyond all expectation, nay beyond all example, after so good beginning, he hath commanded me to tell you, That, without any further or unnecessary delay, he would have you to proceed in his business; for, however, he hath been willing that his affairs and ours should concur and proceed together; yet his meaning was not, that the one should give interruption to the other; nor the time to be spun out upon any pretence, to hinder that resolution, upon which the common cause of this kingdom, and even, of all Christendom doth so much depend: he bids us, therefore, take heed, that we force not him (by our tedious and unnecessary delays) to make an unpleasant end of that which was so well begun.'—I will discharge my duty.

I humbly desire this house, not to undervalue or overstrain this Message; if we conceive any thing in it to tend, as if his maj. threatened to dissolve this parliament, we are deceived; his maj. intends the contrary, and to put us in such a way, that our business may have speedy success. His maj. takes notice of a peremptory order, whereby he conceived, that his business was excluded, at least for a time; and that which doth most press his maj. is time: believe me the affairs now in hand press his majesty's heart more than us. Let us remove delays that are more than necessary; let us awaken ourselves; he intends a speedy dispatch. I must, with some grief, tell you, that notice is taken, as if this house pressed not only upon the abuses of power, but upon power itself; this toucheth the king, and us who are supported by that power: let the king hear of any abuses of power; he will willingly hear us; and let us not bend ourselves against the extension of his royal power, but contain ourselves within those bounds, that we meddle only with pressures and abuses of power; and we shall have the best satisfaction that ever king gave. I beseech you all to concur this way, and use that moderation we have not had the honour yet to gain.'

Being moved to explain what he meant by the word 'power,' which, he said, we did oppose; he answered, 'I cannot descend to particulars, or go from that his maj. gave me warrant or power to deliver.' This Message was very displeasing to the house, and many debates succeeded thereupon.

Sir Rob. Philips said, 'He hoped their moderation would have given his maj. a right understanding of their loyalty.'

Mr. Sec. Cooke again. 'All negotiations of ambassadors are at a stop while the house sits; this stop is as a frost upon the earth, that hinders the sweet vapours between his maj. and his subjects; and as matters stand, the soldiers can neither be disbanded, nor put in service.'

Mr. Wandesford. 'This motion comes unexpected, but it is fit to receive some satisfaction: the proceeding now with our Grievances will open the stop that hinders his maj.'s affairs.'

Sir H. May. 'Sweetness, trust, and confidence are the only weapons for us to deal with our king: coldness, enforcement, and constraint will never work our ends: if we compass all we desire, and have not his maj.'s heart, what good will a law or any thing else do us?'

Sir Tho. Wentworth *. 'I cannot help lamenting the unlawful courses and slights, for which the only excuse is necessity. We are required to give; but before we can resolve to give, it must be determined what we have to give; what heavy fogs have of late darkened our hemisphere, and yet hang over us, portending our ruin, none is so weak as to be ignorant of. What unsteady courses to dispel these mists, have been pursued, and thereby raised near us great storms, I take no pleasure to remember: yet, in all bodies diseased, the knowledge precedes the cure. I will shortly tell the principals; next their remedies. I must reduce them into two heads: One, whereby our persons have been injured; the other whereby, our estates have suffered. Our persons have been injured, both by imprisonment without law; nay against law, boundless and without bail; and by being designed to some office, charge and employment, foreign or domestic, as a brand of infamy and mark of disgrace. Oh! Mr. Speaker, when it may not be safe to deny payments upon unjust exactions, but we must go to prison for it: nor, in this place, to speak our consciences, but we must be stamped to unwilling and unfitting employments! Our estates have been racked two ways; one in the Loan, wherein 5 Subsidies were exacted; and that by commission of men of quality, and instructions to prosecute the same with an asperity which no times can parallel. And hence the other consideration, of the projectors and executioners of it: nay, this was not all, but ministers, in their pulpits, have preached it as gospel, and damned the refusers of it: so then we are already doomed to damnation! The second way wherein our estates have suffered, hath been, and yet is in being, by Billeting of Soldiers in most counties in this kingdom. These rough ways lead neither to the king's profit, nor the kingdom's safety: the former may appear by the emptiness of the exchequer and sale of the antient crown-lands: the latter by the imminent and deep dangers that are ready to swallow us up: but I take no pleasure in touching these strings. I conclude with this motion, That we name a committee to consult on these Grievances, and to digest them moderately, discreetly, and truly, into an humble Petition; and let no man distrust his maj. or judge this way a break-neck of parliaments; but a way of honour to the king, nay of profit; for besides the Supply which we shall readily give him suitable to his occasions, we give him our hearts. Our hearts, Mr. Speaker, a gift that God calls for, and fit for a king.'—Hereupon it was ordered, That a special committee of ten members do presently withdraw themselves, and consult together upon some heads, and upon the substance of a fair Representation to his maj.; which the speaker shall deliver in his speech to his maj. on Monday next, if the king please to give access; and at the same time to deliver the Petition against Billeting of Soldiers. This was done accordingly, and, upon the report, agreed to by the house, as follows:

"The Instructions of the Commons to their Speaker, in answer to the king's Message of the 11th of April, by Secretary Cooke *.

"I. That it is the antient right of parliament to dispose of matters, there debated, in their own method. II. That it is their antient custom, to consider of Grievances before matters of Supply. III. That yet nevertheless in this parliament, to express our affection to his maj. contrary to our ordinary proceedings we have proceeded in the Supply, as far as we could, in that committee. IV. This we have been so far from delaying, that, postponing the common and pressing Grievances of the nation we have given precedency to the Supply joining with it only the fundamental and vital liberties of the kingdom, that give subsistence to the subject. V. Further to express the fulness of our loyalty and affection to the king, we have exceeded our order in that particular concerning the Supply; which, though later in proposition, yet hath been first made ready for conclusion in the committee. VI.

* These Instructions are omitted in Rushworth, and in the Journals; but are supplied from the Harleian MS. before mentioned.

* Taken from a MS. in the Harleian Library.

No person or council can be greater lovers of, or more careful to maintain, the sacred rights and prerogatives of the crown, than we: and we do conceive, that the maintaining of the fundamental rights and liberties of the subject is an essential means to establish the glory of a monarch; and that by it his subjects are the better enabled to do him service; which hath been formerly the cause of many glorious victories won by this nation, above other kingdoms of larger territories, and greater number of people. VII. What information is given to his maj. contrary to this, doth proceed from such persons as, to serve their own ends, under colour of advancing his majesty's prerogative, do, in fact, weaken the royal power. VIII. We trust to be cleared in his majesty's judgment, that there hath been no unnecessary stop, but a most cheerful proceeding in the matter of Supply: and therefore we do humbly desire that his maj. will take no information, in this, or any other business, from private relations, but to judge of our proceedings by such Resolutions as shall be presented to his majesty from this house. IX. Being thus rightly and graciously understood, we assure ourselves that the end of this parliament shall be more happy than the beginning."

The Speaker's Speech to the King, on presenting the Petition against Billetting of Soldiers.] In pursuance of these Instructions the Speaker introduced the Petition of the Commons to the King, relating to the Billetting of Soldiers, with the following speech,* on the 14th of April, being Easter-Monday.

"Most gracious and dread sovereign; Your dutiful and loyal commons here assembled, were lately humble suitors to your maj. for access to your royal presence: the occasion that moved their desires herein, was a particular of importance, worthy your princely consideration; and which, as it well deserves, should have been the only subject of my speech at this time.—But since your gracious Answer for this access, obtained by a Message from your maj.; they have had some cause to doubt, that your maj. is not so well satisfied with the manner of their proceedings, as their hearty desire is you should be; especially in that part which concerns your maj.'s present Supply, as if, in the prosecution thereof, they had used some slackness or delay.—And, because no unhappiness of theirs can parallel with that which may proceed from a misunderstanding in your maj. of their clear and loyal intentions, they have commanded me to attend your maj. with an humble and summary declaration of their proceedings, since this short time of their sitting; which they hope will give your maj. abundant satisfaction that never people did more truly desire to be endeared in the favour and gracious opinion of their sovereign; and withal to let your maj. see, that as you can have nowhere more faithful counsel, so your great designs and occasions can no way be so speedily or heartily supported, as in this old and antient way of parliament.—For this purpose they humbly intreat your maj. to take into your royal consideration, that, although by antient right of parliament, the matters there debated are to be digested in their own method and order, and that their constant custom hath been, to take into their consideration the common Grievances of the kingdom, before they enter upon the matter of Supply; yet to make a full expression of that zeal and affection which they bear to your royal person, equalling at least, if not exceeding the best affections of their predecessors to the best of your progenitors; they have in this assembly, contrary to the ordinary proceedings of parliament, given your maj.'s Supply precedence before the common Grievance of the subject, how pressing soever; joining with it, only, those fundamental and vital liberties of the kingdom, which give subsistence and ability to your subjects.—This was their original order and resolution; and was grounded upon a true discernment, that these two considerations could not be severed; but did both of them equally concern your maj.'s service; consisting no less in enabling and encouraging the subject, than in proportioning a present suiting to your maj.'s occasions and their abilities: nay, so far have they been from using any unnecessary delays, that though, of the two, the Supply were the later proposition amongst them, yet the grand committee to which both were referred, hath made that first ready for conclusion.—And to be certain that your maj.'s Supply might receive no interruption by the other, they have, differing from usage and custom (in cases of this nature) sent up, of those that concern the subjects, by parcels, some to your maj. and some to the lords; to the end your maj. might receive such speedy content, as suited with the largest and best extent of their first order.—Sir, you are the breath of our nostrils, and the light of our eyes; and besides those many comforts, which under you and your royal progenitors, in this frame of government, this nation hath enjoyed, the very religion we profess hath taught us whose image you are; and we do all most humbly beseech your maj. to believe, that nothing is or ever can be more dear unto us than the sacred rights and prerogatives of your crown: no person or council can be greater lovers of them, nor be more truly careful to maintain them: and the preserving those fundamental liberties, which concern the freedom of our persons, and property in our goods and estates, is an essential means to establish the true glory of a monarch.—For rich and free subjects, as they are best governed, so they are most able to do your maj. service, either in peace or war; which, next under God, hath been the cause of the happy and famous victories of this nation, beyond other kingdoms of larger territories, and greater numbers of people.—What information soever contrary to this shall be brought unto your maj. can come from no other than such as for their own ends, under colour of advancing the prerogative, do indeed, in truth, undermine and weaken the royal power; and, by impoverishing the subject, render this monarchy less glorious, and the people less able to serve your maj.—Having, by this that hath been said, cleared our hearts and proceedings towards your maj.; our trust is, that, in your royal judgment, we shall be free from the least opinion of giving any unnecessary stop to our proceedings in the matter of Supply; and that your maj. will be pleased to entertain belief of our alacrity and cheerfulness in your service; and that, hereafter, no such misfortune shall befall us as to be misunderstood by your maj. in any thing.—We all most humbly beseech your maj. to receive no information, in this or any other business, from private relations; but to weigh and judge of our proceedings by those Resolutions of the house, that shall be presented from ourselves.—This being rightly and graciously understood, we are confident from the knowledge of your goodness and our own hearts, that the ending of this parliament shall be much more happy than the beginning; and be to all ages styled the ‘Blessed Parliament,’ for making perfect union between the best king and the best people; that your maj. may ever delight in calling us together, and we rejoice in the comforts of your gracious favour towards us.—In this hope, I return to my first errand; which will best appear by that which I shall humbly desire your maj. to hear; it being an humble Petition from the commons, for redressing of those many inconveniences and distractions, that have befallen your subjects by the Billeting of Soldiers in private men’s houses, against their wills.—Your royal progenitors have ever held their subjects hearts the best garrison of this kingdom; and our humble suit to your maj. is, that our faith and loyalty may have such a place in your royal thoughts, as to rest assured that all your subjects will be ready to lay down their lives for the defence of your sacred person and this kingdom.—Not going ourselves into our countries this Easter, we should think it a great happiness to us, (as we know it would be a singular comfort and encouragement to them that sent us hither) if we might but send them the news of a gracious Answer from your maj. in this particular; which the reasons of the Petition, we hope, will move your most excellent maj. graciously to vouchsafe us.”

“THE PETITION CONCERNING THE BILLETING OF SOLDIERS.

“To the King’s Most Excellent Majesty. In all humility complaining, sheweth unto your most excellent maj. your loyal and dutiful commons, now in parliament assembled, that whereas, by the fundamental laws of this realm, every freeman hath, and of right ought to have, a full and absolute property in his goods and estate; and that therefore the billeting and placing soldiers in the house of any such freeman against his will, is directly contrary to the said laws, under which we and our ancestors have been so long and happily governed; yet, in apparent violation of the said ancient and undoubted right of all your majesty’s loyal subjects of this your kingdom in general, and to the grievous and insupportable vexation and detriment of many counties and persons in particular, a new and almost unheard of way hath been invented and put in practice, to lay soldiers upon them, scattered in companies here and there, even in the heart and bowels of this kingdom; and to compel many of your maj.’s subjects to receive and lodge them in their own houses, and both themselves and others to contribute towards the maintenance of them, to the exceeding great disservice of your maj. the general terror of all, and utter undoing of many of your people; insomuch as we cannot sufficiently recount, nor in any sort proportionable to the lively sense that we have of our miseries herein, are we able to represent unto your maj. the innumerable mischief and most grievous exactions that, by this means alone, we do now suffer; whereof we will not presume to trouble your sacred ears with particular instances; only, most sacred sovereign, we beg leave to offer to your most gracious view and compassionate consideration, a few of them in particular. 1. The service of Almighty God is hereby greatly hindered, the people in many places, not daring to repair to the church, lest, in the mean time, the soldiers should rifle their houses. 2. The ancient and good government of the country is hereby neglected, and almost contemned. 3. Your officers of justice, in performance of their duties, have been resisted and endangered. 4. The rents and revenues of your gentry greatly and generally diminished; farmers, to secure themselves from the soldiers insolence, being, by the clamour and solicitation of their fearful and injured wives and children, enforced to give up their wonted dwellings, and to retire themselves into places of more secure habitation. 5. Husbandmen, that are as it were the hands of the country, corrupted by ill example of the soldiers, and encouraged to idle life, give over work; and rather seek to live idly, at another man’s charge, than by their own labour. 6. Tradesmen and artificers almost discouraged; by being forced to leave their trades, and to employ their time in preserving themselves and their families from violence and cruelty. 7. Markets unfrequented, and our ways grown so dangerous, that the people dare not pass to and fro upon their usual occasions. 8. Frequent robberies, assaults, batteries, burglaries, rapes, rapines, murders, barbarous cruelties, and other most abominable vices and outrages, are generally complained of from all parts, where these companies have been and have their abode; few of which insolencies have been so much as questioned, and fewer, according to their demerit, punished.—These and many other lamentable effects, have, by the Billeting of Soldiers, already fallen upon us your loyal subjects; tending no less

to the disservice of your maj. than to their own impoverishing and destruction; so that, thereby, they are exceedingly disabled to yield your maj. those Supplies for your urgent occasions, which they heartily desire; and yet they are further perplexed with apprehension of more approaching danger; one in regard of your subjects at home, the other of enemies from abroad; in both which respects it seems to threaten no small calamity.—For the 1st, the meaner sort of your people being exceedingly poor, whereof in many places are great multitudes, and therefore, even in times of more settled and constant administration of justice, not easily ruled, are most apt, upon this occasion, to cast off the reins of government; and by joining themselves with those disordered soldiers, are very like to fall into mutiny and rebellion: this, in faithful discharge of our duties, we cannot forbear most humbly to present to your high and excellent wisdom; being possessed with probable fears that some such mischief will shortly ensue, if an effectual and speedy course be not taken to remove out of the land, or otherwise to disband, those unruly companies.—For the 2nd, we do most humbly beseech your maj. to take into your princely consideration, that many of those companies, besides their dissolute disposition and carriage, are such as do openly profess themselves papists; and therefore to be suspected that, if occasion serve, they will rather adhere to a foreign enemy of that religion, than to your maj. their liege lord and sovereign; especially some of their captains and commanders being as popishly affected as themselves, and having served in the wars, on the part of the king of Spain and the Archduchess, against your majesty's allies; which, if what pernicious consequence it may prove, and how prejudicial to the safety of your kingdom, we leave to your majesty's high and wisely wisdom.—And now upon these, and many more which might be alledged, most mighty and important reasons, grounded on the maintenance of the worship and service of Almighty God, the continuance and advancement of your majesty's high honour and profit, the preservation of the ancient and undoubted liberties of your people, and therein of justice, industry and valour: all which nearly concern the glory and happiness of your maj. and your subjects; and the preventing of calamity and ruin both of church and common-wealth: we your majesty's most humble and loyal subjects, the knights, citizens, and burghesses of your house of commons, in the name of all the commonalty of your kingdom, who are, upon this occasion, most miserably disconsolate and afflicted, prostrate at the throne of your grace and justice, do most ardently beg a present remove of this unportable burden; and that your maj. would be graciously pleased to secure us from be like pressure in the time to come."

The King's Answer.] To the foregoing Petition the king made the following Answer.

"Mr. Speaker, and you Gentlemen; When

I sent you my last Message, I did not expect a reply, for I intended it only to hasten you; not to find fault with you. I told you, at your first meeting, this time was not to be spent in words, and I am sure it is less fit for disputes; which if I had a desire to entertain, Mr. Speaker's preamble might have given me ground enough. The question is not now, What liberty you have in disposing of matters handled in your own house; but rather at this time what is fit to be done: wherefore I hope you will follow my example, in eschewing disputations, and fall to your important business. You make a protestation of your affection and zeal to my prerogative grounded upon such good and just reasons that I must believe you: but I look that you use me with the like charity, to believe what I have declared, more than once since your meeting, which is, that I am as forward as you for the necessary preservation of your true liberties. Let us not spend so much time in this, that may hazard both my prerogative and your liberties to our enemies. To be short; go on speedily with your business without any fear or more apologies; for time calls fast, which will neither stay for you nor me: wherefore it is my duty to press you to hasten, as best knowing the truth and necessity of it; and yours to give credit to what I say, as to him that sits at and guides the helm. As to what concerns your Petition, I shall make Answer in a convenient time."

The Commons Complaint against the E. of Suffolk, for aspersing a Member of their House.

April 14. Information was given to the commons, by Mr. Kirton, that a lord (the earl of Suffolk) had said, two days before, 'That a gentleman of this house (Mr. Selden) deserved to be hanged for razing a record: with some other speeches to the like purpose. Sir J. Strangeways was named as the person who heard the words; and he was ordered, by the house, to declare his knowledge therein. Sir James said, 'That going up to the house of lords to speak to a lord, about private business, he was asked by one who met him, 'If he had heard nothing.' After this, going into the committee-chamber of the lords, to the best of his remembrance, the words used by the earl of Suffolk were these; 'Sir J. Strangeways, will you not hang Selden?' To which he answered, 'My lord, I know no cause for it.' The earl swore, by God, 'he had razed a record, and was worthy to be hanged for it.' Upon this Mr. Selden was called upon to justify himself in this particular of razing a record. 'Who first denied the charge in general, and next in particular. That he delivered in to the lords diverse copies of records examined by himself, and several other members of the house; wherein he was far from doing any such thing as was charged upon him.'—Upon question it was resolved, 'That Sir J. Strangeways shall set down the words spoken by the earl of Suffolk of Mr. Selden; and that Sir Rob. Philips shall go up with a Message to the lords to charge the earl of Suffolk with the words; and to desire justice from the lords against him; for a wrong, done to the house of commons, in general, and to a member thereof (Mr. Selden) employed in their service, in particular. And, in his introduction, to intimate how far it is from this house to do any thing, which might interrupt the good amity and correspondency between both houses.

Sir Rob. Philipps, being returned from the lords, reported, That their Answer was; '1st, a signification of the desire their lordships had to continue, and, if possible, increase the good correspondency between both houses: that they had presently taken consideration of the Message; and that the earl of Suffolk had there, openly, protested, 'Upon his honour and soul, he had used no such words to sir J. Strangeways.'—But this did not satisfy the commons; a select committee was instantly appointed to consider of the words, and make further disquisition of the proof, and all incidents thereto, with power to send for any witnesses.

April 15. Sir J. Strangeways publicly avowed the words he had charged the earl with the day before; and said, 'That he positively spake them; and that he was ready to make good the same, in any course the house should be pleased to direct, either as a member of it, or a gentleman of honour.' Sir W. Owen stood up and said, 'That yesterday sir Christ. Neville told him, that he heard the earl of Suffolk speak the same words, which sir J. Strangeways charged upon him.'—Referred to the former committee.

April 17. Sir John Elliot, from the said committee, reported, 'That sir Christ. Neville had testified before them, that, on the 12th inst. he was at a committee of the lords, when the earl of Suffolk told him, that Mr. Attorney had cleared the business, and made the cause plain on the king's side; and further said, 'That Mr. Selden had razed a record, and did deserve to be hanged; and this house would do well to join with the lords in a petition to the king to hang him.' And added, 'That Mr. Selden went about to divide the king and his people.' Upon expostulation, the earl did again justify, 'That Mr. Selden had razed a record.' 'That Mr. Littleton, being examined, said, 'That he stood not very near my lord, but heard thus much, which he said, that he would not be in Mr. Selden's case for 10,000*l.* and that he deserved to be hanged.'—These, and some other strong circumstances, too long to insert, brought the committee to the following Resolutions; 1. 'That the earl of Suffolk, notwithstanding his denial, had laid a most unjust and scandalous imputation on Mr. Selden and the house. 2. That they are fully satisfied, that sir J. Strangeways asserted nothing but truth. 3. That these particulars should be presented to the lords, and the earl again charged at the bar; and that the lords should be desired to proceed in justice against him; and to inflict such punishment upon him as so high an offence against the house of commons doth deserve.' Which Resolutions were agreed unto by the whole house.—Sir John Elliot was immediately sent up to charge the earl of Suffolk, at the bar of the lords, with the words, in the manner aforesaid; who returning, said, 'That they would take it into due consideration, and return answer by messengers of their own.' And this is all we hear of the matter in the house of commons.—This charge against the earl of Suffolk is also entered in the lords Journals; and carried as far as sir John Elliot's Remonstrance to them on that subject, and their Answer; but, it is probable that, by some compromise after, the matter was dropped, for we meet with no more about it.

The Proceedings in the King's Bench against the Gentlemen imprisoned for refusing the Loan, inquired into.] April 14. The lords resumed the grand debate concerning the Liberty of the Subject; when the judges of the king's bench attended, according to an order of the 8th, to give an account of the Reasons of their Judgment, in the case of the gentlemen imprisoned by the king's order, for refusing the Loan; which the commons had complained of—hereupon.

The Chief Justice* said, 'That they were prepared to obey their lordships command; but desired to be advised by them, whether they, being sworn upon penalty of forfeiting body, lands, and goods into the king's hands, to give an account to him, may do this without warrant from his maj.'

The duke of Buckingham said, 'He had acquainted the king with the business, and, for ought he knoweth, he is well content therewith: but, for better assurance, he had sent his brother Anglesey to know his maj.'s pleasure.'

The earl of Devonshire answered, 'If a complaint be made by a mean man against the greatest officer in this place, he is to give an account of his doings to this house.'

The bishop of Lincoln† said, 'This motion proceeded from him, and he took it for clear, that there is an appeal even from the chancery, which is a higher court than the king's bench: and that court hath ever given an account of their doings.'

The lord Saye wondered there should be any question made of this business; because, in his opinion, this being the highest court, did admit of no appeal.

The Lord President‡ said, 'The Judges did not do this by way of appeal; but as the most common way for them; this being a matter concerning the king's prerogative.'

* Sir Nicholas Hide, so appointed on the removal of sir Randolph Crew, for refusing to forward the Loan.—Rushworth tells us, that he owed this advancement to his being employed in drawing up the duke of Buckingham's Answer to the Impeachment of the Commons, see p. 167.

The lord Saye answered, 'If they will not declare themselves, we must take into consideration the point of our privilege.'

The duke of Buckingham replied, 'This was at done by the judges, as fearing to answer; at out of respect to the king: and now his rother Anglesey was come with answer from be king, that they might proceed.'

The Judges give the Reasons of their Conduct.] Hereupon, Mr. Justice Whitlock said, My lords, We are, by your appointment, here ready to clear an aspersion of the house of commons, that the Subject was greatly wounded in the Judgment lately given in the King's bench. If such a thing were, your lordships, at they, have the power to question and judge be same: but, my lords, I say there was no adgment given, whereby either the prerogative might be enlarged, or the right of the subject treuched upon. It is true, in Michaelmas term last, 5 gentlemen petitioned for a Habeas Corpus, which they obtained, and counsel was assigned unto them†. The return was per specialen mandatum domini regis; which likewise was made known unto us under the hands of 18 privy counsellors.—Now, my lords, if we had delivered them presently upon this, it must have been because the king did not shew cause; wherein we should have judged the king had done wrong, and this is beyond our knowledge; for he might have committed them for other matters than we could have imagined. But they might say, They might have been kept in prison all their days. I answer, no; but we did remit them, that we might better advise of the matter; and they the next day might have had a new writ, if they had pleased. But they say, We ought not to have denied bail. I answer if we had done so, it must needs have reflected upon the king that he had unjustly imprisoned them: and it appears in Dyer, 2 Eliz. that divers gentlemen being committed, and requiring Habeas Corpus, some were bailed, others remitted; whereby it appears much is left to the discretion of the judges.—For that which troubleth so much, remittitur quousque, this, my lords, was only, as I said before, to take time what to do: and whereas they will have a difference betwixt remittitur, and remittitur quousque, I confess I can find none: these are only new inventions to trouble old records. Herein we have dealt with knowledge and understanding; for had we given a judgment, the party must thereupon have rested; every judgment must come to an issue, in matter of fact, or demur in point of law; here is neither; therefore no judgment. As for endeavouring to have a judgment entered: it is true Mr. Attorney pressed the same for his master's service; but we, being sworn to do right betwixt the king and his subjects, commanded the clerk to make no entry, but according to the old form: and the rule was given by the chief justice alone. I did never see nor know, by any record, that, upon such a return as this, a man was bailed; the king not being first consulted with, in such a case as this. The commons do not know what letters and commands we receive; for these remain in our court, and were not viewed by them: and for the rest of the matters, presented by the commons, they were not in agitation before us, 'Whether the king may commit; and how long he may detain a man committed.' Therefore, having answered so much as concerneth us, I desire your lordships good construction of what hath been said."

Mr. Justice Jones.—"My lords, We are here to deliver what judgment was given by us concerning the Habeas Corpus; to which I answer, no judgment was given; and the matter of fact was such as my brother hath already delivered unto you. These gentlemen were committed to the Fleet, the Gate-house, and to the Marshal of the king's household: returns were made upon the writs, and counsel appointed, who had copies of the returns: a rule was granted, and their counsel heard; but exception was taken to the return, because it did not shew the cause of their caption. This was of no force in the opinion of the judges. The next exception was, because no cause of their commitment was shewn; which the judges held to be all one in point of law.—Then, my lords, they alledged many precedents and statutes, which the king's attorney answered, 'That persons committed by the king or council, were never bailed, but his pleasure was first known.' We agreed, at the chamber of the chief justice, that all the statutes alledged are in force; but whether we should bail them or no, was the question; therefore we remitted them quousque. After which Mr. Attorney required a judgment might be entered. I commanded the clerk he should not suffer any such thing to be done, because we would be better advised.—But some will say, our act is otherwise; I answer, no; for we have done no more than we do upon ordinary writs, when we purpose to be better advised, and that was only an interlocutory order. But, put the case a Habeas Corpus should be granted for one that is committed by the commons, would they, think you, take it well we should be bailed at his first coming to the court? I think they would not: and I think the king would not in this case.—Now, my lords, there is a Petition of Right; and a Petition of Grace: to be bailed is a matter of grace; therefore if a man be brought upon an H. Corpus, and not bailed, he cannot say the court hath done him any wrong. I have now served 7 years judge in this court, and my conscience beareth me witness that I have not wronged the same. I have been thought sometimes too forward for the liberty of the subject. I am myself liber homo, and my ancestors gave their voice with Magna Charta. I enjoy that house still which they did. I do not, now, mean to draw down God's wrath upon my posterity; and therefore I will neither advance the king's prerogative, nor lessen the Liberty of the Subject, to the danger of either king or people. This is my profession before God and your lordships."

* The account of this debate, and the speeches of the 4 judges, are in the 'Ephemeris Parliamentaria,' Two of them, only, are in Blackworth; for which Dr. Nelson charges him with great partiality. We have chosen to copy sir John Napier's MS. which is much more correct.

Mr. Justice Dodderidge.—"My Lords; It is no more fit for a judge to decline to give an account of his doings, than for a Christian of his faith. God knoweth, I have endeavoured always to keep a good conscience; for a troubled one, who can bear? The king holds of none but God; and judgments do not pass privately in chambers, but publickly in court, where every one may hear; which causeth judgment to be given with maturity. You have heard the particulars delivered by my brethren: how that counsel being assigned to 4 of these gentlemen, in the latter end of Michaelmas term, their cause received a hearing: and, upon consideration of the statutes and records, we found some of them to be according to the good old law of Magna Charta; but we thought that they did not come so close to this case, as that bail should be thereupon, presently, granted. My lords, the Habeas Corpus consisteth of 3 parts, the writ, the return upon the writ or schedule, and the entry or rule reciting the H. Corpus: and on the return together with the opinion of the court, either a remittitur, or traditur in ballium is granted. In this case a remittitur was granted; which we did, that we might take better advisement upon the case: and upon the remittitur, they might have had a new writ the next day; and I wish they had; because, it may be, they had seen more, and we had been eased of a great labour. And when the attorney, upon the remittitur, pressed an entry, we all straitly charged the clerk that he should make no other entry than such as our predecessors had usually made, in like cases: as for any difference, betwixt remittitur and remittitur quousque, I could never yet find any. I have now sat in this court 15 years, and I should know something: surely if I had gone in a mill so long, dust would cleave to my cloaths. I am old, and have one foot in the grave, therefore I will look to the better part as near as I can. But 'omnia habere in memoria, et in nullo errare, divinum potius est quam humanum.'"

The Lord Chief Justice.—"My Lords, I shall not speak with confidence, unless I might stand right in the opinion of the house. I protest what I spake before was not said, by me, with any purpose to trench upon the privileges of this house; but out of that respect which, by my place, I thought I owed to the king. Concerning the point now to be spoken to, I shall not trouble you with things already repeated, wherein I concurred with my brethren. If it were true, the king might not commit, we did wrong in not presently delivering; for, these statutes and good laws being all in force, we meant not to trench upon any of them; most of them being commentaries upon Magna Charta: but I know not any statute that goeth so far, that the king may not commit. Therefore justly, we think, we delivered the interpretation thereof to that purpose: for, my lords, lex terra is not to be found in this statute; they gave me no example, neither was there any cause shewed in the return. A precedent that hath run in a storm, doth not much direct us in point of law; and records are the best testimonies. These precedents, which they brought, being read, we shewed them wherein they were mistaken. If we have erred, erravimus cum patribus; and they can shew no precedent, but that our predecessors have done as we have done; sometimes bailing, sometimes remitting, sometimes discharging. Yet we do never bail any committed by the king, or his council, till his pleasure be first known: and thus did the lord chief justice Coke in Raynard's case. They say, This would have been done, if the king had not written; but why then was the letter read, and published, and kept? and why was the town-clerk sent carefully to inquire (because the letter so directed) whether these men offered for bail were Subsidy-men? The letter sheweth also that Beckwith was committed for suspicion of being acquainted with the Gunpowder-Treason; but, no proof being produced, the king left him to be bailed."—The Judges having ended,* the lords adjourned.

Report of a second Conference between both Houses concerning the Liberty of the Subject. April 17. The matter was argued very solemnly at a conference between the two houses, by the attorney general and the king's counsel on one side, and a select committee of the commons on the other. We shall give the report of this conference at length, from the authority of the lords Journals.

"The LORD-KEEPER'S† REPORT of the First Part of the CONFERENCE between the Lords and Commons, on the 17th of April, concerning the LIBERTY of the SUBJECT."

"At this conference Mr. Attorney declared, That, as, by commandment of the lords, himself, and his fellows of the learned counsel, advised together, and by him had declared in this house what was conceived fitting; so upon a new commandment, they had again advised and conferred; shewing, at this conference, the effect of what was delivered in the house; which, in substance, rested upon these parts. 1. The State of the Question. 2. Acts of Parliament, and parliamentary Proceedings. 3. Precedents. 4. Resolutions of former times. 5. Some Reasons offered to maintain this side, and weaken the other.—In these, by their advice, he resolved not to pass from point to point; but, according to the time and occasion, to touch some parts summarily, and to insist chiefly upon one, viz. The Precedents for the parliamentary proceedings. He agreed, that the great Charter, upon which the liberty of the free subjects of this kingdom is grounded, is in force; and that, in former times, occasions were often given to the subject to press it to be confirmed; and that the commons did fitly and worthily to maintain the liberties and privileges left unto them by their ancestors.—He did also acknowledge, 'That this charter did extend to the king, rather than the subject; and that the subsequent statutes, 6 in number, stand in force; but the difference and doubt rested in the interpretation and application of the statute: for the words of Magna Charta are general; that it did not restrain the king from imprisoning a subject; but with this clause, 'Nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum, vel per legem terræ:' and how far lex terræ extends, and ever was the question. Of the subsequent statutes, some confirm Magna Charta in totidem verbis; and therefore decide not the question, but leave it as they found it; so that to ground any arguments on them will be petitio principii; and the others concern not the question now in hand, but were made for redress of inconveniences happening to the subjects, by the suggestion or information of parties; but this he submitted to the house.—In the court of king's bench the judges did not meddle with the statutes, but did ground themselves upon resolutions and precedents; which he would now repeat, and leave the difference to both houses. We have directed the records to be here; and if it shall seem good to you, we desire that we may read or open what is in the Declaration of the commons touching each record; and then read the record itself, and open what we have to say therein. The 1st Precedent is, That John Biddleston, a clergyman, by a writ under the great seal, was committed to the Tower, with commandment to keep him safely, 'donec aliter a nobis habueritis in mandatis.' From the Tower he was brought to the King's-bench, and committed to the marshal. And the lieutenant asked him, If he had any other cause against him? who said, No; but the king's writ only: 'Et quia videtur curiæ per breve prædict, quod non est sufficiens causa, &c.' idem he was bailed.—To this he answered, 1st, That this writ bears date in March, 16 Ed. 3. and commands to receive John Biddleston from the sheriffs of London, to whom he was formerly committed in the writ: and as there is neither general nor special cause, nor yet any mention upon what warrant or command he was committed to the sheriffs of London; so it is true, that dimittitur per manucapionem; and thus far it seems to make for the other side. But, it appears that this writ was not an original commitment; but a transferring and removing of the prisoner from one custody to another. 2dly, It appears he lay 2 years in the Tower, viz. from 16 till 18 Ed. 3, before he came to the King's-bench. 3dly, 'It appears, in another part of the same record, That the cause of commitment was for suspicion of counterfeiting the great seal; and he was brought to the King's-bench for that cause: for being bailed, and at the day, coming in upon his bail, there came another writ to the justices, which Mr. Attorney read out of the record; which recited, That the king had caused him to be brought to the King's-bench, for suspicion of counterfeiting the great seal, 'quousque per quondam informationem plenius informemur. And because the informer came not, the writ commands the judges, that if he came not by quind. then adventuram ejus non expectare, but proceed according to law: so that, although in a record so ancient, it is difficult to find out all material parts, yet by this writ, the cause of the commitment appears; and when the cause appears and is such whereupon the King's-bench may proceed, they must go on according to justice. It appears by this writ, that he was committed upon the suggestion of an informer; and observe the time; for it seems that about 5 Edw. 3. and forward, these informers began to be too frequent; and therefore care was taken to relieve the subject against those inconveniences; which, growing more and more, were after complained of in parliament.—Here Mr. Attorney staid; and after a little pause upon settling whether the lower house would answer particularly to each Precedent, or take all together,

* An order was made that these Speeches of the Judges should not be entered in the Journals; probably, to prevent their being drawn into precedent.

Sir Edw. Coke began thus:—'Your lordships have well perceived how fairly, and with what respect, we have dealt with you, and ever shall. We brought up unto you what we had resolved on; and not only that, but the cause and grounds of our resolutions, and all our records; the like whereof was never done in parliament: and we are to maintain what we did. The natural and the politic body have a great resemblance and proportion: and as the natural body hath symptoms of good or evil health, so we hold it a good symptom for us, that Mr. Attorney was so long and so loth to come to it. My lords, we will break order rather than defer the business. This conference is between the two houses. Mr. Attorney is no member of your house: he attends you; but his voice is with us: yet we are so willing to proceed, that we will take no hold of threads: let him say what he can, we will allow him a voice here, where he ought not to speak. We have delegatam potestatem, tantum permissam, quantum commissam; and therefore, for all new matter of this conference, we come with ears, not with tongues. For the resolutions of the judges, we are glad of them; and we are confident never a judge in England will be against what we have resolved. We can say nothing to it; it is new matter; but we will report it faithfully to our house.—

Quintilian, a notable rhetorician; for so he was indeed, and taught the rules best, speaks of 'simulatio.' It is a figure of rhetoric; and, says he, 'simulatio procedit ut quod dicendo refutare non possimus id tanquam fastidiendo calcitremus.' Methinks Mr. Attorney has made use of this simulatio, and hath slighted the acts of parliament; and therefore we desire they may be read.—Here being told by the lord-keeper, That the acts of parl. were well known, and had been all read in our house, he replied, 'I cannot tell, nescio quid energiae habeat viva vox: alas! Litera occidit, spiritus autem vivificat. To slight these, is tanquam fastidiendo calcitrare:' and so pressed on that the acts of parl. might be read and opened. And thereupon began

Mr. Littleton. 'It is agreed by Mr. Attorney, and resolved by the judges, that the acts of parl. are all in force; and that the statute of Magna Charta concerns the king as well as the subject; nay, the king rather than the subject: the exposition makes all the matter; and chiefly of these words, legem terræ; which if they bear not the exposition which we have given them, I would gladly have heard from Mr. Attorney another exposition. I will prove our exposition by reason: for if these words, legem terræ, should be extended to the general law of the land, then it should extend to villains, who, by the law of the land, may be imprisoned by their lords without any cause; but so cannot a freeman. But I need not insist upon reason, the exposition is so clear by the ensuing statutes.' And reading the words of the statute 25 Ed. 3. 'By this it appears, that what in Magna Charta is called lex terræ, in the statute of 28 Ed. 3. is called 'process of the law.' And where Mr. Attorney said the words were general, they are as express as any man can pen them in this age; and where he said, that the ensuing statutes extend to imprisonment, upon suggestion of parties, it is equal whether the king do it of himself, or by suggestion of others: but kings seldom do those things merely of themselves; but as things proceeding from some man's suggestion.' Then reading the statute 5 Edw. 3. he said, 'None would doubt but 'attaching' in that statute, was attaching the body.' And reading the statute 28 Ed. 3. without any special inference upon it, he read 36 Ed. 3. Rot. Parl. No. 9.

"THE LORD PRESIDENT'S REPORT OF THE Second Part of the CONFERENCE.

"Mr. Littleton read divers of the statutes, which he cited in the former conference, which was reported here on the 9th of April, and made the same inferences therefrom; and Mr. Attorney delivered another Answer unto the same than what he had formerly made; which he left to the judgment of the lords.—Then Mr. Attorney made his objections to the precedents, alledged by Mr. Selden on behalf of the commons; and Mr. Selden gave several answers unto the same in this manner:

"To the First of the 12 Precedents, produced by the commons, to prove their Resolutions, in the Case of John Biddleston, Pasch. 18 Edw. 3. Rot. 33. Rex. To this Mr. Attorney objected. 1. 'That in the return of him into the court, it did not appear that this Biddleston was committed by the king's command: and, 2. That in the record it did appear also, that he had been committed for suspicion of counterfeiting the great seal; and so by consequence was bailable in the law, in regard there appeared cause why he was committed. And he said, That this part of the record, by which it appeared he had been committed for this suspicion, was not observed to the lords in the argument of the commons before used. And he shewed also that there were 3 several kinds of records, by which the full truth of every award or bailing, upon a Habeas Corpus, is known. 1. The remembrance-roll, wherein the award is given. 2dly, The file of the writ, and the return. And 3dly, The scrute-roll, or scrumfile, wherein the bail is entered; and that only the remembrance-roll of this case was to be found; and that if the other two were extant, he doubted not but that it would appear also upon the return itself, that the cause of the commitment had been expressed.' And so he concluded, That this proved not for the Resolution of the commons, touching the manner of bail, where a prisoner was committed by the king's special command, without cause shewed.

To these Objections Mr. Selden replied thus: 1st, 'That it was plain that Biddleston was committed by the king's express command; for so are the very words in the writ to the constable of the Tower, 'quod cum teneri & custodiri facias,' &c. than which nothing can more fully express a commitment by the king's command. 2dly, Howsoever it be true, that in the latter part of the record it does appear, That Biddleston had been committed for the suspicion of treason; yet, if the times of the proceedings, expressed in the record, were observed, it would be plain, that the objection was of no force: for this on ground, both in this case and all the rest, is infallible, and never to be doubted of in the law, that the justices of every court adjudge of the force or strength of a return out of the body of itself only, and according as it therein appears to them. Now in Easter Term, 18 Ed. 3. he was returned and brought before them as committed only by that writ, wherein no cause is expressed; and the lieutenant or the constable of the Tower of London, that brought him into the court, says, that he had no other warrant to detain him, nisi breve prædictum, wherein there was no mention of any cause; and the court, thereupon, adjudged, that breve prædictum, or that special command was not sufficient cause to detain him in prison: and thereupon he is, by judgment of the court in Easter Term, let to main-prize. But that part of the record, wherein it appears that he had indeed been committed for suspicion of treason, is of Trinity Term following; when the king, after the letting to main-prize, sent to the judges that they should discharge his main-prize, because no man prosecuted him. And at that time it appears, but not before, that he had been in for suspicion of treason; so that he was returned to stand committed by the king's special command only, without cause shewed in Easter Term; and then, by judgment of the court, let to main-prize; which, to the present purpose, is but the same with bail, though otherwise it differ. And, in the term following, upon another occasion, the court knew that he had been committed for suspicion of treason; which hath no relation at all to the letting of him to main-prize, nor to the judgment of the court, before given; when they did not, nor could not possibly know any cause for which the king had committed him."

—And Mr. Selden said, in behalf of the commons, 'That they had not, indeed, in their argument, expressly used this latter part of the record of Biddleston's case, because it being only of Trinity Term following, it could not concern the reason of an award given by the court in Easter Term next before. Yet, notwithstanding, that they had most faithfully, at the time of their argument, delivered in to the lords a perfect copy, at large, of the whole record of this case: as they had done also of all other precedents whatsoever cited by them. And, as touching those 3 kinds of record, Mr. Selden answered, that it was true that the scrute and return of this case of Biddleston was not to be found; but that it did not lessen the weight of the precedent, because always in the award or judgment drawn up in the remembrance roll, the cause, whatsoever it be, when any is shewed upon the return, is always expressed: as it appears clearly by the constant entries of the court of King's-bench. So that if any cause had appeared to the court, it must have appeared plainly in that part of the roll which belongs to Easter Term, wherein the judgment was given.' But the return of the commitment, by the king's command, without cause shewed; and the judgment of court, that the prisoner was to be let to main-prize, appears therein only: therefore, notwithstanding any objection made by Mr. Attorney, Mr. Selden affirmed this case to be a clear proof, amongst many others, touching that resolution of the commons."

"To the Second, which was Parker's case in 22 Hen. 8. rot. 37. Mr. Attorney's Objections were, 1. 'That it is true, that he was returned to be committed 'per mandatum domini regis'; but that it appeared that this command was certified to the sheriffs of London by one Peck. And that in regard the command came no otherwise, the return was held insufficient: and therefore he was bailed. 2. That it appears also in the record, that he was committed 'pro suspicione felonie, ac per mandatum domini regis'; so that in regard that, in the expression of the causes of this commitment, suspicion of felony precedes the command of the king, therefore, it must be intended that the court took the cause, why the king committed him to be of less moment than felony; and therefore bailed him. For he objected, that even the commons themselves in some arguments used by them, touching the interpretation of the Statute of Westminster the First, ch. 15, about this point, had confirmed that, in enumeration of particulars, those of greatest nature were first mentioned; and it was supposed, that such as followed are, usually, of less nature or moment.—Mr. Selden replied to the first Objection, 'That the addition of the certifying the king's command by Peck, altered not the case. 1st. Because the sheriffs, in their return, took notice of the command, as what they were assured of; and then, howsoever it came to them, it was of equal force, as if it had been mentioned without reference. 2. That as divers patents passed the great seal by writ of privy seal, and are subscribed 'per breve de privato sigillo', so divers 'per ipsum regem', and are so subscribed: and often times, in the roll of former times, to the words 'per ipsum regem' are added nunciat. A. B. So that the king's command generally, and the king's command related or certified by such a man to this purpose, is of like nature. 3. In the late great case of the Habeas Corpus, where the return of the commitment was 'per speciale mandatum domini regis, mihi significatum per dominos de privato consilio'; the court of King's-bench did agree that it was the same, and of like force as if 'mihi significatum, &c.' had not followed, and that those words were void. According whereunto, here also 'per mandatum domini regis nunciat. per R. Peck', was to be taken as if 'nunciat. per R. Peck', had been wholly omitted, and void.—Likewise, and in truth, in that late case, this case of Parker was cited both at the bar and bench; and at the bench, it was interpreted by the judges no otherwise than if it had been only 'per mandatum domini regis' in this place of it.—But the objection made there was of another kind; as now delivered in the first argument made out of the precedents, in behalf of the commons. Then for the second, touching the course of enumeration of the causes in the return; Mr. Selden said, That, howsoever in some acts of parl. and elsewhere in the solemn expressions used in the law, things of greater nature precede and the less follow; yet in this case the contrary was most plain; for in the return, it appears that there were 3 causes of detaining the prisoner; surety of the peace, suspicion of felony, and the king's command: and surety of the peace is first mentioned, which is plainly less than felony. Therefore it is as plain (if any force of argument be here to be taken from this enumeration) that the contrary to that, which Mr. Attorney inferred, is to be concluded: that is, as felony is a greater cause than surety of the peace, so the matter, whereupon the king's command was grounded, was greater than felony: but, in truth, this kind of argument holds neither way here; and whatsoever the cause was, why the king committed him, it was impossible for the court to know; and it might also have been of very high moment, in a matter of state, and yet of far less nature than felony: all which shews this precedent bath its full force also, according as it was first used in argument by the commons.

"To the Third, which is Brink's case, 35 Hen. 8. rot. 33. the objection by Mr. Attorney was, 'That there was a cause expressed 'pro suspicione feloniz', and though 'pro aliis causis illos moventibus' were added in the return, yet because, in the course of enumeration, the general name of 'alia', coming after particulars, includes things of less nature than the particular doth: therefore, in this case, suspicion of felony being the first, the other causes, afterwards generally mentioned, must be intended of a less nature; for which the prisoner was bailable; because he was bailable for the greater, which was suspicion of felony.'—Hereto Mr. Selden replied, 'That the argument of enumeration in these cases is of no moment, as is next before shewed; and that, although it were of any moment, yet the 'alia causa', though less than felony, might be of very great consequence in matter of state, which is pretended, usually, upon general returns of command without cause shewed: and it is most plain that the court could not know the reasons why the prisoner here was committed; and yet they bailed him, without looking further after any unknown thing, under that title of matters of state, which as well might have been in this case as in any other whatsoever.'—[The Objections made by Mr. Attorney against the 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th Precedents, alledged by the House of Commons in favour of their Resolutions, with Mr. Selden's Answers thereto, are omitted in the Journals.]

"To the Eighth, which is Browning's Case, 20 Eliz. rot. 72, it was said by Mr. Attorney, 'That he was bailed by a letter from the lords of the council, directed to the judges of the court: but being asked for that letter or any testimony of it, he could produce none at all: but said, he thought the testimony of it was burnt among many other things of the council-table, at the burning of the banqueting house. To the Ninth, being Harcourt's Case, 40 Eliz. rot. 62, the self-same objection was made by him, but no warrant was shewed. To the Tenth, which is Catesby's Case in Hillary vacation, 43 Eliz. Mr. Attorney said, 'That it was by direction of a privy seal from the queen; and to that purpose, he shewed the privy seal of 43 Eliz. which is at large amongst the transcripts of the records, concerning bails taken in cases where the king or lords of the council assented.'—But Mr. Selden replied, 'That the privy seal was made only for some particular gentlemen mentioned in it, and for none other, as indeed appears just; and then Mr. S. said, that it was likely that Catesby here had a privy seal in his behalf, because those others had so.'

"To the Eleventh of these, which is Beckwith's Case, 12 Jac. rot. 153, Mr. Attorney said, 'The lords of the council sent letters to the court of the King's-bench to bail him; and he produced a letter, which could not be found when the arguments were made at the first conference.'—To this Mr. Selden replied, 'That the letter was of no moment, being only a direction to the chief justice, and no matter of record, nor any way concerning the rest of the judges; and, besides, either the prisoner was bailable by law, or not bailable; if bailable by the law, then he was to be bailed without any such letter; if not bailable by the law, then plainly the judges could not have bailed him upon the letter without breach of their oath; which is, that they are to do justice, according to the law, without having respect to any command whatsoever. So that the letter in this case, or the like in any other case, is, for point of law, to no purpose, nor bath any weight at all, by way of objection, against what the record and judgment of the court shew us.'

"To the Twelfth and last of these, which is sir Tho. Mounson's case, 14 Jac. rot. 147. the same objection was made over again by him, which was moved and answered in the argument at the first Conference; and that one ground which is infallible, that the judgment upon a return is to be made out only of what appears in the body of the return itself, was again insisted upon by Mr. Selden, in this case; as it was also in most of the rest.

"After Mr. Attorney's Objections to these 12 Precedents, and the Replies given to those objections, Mr. Attorney came next to those, where the assent of the king or the privy-council appears to have been given to an enlargement: and he made the same kind of objections as are moved and answered before: and, for so much as concerns letters of assent or direction; the same was here said again, by way of reply to him as before, touching the letter in Beckwith's case."

"The Earl of HERTFORD'S REPORT of the Third Part of the CONFERENCE.

"After Mr. Attorney had made his Objections, and the gentlemen of the commons brought their Answer, to what had been said touching the 12 Precedents, brought all for express testimonies, for the maintenance of the Resolution of the commons; and after the gentlemen of the commons had given their Answer to that which was objected, out of such precedents as shew some assent of the king's attorney, or of the lords of the council, to the bailing of prisoners committed by such special command: Mr. Attorney came to urge the 8 precedents for the other side against that resolution; which 8 were mentioned, and copies of them given in at the first conference.

"Of these 8, the first four were urged by Mr. Attorney, as being of one kind; the difference of them being only such, that saving the names of the persons and prisons, they are but one and the self-same. The force of these 4 be objected thus: 'That Everard, for the purpose in the first of them, which is 5 Hen. 7.

rot. 18. Cherry, in the 2nd of them, which is 8 Hen. 7. rot. 12. Burton, in the 3rd of them, which is 9 Hen. 7. rot. 14. and Urswick, in the 4th of them, which is 19 Hen. 7. rot. 23. were returned into the King's-bench upon several writs of Habeas Corpus, to have been committed and detained in the several prisons whence they came, per mandatum domini regis; and that, upon that return, they were committed to the marshal of the King's-bench: and that however it hath been objected against these 4 precedents, that this kind of commitment, by the course of that court, was always done before the bailing of the prisoners, yet that it did not appear that they were bailed.—Mr. Selden's Answer to this objection was, 'That by the constant course of the King's-bench, whosoever came by Habeas Corpus, or otherwise upon any writ, into that court, cannot be bailed until he be first committed to the marshal of that court; and that thence it was that all these 4 were committed to the marshal, as appears by the entry, 'qui committitur marescallo,' &c. which is the usual entry in such a case; and that all the clerks of that court acknowledge this course of entry to be most constant and perpetual: so that all the inference that can be made out of these 4 is but this, that 4 prisoners being brought from several prisons, by Habeas Corpus, into the King's-bench, and returned to stand committed 'per mandatum domini regis,' were so far from being remanded by the law; that in all these 4 cases, they were first taken from the several prisons, wherein they had been detained by such a general command; which could not have been, if they had not been adjudged in every of these cases to have beenailable by the court: and that this commitment of them to the marshal of the King's-bench, was the first step towards the bailing of them, as in all other cases: but that it appears not, that either they ever demanded to be bailed, or that they were able to find sufficient bail: and if they did not the one, nor could do the other, it might follow indeed, that they were not bailed; but this commitment to the King's-bench, being the first step to the bailing of them, (as by the constant course it is) shews most plainly that they wereailable by the law; which is the only thing in question."

"To the 5th of these 8 being Page's Case, in 7 Hen. 8. rot. 23. Mr. Attorney objected thus: 'That Page was committed to the marshal of the household 'per mandatum domini regis, ibidem salvo custodiendo, &c. qui committitur marescallo hospitii domini regis,' by which it appears, as he said, that the court remanded him to the prison of the Marshalsea of the household. And he said, 'That whereas it had been objected at the first conference, that there was some mistake in the entry, he said, he conceived indeed there was a mistake; and that the mistake was, that the clerk had entered 'committitur' for 'remittitur,' and that it should have been, 'Qui remittitur marescallo hospitii domini regis,' for whenever they remand the prisoner 'remittitur' and not 'committitur'

should be entered: and that mistake being so rectified and understood, he conceived that it was a direct precedent against the Resolution of the commons.'—To this Mr. Selden answered, 'That there was no doubt indeed but that a mistake was in the entry by the clerk; but that the mistake was quite of another nature: the addition of these words, 'hospitii domini regis' was the mistake; and the entry should have been, 'Qui committitur marescallo,' &c. only: that is, he was committed to the marshal of the King's-bench. And so indeed the force of this precedent should be but just the same with the first 4. But that the ignorance of the clerk that entered it, and knew not how to distinguish between the marshal of the king's household, and the marshal of the King's-bench, was the cause of the addition of those words, 'hospitii domini regis.'—And to confirm fully this kind of interpretation of that precedent, and of the mistake in it, Mr. Selden observed, 'That there is, in the margin of the roll, an infallible character that justifies as much; for, by the course of that court, whosoever a prisoner is committed to the marshal of the King's-bench, and not remanded, the word marescallo is written by Ma and r turned up; and that it is never written there, but when the meaning and sense of the entry is, that the prisoner is committed to the prison of the same court.—Now, in this case, in the margin, Ma and the r turned up is likewise written; which most clearly shews, that the truth of the case was, that this Page was committed to the marshal of the King's bench, and not remanded; for if he had been remanded, neither could the entry have been committitur, nor should the margin of the roll have had marescallo written in it."

"To the sixth of these 8 precedents, being the case of Cæsar, in 8 Jac. rot. 99. Mr. Attorney objected thus: 'That Cæsar, being committed 'per mandatum domini regis' to the Marshalsea of the household, was returned upon Habeas Corpus to be so committed, and therefore detained in prison; and therefore the entry is, 'qui remittitur prisonæ marescalli prædicti,' by which it appears clearly, that he was remanded to the same prison from whence he came.' To this Mr. Selden answered, 'The usual entry of a remittitur, when it is to shew that the court, by way of judgment or award, upon resolution or debate, remanded the prisoner, is 'remittitur quousque,' &c. which is 'remittitur quousque secundum legem deliberatus fuerit.' But when they advise, or give day to the keeper of the prison to amend his return or the like, then the entry is only remittitur generally, or remittitur prisonæ prædictæ. Though it was indeed affirmed by Keeling, a clerk of experience in that court, that the entry of 'remittitur' generally, or 'remittitur prisonæ prædictæ,' was indifferently used for the same, that is 'remittitur quousque, &c.' yet it was expressly shewed by Mr. Selden, that there was sometimes a difference, and that so it might well be in this case: for in the last of these 8 precedents, which is Saltonstall's case, he observed, 'That remittitur prisonæ predictæ is often used; and, in that case, it is plain that twice it was used only for a remanding during the time which the court gave to the warden of the Fleet to amend his return; which shews plainly, as it was said, that although sometimes 'remittitur,' generally, and 'remittitur quousque,' may mean but the same, yet sometimes also it does not mean the same: and that, in this case of Cæsar, it intends but so much as it doth, twice, in Saltonstall's case. This they proved also by a rule of the court, which they cited out of the rule-book of the King's-bench: by which rule the court expressly ordered, That, unless the steward and marshal of the household did sufficiently return the writ of H. Corpus for Cæsar, he should be discharged. And this was the opinion of the court; which shews, that the court was so far from remanding him upon the return, that they resolved, unless some better return was made, the prisoner should be discharged of his first imprisonment; though it appeared to them, out of the body of the return, upon which they are only to judge, that he was committed 'per mandatum domini regis' only.

"The seventh is the Case of Demetrius, 12 Jac. rot. 153. Mr. Attorney objected, That this Demetrius and divers others, being brewers, stood committed per mandatum domini regis to the marshalsea of the household; but that, upon the H. Corpus being so generally returned, they were remanded; and that the entry was 'immediate remittitur p̄fat. marescallo hospitii predicti;' where he observed, that immediate shews that the judges of that time were so resolved of this question, that they remanded him presently, as men that well knew what the law was therein. Hereto Mr. Selden answered, 1. That the remittitur in this case is but as in the other of Cæsar's, and so proves nothing against them. 2. That immediate shews plainly, that it was done without debate, or any argument or consideration had of it; which makes the authority of the precedent to be of no force in point of law: for judgments and awards given upon deliberation and debate only, are proofs and arguments of weight: and not any sudden act of the court, without debate or deliberation. And the entry of immediate being proposed to Mr. Keeling, it was answered by him, that by that entry it appears, by the course, that the remanding of him was the self-same day that he was brought; which, Mr. Selden said, might be at the rising of the court, or upon advisement, or the like.

"The last of these 8. is Saltonstall's Case, 12 Jac. to which Mr. Attorney objected thus, He was committed 'per mandatum dominorum de privato consilio,' and being returned by the warden of the Fleet to be so, 'remittitur prisonæ predictæ;' and, in 13 Jac. in the same case, there is 'remittitur' generally in the roll. And these two make but one case, and are as one precedent.—Mr. Selden answered, It is true that the roll hath such entry of 'remittitur'

in it generally; but that proves nothing; upon the reason before used by them in Cæsar's case; but also Saltonstall was committed for another cause, besides 'per mandatum dominorum consilii,' viz. for a contempt against an order in chancery; and that was in the return also. And besides, the court, as it appears in the record, gave several days to the warden of the Fleet to amend his return; which they would not have done if they had conceived it sufficient; because that which is sufficient needs not any amendment.—To this Mr. Attorney replied, That they gave him day to amend his return, in respect of that part of it that concerns the order in chancery; and not in respect of that which was per mandatum consilii.—Mr. Selden said, 'This appears no where; nor indeed is it likely at all, nor can be reasonably so understood; because if the other return, 'per mandatum consilii' had been sufficient by itself, then, doubtless, they would have remanded him upon that alone: for then they needed not to have stood at all upon the other part of the return in this case; so that, out of the record itself, it appears fully, that the court conceived the return to be insufficient.

"And so the gentlemen of the house of commons concluded, That they had a great number of precedents, besides the acts of parliament, agreeable to their Resolution, and there was not one made against them; but that even all those brought by Mr. Attorney himself, if rightly understood, made fully for the maintenance of their Resolution. The Objections being thus made by Mr. Attorney, and the Answers by the gentlemen of the commons, the consideration of this, with the rest, was left to your lordships.

"Here Mr. Attorney spake to the house of commons about that order that Keeling, by his appointment, had drawn up; but it was to the same effect that he had spoken of your lordships in the house before. And then, my lord of Devonshire put Mr. Attorney in mind of some things omitted by him, which he had formerly spoken of in this house; which occasioned the conference next day; which I leave to the next two lords, in their order, to report."

These three Reports being ended, the lords agreed to hear the rest, which was to be reported by the earl of Devonshire and the bishop of Lincoln in the afternoon; but not to enter into debate thereof until Monday.

"The Earl of DEVONSHIRE'S REPORT of the Fourth Part of the CONFERENCE with the Commons, concerning the LIBERTY of the SUBJECT.

"This consisted of the arguments made use of by Mr. Attorney-General and by Mr. serjeant Ashley, as of counsel for the king herein. And first, Mr. Attorney (sir Rob. Heath) spake thus:—'My lords, and you the gentlemen of the commons house; according to your lordships directions, yesterday I made some relation of part of that which before, upon the like commandment, I had spoken before the lords in their house, upon the occasion of that Declaration, which was sent to the lords from the commons house. The course I then took, was this : after I had first set down the state of the question between us, and spoken somewhat of the statutes, which were mentioned and insisted upon, by that Declaration, to maintain the tenet or proposition of the commons, concerning their personal liberties ; I came to the precedents, which were delivered on either side, and opened the reasons and applications of them one by one ; and spent that day on that part of the work, as being the most weighty, and that on which my lords the judges of the King's-bench, grounded their resolutions and rule they gave there : that which now remains to be spoken unto, is, the Opinions and Resolutions of the Judges and sages of the law in former times, touching this question ; and the reasons, which have been given on either side, to maintain or oppose that which hath been affirmed in this case.—I shall not, willingly, draw you back to any thing which hath been formerly said, but for so much only as is of necessity : for, before we proceed to these parts now to be spoken unto, it will be necessary that I do, clearly and plainly, lay down the true state of the question ; that so we may apply the resolutions and reasons ad idem. This, as it is delivered in writing from the commons, stands upon two separate resolutions ; but it is fit to join them together, for they make but one entire proposition, and are so linked together, and depend one on the other, as they cannot be severed. The words of this proposition are these, “ That no freeman ought to be committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, by command of the king, or the privy-council, or any other ; unless some cause of the commitment, detainer, or restraint be expressed ; for which, by law, he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained.” And, afterwards, “ That if a freeman be committed, or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, by command of the king, privy-council, or any other ; no cause of such commitment, detainer, or restraint being expressed ; and the same be returned upon an Habeas Corpus granted for the party ; that then he ought to be delivered or bailed.” (See p. 259.)—To maintain this as it is propounded ; the words of the statute of Magna Charta, cap. 29. are laid down as a foundation, ‘ nullus liber homo imprisonetur, nisi per iudicium parium suorum, vel per legem terræ ;’ and the 6 subsequent statutes have been read and enforced, as confirmations and explanations of that passage. I shall not draw your lordships back further into the consideration of these statutes, than only to put you in mind that the statute of Magna Charta doth not contain, or express, any definitive words of this declaration : nor hath it any words in it more particular than these, ‘ nisi per legem terræ.’ Therefore, the words being general, they have need

“ It hath been said on the other side, That these subsequent statutes do expound these general words ; and that ‘ per legem terræ’ is to be understood ‘ per debitum legis processum,’ i. e. by indictment, presentment or original writ. Surely, this cannot be the true meaning of these laws : for then it must necessarily follow, that no offender could justly and legally be committed, and restrained of his liberty, unless he was first indicted or presented by a jury, or that an original writ be brought against him ; which neither is nor ever was, the practice of this kingdom in criminal cases. For then could not a constable, (which is the lowest and yet the antientest officer of the crown) nor a justice of peace, but in these cases only where there is a precise statute to warrant him, either apprehend or commit one to prison, or set a knave in the stocks, for a just suspicion ; nay if he was taken, he could not, according to this doctrine, be committed, unless the fact was first presented or found by a jury. I appeal to you all, whether, if this should be held for a direction, I may not truly say, ‘ In hoc erravimus omnes ?’ and whether it would not be too late, and utterly in vain, to proceed against offenders, when they must be left at large until the indictment was first found, or presentment made against them ? For, surely, they would then provide for themselves, and be gone when they should be proceeded against.—And for a writ original in criminal cases, I profess I know not what it means, if it be not at the suit of the king. Therefore doubtless, there is some other meaning of these words : and that they can be no otherwise understood, but of a legal proceeding to judgment or condemnation : but can, in no wise, be meant of the first commitment, or putting into safe custody, to the end the party accused may be sure to be forth-coming.—But if ye will vary the case thus far, as to say, that by these laws no freeman ought to be committed, or imprisoned without just cause, this I shall agree to be good law, and shall willingly subscribe unto it ; that neither the king's privy-council, nor the king, nor any other, have power, that is, have a just and warranted power, to commit any freeman without a just cause.—But herein stands the difference ; whether this cause must be always expressed upon commitment ; and whether such cause so expressed, must always be legal and warranted by the strict rules and letter of the law ; or whether the law hath not ever allowed this latitude to the king, or his privy-council, which are his representative body, and do what they do in his name and by his power, in extraordinary cases, to restrain the persons of such freemen, as for reason of state, they find necessary for a time, without the present expressing of the causes thereof ; which, if it should be expressed, might discover the secret of the state in that point, and might easily prevent the service by that discovery.—

What hath been the use and practice in all ages, in these cases, appears by the many precedents, which have been remembered and read unto you: of which I shall say no more than this. It is not the confidence by which they be delivered or applied on either side, that makes them better or worse, or more or less to the purpose, for which they were brought; and therefore I shall recommend them to your lordships memories, and great judgments and wisdom, to weigh them and every of them. And now I come to the authorities and resolutions of former times, which have been remembered. There hath been some mention and reliance made, for this matter upon the Statute of Westminster 1. ch. 15. which was made in 3 Edw. I. and this, as I said heretofore, did explain this great doubt: by the gentlemen of the commons it hath been much insisted upon, and a great deal of pains taken to prove, that that statute was made for sheriffs, and such other inferior or ministerial officers; and did not extend to the judges, who are neither mentioned nor meant thereby. Surely, my lords, I shall much ease that pains; for I do agree, that that statute was made for the direction of sheriffs and such ministerial officers; and for their punishment when they should offend in cases of setting prisoners at large by plevin: but that which I affirm upon that statute, to this purpose, is, That in the recital of that statute, it is agreed what the common law was before; which is, that in those cases there mentioned, which are 4, they were not repleviable at the common law.—If at the common law this was so, then it was long before the statute of Magna Charta; and if it was so at the making of this statute, then Magna Charta had not altered it. And observe, I pray, that this was made in the time of the son; not in the time of the father, when the statute of Magna Charta was made: and this statute of Westm. 1. doth not recite that these 4 sorts were not repleviable by sheriffs; but generally, that they were not repleviable at all: amongst which 4 those who are committed by the command of the king himself, is one of those sorts; and this is the same exposition, which I find Mr. Justice Stamford makes of it, who was a reverend judge of the court of common pleas, at that time, when he wrote the Treatise of the Pleas of the Crown; in which treatise, fol. 72. after he hath recited the statute of Westm. ad verbum; his own words are thus: 'By this statute it appears, that in 4 cases at the common law, a man was not repleviable: and these were such as were taken for the death of a man; or by the commandment of the king; or of his justices; or for the forest.—For the death of a man, he saith, he had spoken before; and as for the commandment of the king, it was intended the commandment of his own mouth or of his council, which are incorporated with him, and speak with the mouth of the king himself, for himself. If ye will take these words of a commandment generally; ye may say that every commandment by capi-

as in a personal action is such: for there the words are precipimus tibi quod capias, and yet there the defendant is repleviable by the common law. And as to the commandment of the justices; it is intended their absolute commandment. And, in the same chapter, in the next leaf he saith, That if one be committed by the absolute command of the justices, he is not bailable. As if the justice command one to prison without shewing cause: or for misdemeanor before himself, or for such a thing as lieth in the discretion of a justice more than his ordinary power.—My lords, I pray observe this part of his opinion also; for it makes full against the tenet of the house of commons: for that goes general, 'That the King, nor no other, can commit without cause shewed;' which, as here appears, the justices of the king may do. My lords, have the justices this power and this latitude, and shall it be believed that the king himself, who is Justiciarius Regni, and is the fountain of justice, may not be trusted with that power? And, that this is the power of the justices, appears also by another authority, in our books in 31 Hen. 6. fol. 11. in one Selbie's case, (the opinion of that reverend judge Fortescue) that if the judges do commit a man, without shewing a cause thereof or without making any record thereof, as many times they did, it shall be intended to be lawfully and well done: and as Mr. Stamford's opinion is in this case, so it appears in the book called 'The register,' which is the book of our writs, which are the foundation of all our proceedings at law; where, in the writ of Hominum replegiando, it is recited, that there are some persons, which 'secundum consuetudinem Angliæ non sunt replegiabiles,' and, in one of those writs, it is expressly mentioned thus; 'nisi captus sit per speciale præceptum nostrum, vel capitalis justitii nostri, &c.' And Mr. Justice Fitzherbert, a great and a learned judge, in his 'Natura Brevium,' (which is a commentary upon the Register,) holdeth the same opinion.—I shall next to this remember unto you the record of the 21 Ed. I. in Parl. Rot. 2. which is that of the sheriff of Leicester and Warwick, where it is twice recited, quod nullam faceret gratiam, meaning, in his letting to plevin: so that it appears by that, and by all our records, that letting to bail in all cases, not expressly directed by some statute, is, ex gratia curiæ; and if ex gratia, then it is not ex debito; for they are contradictions. And that is contrary to the tenet of the commons: for they put a necessity upon the judges, that they must deliver or bail.—Next to this is the opinion of Newton, 22 Hen. 6. fol. 52. which is but a single opinion, and that but obscure and dark: for he saith, that a man, committed by the command of the king, is irrepleviable by the sheriff: and this is the scope and intention of that book: but some other words follow, whereof hold is taken, That the friends of the party may resort to the justices, and pray a superseas. How this is meant; and by what means it can be done, and what superseas is intended, is so obscure by that book, that it will make very little to the present purpose.—Next is the book of 33 Hen. 6. fol. 28. the case of Poyning, where there is a return made, that captus or detentus fuit per dominos or per duos (take it either way) de consilio regis, pro rebus regem tangentibus. This book is an authority in this point, for the king: for the return is accepted of, and allowed to be good. But I confess ingenuously, I do not much rely upon this book neither on this side; because the matter is not debated at all there, but passeth by way of admittance.—The next is the Resolution of all the Judges, in 34 Eliz. Here Mr. Attorney read the latter part of it, which concerneth this general question; all the former parts being of commitments, made by particular counsellors, to the prejudice of particular persons in their suits; and many times in their executions after judgments: but, in this latter part, as appeareth by the words, it doth agree, That the courts of justice ought not to deliver, or bail, where the commitment is by the command of the king or his council. And touching the return of the cause, upon an Habeas Corpus, they agree it ought to be either generally, or specially, expressed: if then a general expression be enough, it is agreeing with the general return of 'per mandatum domini regis:' and, if it must be special, it must be so special as that all the circumstances must be made to appear to the court, that they may be able to judge thereof. Therefore, that Resolution of all the judges is, in my understanding, very plain and clear in this point; but I submit it to your lordships judgments.—Next is the Opinion of the Judges, in 13 Jac. in the King's-bench, upon the debate of Russel's case: and here, by the way, I must be bold to observe thus much, that, although this be the report of a private student and not in print; yet it is such, and of that nature, as all other reports are, (being faithfully collected) whereupon we, who are professors of the law, do ground opinions; and wherein judges of succeeding times do ground themselves, upon the opinions of their worthy predecessors: and such reports, whether in paper or in print, are of equal authority with us. For these which are printed, by the labours of those worthy men, who have taken pains therein, were first collected out of such reports in paper. The words of this report I shall read thoroughly, because they confirm many passages in these conferences. The words are these; 'Coke, Crooke, Dodderidge, and Haughton, justices, did hold, that a return that one is committed per mandatum privati consilii domini regis, was good enough, without returning any cause: for it is not fit that the arcana imperii should be disclosed:' and as to the case of Harcourt, in 40 Eliz. (a case remembered amongst the precedents cited before) where, in the time of Popham, chief justice, one was committed to the Tower for high treason, and was bailed upon an Habeas Corpus sent for him: this was by a special command of the queen, or of the privy-council, and not otherwise: and of later time, when one was committed to prison for the Powder Plot, he was bailed by them upon an Habeas Corpus: but this was by letters of the privy-council; which gave warrant so to do: which letters are filed in the crown-office. These are the letters which concerned Beckwith and Reyner; and which have been read already to your lordships. In 34 Eliz. it was resolved by all the judges of England, that the cause of the commitment should not be returned; and therefore, where sir S. Saltonstall was returned to be committed per mandatum privati consilii domini regis, the court would not meddle with him, but held the return sufficient enough. And sir Edw. Coke, being then chief justice of that court, said, 'That if the privy council commit one to prison, he is not bailable by any court in England: for where the statute of Westm. 1. saith, That he, which is committed to prison by the commandment of the king, cannot be let to mainprize; Stamford makes this interpretation, that by the king is well intended his privy council, who are the representative body of the king. And that sir Edw. Coke added, he knew a bill put in by Mr. Morice, attorney of the court of wards, into parliament; by which it was desired that the statute of Magna Charta, chap. 29. might be explained.—My lords, by the words of this case thus reported, and by the opinion of those reverend judges, you see how many things before cited have authority and life given unto them, not only in the main point in the question, but in the reason thereof, you see the true reason of Harcourt's case, and of Beckwith's and Reyner's case; the true meaning of the resolution of 34 Eliz. by all the judges: (which is now endeavoured to be turned into another sense) also the exposition of the statute of Westminster 1. and interpretation of Stamford likewise thereupon; and, lastly, that a bill was preferred in parliament to explain the statute of Magna Charta: and I wish, with all my heart, that, by the wisdom of both the houses, a fitting bill might be preferred to compose and to settle, well and equally, this great question.—Next I come to the opinion delivered in the parliament house, in 18 Jac. whereof I made some mention before, and now am put in mind of it again by an occasion offered yesterday by one of my lords in mentioning of it: it was the words of the rev. and learned gent. sir Edw. Coke, upon whose opinion I have much grounded myself. It was upon occasion of a bill, then preferred in parliament, entituled, 'An Act for the better securing the Subject from wrongful imprisonment, contrary to Magna Charta, chap. 29.' This bill came to a second reading, May 5. 19 Jac. I being then a member of that house. Upon this occasion sir Edw. Coke stood up and said thus; (I have a note of the very words;) 'There are divers matters of state, which are not to be comprehended in the warrant, for so they may be disclosed. One committed by the body of the council is not bailable by law, resolved so by all the judges in Wray's time, (that, my lords, is the Resolution of 34 Eliz. when Wray was chief justice) upon the commitment of the king or the body of the council: for this is quite out of the statute of Magna Charta.—My lords, that it may appear it was not a sudden opinion, this being the 5th of May; on the 23th of the same month this bill was again offered to the house to be committed; and then sir Edw. Coke spake to it again and said, 'That in 33 Hen. 6. upon an Habeas Corpus, where a party was imprisoned by two privy counselors, pro rebus regem tangentibus; that being the return it was allowed.' (This, my lords, was Poyning's case before cited) and he said further, 'That it was so held in Elizabeth's time, by the judges, where the commitment is by the privy council, and he thought this so reasonable, that he moved for the bill to be recommended; and so it was, or, rather, it was committed perpetually; for no more was done upon that bill.—My lords, I have now done with those Opinions and Resolutions; saving that I must crave your patience thus far, to put you in mind of the many precedents you have heard, for every one of them is also a resolution of those judges, which gave the rule in these several cases.—I come now to the last part, which are the reasons that have been offered on either side, wherein I shall not trouble you long. The reasons delivered on the other part have been many, collected and applied with a great deal of art and judgment. It hath been said by that learned and worthy gentleman, who delivered those reasons; 1. 'That if the king might thus commit, without cause, the free subjects were in the case of villains. 2. Nay, in worse case than villains. 3. That imprisonment is counted a civil death; and therefore a man imprisoned is as a dead man. 4. That the least corporal punishment is greater than the greatest pecuniary: therefore, if the king cannot inflict the less, as the assessing of a fine, he cannot do the greater, which is the imprisoning of the body. 5. That there are diversities of remedies against imprisonment; therefore some remedy must be applied for this. 6. That this extends to all persons, of all degrees, of all qualities; therefore it is commune periculum. 7. That it is indefinite for time; and so may be a perpetual imprisonment.—Arguments were drawn a fine, ab honesto, ab utili, à tuto. And, lastly, two authorities were remembered by him.—All these Reasons I shall, with your favour, reduce to one general head: The Liberty of the free Subject of this kingdom; which is of great esteem, and is the inheritance of the subject. I acknowledge it to be very true that which hath been said thereupon; and I am also of this mind, that he is not worthy to enjoy his liberty, who would not by all just means endeavour to preserve and maintain it."—I know it is a plausible argument; but I shall humbly desire to lay in the other scale these Reasons, which I shall offer unto you on the other side, why personal liberty, in such sort as is desired by the resolutions of the commons, cannot possibly be allowed of in that latitude therein set down; but, before I come these to reasons, I shall crave leave to remember unto you the case of 33 Hen. 7. in parliament, and the other two authorities, which were cited by this reverend gentleman. And, my lords, as an inference was drawn on the other side, out of the record, of a petition in parliament, 36 Ed. 3. N. 9. where the petition is in French, That the commons pray, that the statute of Magna Charta, and the other statutes, might be duly observed, sans disturbance mettre, ou arrest faire ni contre: these words have been expounded to extend to personal arrest of the subject; but I conceive the sense of these words cannot bear that exposition; for the true understanding of them must needs be thus, that Magna Charta, and the other statutes be put in due execution without any disturbance or delay made, or hindrance to the contrary. And to these the king made a full Answer, That it should be done as was desired. And I shall willingly subscribe thereto. For the truth of this exposition I submit myself to the judgments of my lords, who are much better able to judge of the true meaning of the French words than I am.—It has been urged, That in the 36 Hen. 6. N. 16. the commons in parliament desired, that the duke of Suffolk might be committed; the lords and judges answered, he ought not to be committed without a cause shewed. My lords, I acknowledge this to be a very just resolution; but give me leave, I pray you, to observe, by the way, that here the commons in parliament preferred a request to the lords; which upon better examination of the justness of it, was denied by the lords (being assisted by the judges) to be yielded unto. And for the resolution itself, it was very just and honourable; for it were not reasonable for a court of justice, especially so high and so great a court as the court of parliament, to commit any to prison without a just cause. But, whether this can be fitly applied to the case of the king, or the lords of the council, who commit for some great cause, in reason of state, until a due examination may be had of the cause, I humbly submit to your judgments. Another argument was out of the Acts of the Apostles, ch. 25. the last verse; where Festus being then vicerey or deputy to the emperor, and having in purpose to send Paul unto Cæsar, said, 'he thought it unreasonable to send him, and not to send with him the cause of his commitment. My lords, I acknowledge it to be a very discreet resolution of Festus; who although he was a mere moral man, yet he held it a wise and discreet position not to send a prisoner to Cæsar, his superior, to whom he was to give an account, and not to send with him the cause for which he should be tried, and of which he was accused. But, whether this do prove any thing in our case in question, I humbly refer to your judgments; where not the inferior to his superior, but the superior to his inferior sends the prisoner, to whom he is not bound to give that account.—And now, my lords, I come to the Reasons, which I shall humbly offer on the other side, against this tenet of the house of commons, in such manner as it is laid down; wherein I must first crave leave to lay before you what conclusions do, necessarily, follow out of this proposition of the commons. 1. If the cause of the commitment must be laid down, then necessarily it must be affirmed, that this must be the true cause, and not a false or feigned cause, for that were worse than to express no cause at all. 2. It must be expressed at the time of the making of the warrant for the commitment; which is instantly and presently; and from this there must be no varying. 3. It must be expressed so fully, as that the court must be able to judge of it from itself; for if it be an uncertain cause, or set down so lamely as not to give full satisfaction to the court, it is as bad as none at all. Lastly, It must be a legal cause; such a one as by the fundamental rules of the law, the judges must judge it a good cause of commitment or detainer, or else they must presently discharge or bail. Then, upon these premises, doth this conclusion naturally follow, That in no case whatsoever, may any man be committed or restrained for any thing, never so much concerning the state; but that forthwith the keeper of the prison must be acquainted with the cause so fully, as that he may, truly and without variation, inform the court thereof, when it shall be required; and that cause must hold the strictest examination and trial of the law: which, if it should be admitted, your lordships shall see what infinite peril it might bring, not only to the persons of private men, (which are not to be neglected) but to the whole state; the very fabrick and frame of government under which we live.—But it hath been objected, That if the king, or the council, may commit without shewing cause, it would be infinitely full of mischief; for, as the king may commit one, so he may commit any, or many; as he may commit for a just cause, so he may commit without a cause; as he may commit for a time, so he may commit to a perpetual imprisonment. To this I answer, that it cannot be imagined of the king, that he will at any time, or in any case, do injustice to his subjects. It is a maxim in our law, that the king can do no wrong. Therefore the king can give no land by disseisin, as in 1 Ed. 5. fol. 8. He can give no adrowsion by usurpation, as in 32 Hen. 8. fol. 48. And this is so far from being a defect or impotency in the king, that it is held for a point of his prerogative; as it is said in the lord Berkley's case, in Mr. Plowden's commentaries. The reason is, as the king is supreme governor of his people, so he is Pater Patriæ; therefore he cannot want the affection of a father towards his children.—Now, my lords, I shall instance, in some cases of importance, wherein, for a time, one may and must be imprisoned, and yet the cause of it not presently rendered; as in the days of queen Eliz. which many of the lords cannot but call to mind. There was a great conspiracy against the person of the queen: some were laid hold on, committed, and imprisoned; but they could not be proceeded against: nor was it safe to reveal it, until one Owen, a priest, living then at Brussels, could be caught. This required a long time (above a year) to bring it to pass; at last, by a wile, he was laid hold upon, and brought over. Now, if so much as the general cause had been published, it would have been more difficult to have gotten Owen; and haply without him, the plot could not have been discovered. Would any man have thought fit that in this case the others should in the mean time have been set at liberty? I appeal to the judgment of my lords, whether there be not a necessity in the affairs of state, sometimes to give forth one thing for a pretence to secrete the true intention of the action.—I shall give you another instance in the troubles of Ireland. O'Donnel, the arch rebel, was slain; his sons, being then infants, were brought over into England, and committed to the Tower, and lived therein all their lives after. Admit these were brought to the King's-bench by Habeas Corpus, and the cause returned, what cause can there be which could hold in law? They themselves neither had done, nor could do any offence; they were brought over in their infancy. True; but their father was an arch-traitor. Is this a legal cause of detaining the son in prison? Yet would any man believe that it were safe, that it were fit, to deliver those persons? Yet this general tenet admits of no exception. Infinite other examples might be given. How often do we see the state interpose in ordering the government of trades, of companies, of private corporations, and with very good success: for the peace of these petty governments doth preserve the peace and quiet of the great frame; and the common law can give no rule in these things.—Upon this occasion I have looked into some acts of state in queen Eliz.'s time; which I shall be bold to offer to your lordships judgments. In the times of dearth, lest the poor should starve and perish, the farmer was commanded to bring forth his corn to serve the market, to sell at a reasonable price. Is there any law to order or compel this? Yet is not this fit to be done? In queen Eliz.'s time, before any law was made against Jesuits or Seminary Priests; before any law was made for confining of Popish Recusants; the one sort were imprisoned, the other confined, in times of danger, by the acts of the state only: and would it have been fit to have delivered, or bailed these upon a Habeas Corpus?—But the true answer for these, and the like cases, is, That it is not contrary to the laws: for as God hath trusted the king with governing the whole; so hath he therefore trusted him with ordering of the parts: and there are many cases, of infinite importance to the subject, and of undoubted trust, reposed in the king; wherein, notwithstanding, it was never questioned by a subject of the king, why he did thus or thus. It may be urged, If the king is trusted with the coins and monies of the kingdom, he may, of his own absolute power, abase or enhance them; he may turn our gold or silver money into brass, or base money, and in one instant undo his people thereby. If he is not to be trusted, he may make wars; he may conclude peace or leagues; and these may be fatal to the whole kingdom; to the liberty and to the lives of his subjects. The answer is, he will not do this to the hurt of his people. Again, he hath power to pardon traitors and felons; the good people of the land may suffer by too great an extent of mercy; and the good may be devoured of the bad. No, the king will not do hurt to his people thereby. The king hath power, without number or limitation, to make strangers to be denizens: it may be said that this lets in a flood of strangers to eat up the bread of natural-born subjects: but this receives the same answer, The king will not break the trust committed to him by God. But my lords, do I, by this, say or maintain, that a king hath liberty to do what he lists? No, God forbid: he is set over his people for their good; and if he do transgress and do unjustly, there is a greater than he, the King of Kings; respondet superiori. And as Bracton, an old writer of the law, said, 'Satis ei sufficit ad penam, quod dominum expectat ultorem.'—I beg leave to conclude with observing, that these gentlemen of the house of commons have done like true Englishmen, to maintain their liberties by all the good and fit means they may; and myself, as one of the number, shall desire it likewise: but I fear also they have done like right Englishmen; that is, as we usually say in our proverb, they have overdone: they have made their proposition so unlimited, and so large, that it cannot possibly stand; and it is incompatible with that form of government, which is monarchy, under which we happily live."

Mr. Serjeant Ashley spake next.—'I hope it will neither be offensive nor tedious to your lordships, if I say somewhat to second Mr. Attorney; which I rather desire, because yesterday it was taken by the gentlemen that argued on the behalf of the commons, that the cause was as good as gained by them, and yielded by us, in that we acknowledged the statute of Magna Charta, and the other subsequent statutes to be yet in force: for from this they inferred this general conclusion, That therefore no man could be committed, or imprisoned, but by due process, presentment, or indictment; which, we say, is a non sequitur upon such our acknowledgment: for then it would follow, by necessary consequence, that no imprisonment could be justifiable but by process of law; which we utterly deny: for in the case of a constable, cited by Mr. Attorney, it is most clear that, by the antient law of the land, a constable might, ex officio, without other warrant, arrest and restrain a man to prevent an affray, or in the time of an affray, to suppress it; and so is the authority in 37 Hen. 2. Brook's Abstracts. So may he, after the affray, apprehend and commit to prison, the person that hath wounded a man, that is in peril of death, and that without warrant or process; as it is in 38 Hen. 3. fol. 6. Also any man, that is no officer, may apprehend a felon without warrant or writ; and pursue him as a wolf, a common enemy to the common-wealth, as the Book is 14 Hen. 8. fol. 16. So may any man arrest a night-walker; because it is for the common profit, as the reason is given, 4 Hen. 7. fol. 18. and so may a watchman, 4 Hen. 7. fol. 2. In like manner the judges, in their several courts, may commit a man, either for contempt or misdemeanors, without any other process or warrant, than 'Take him Sheriff,' or 'Take him Marshal,' or 'Warden of the Fleet,' and the adversary will not deny but, if the king will alledge a cause, he may commit a man only by his mandatum, as the judges do without other process or warrant. And various are the cases that may be instanced, where there may be lawful commitment without process: and therefore the words in the statute, per legem terræ, cannot be restrained to so narrow bounds as to imprisonment by process: wherefore I do positively, and with confidence affirm, That if the imprisonment be lawful, let it be by process, or without process, it is not prohibited by this law.—This being granted, then the question will aptly be made, Whether the king or council may commit to prison per legem terræ? And, if they may, whether of necessity they are obliged to declare a cause? To clear this, we must consider what is lex terræ; which is not so strictly to be taken as if lex terræ were only that part of the municipal law of this realm, which we call common law; for there are divers other jurisdictions exercised in this kingdom, which are also to be reckoned in the law of the land. In Cawdrey's Case, Coke's 5th Report, fol. 8. the ecclesiastical law is held the law of the land to punish blasphemies, apostacies, heresies, schisms, simony, incest, and the like, for a good reason there rendered, viz. That otherwise the king should not have power to do justice to subjects in all cases, nor to punish all crimes within his kingdom. The admiralty jurisdiction is also lex terræ, for things done upon the sea; but if they exceed this jurisdiction, a prohibition is awarded upon this statute of nullus liber homo; by which it appears the statute is in force, as we have acknowledged. The martial law, likewise, though not to be exercised in times of peace, when recourse may be had to the king's courts, yet in time of invasion, or other times of hostility, when an army royal is in the field, and offences are committed which require speedy resolution, and cannot expect the solemnities of legal trials, then such imprisonment, execution, or other justice done by the law martial, is warrantable; for it is then the law of the land, and is jus gentium, which ever serves for a supply in defect of the common law, when or diary proceedings cannot be had. And so it is also in the case of the law-merchant, which is mentioned 13 Edw. 4. fol. 9, where a merchant-stranger was wronged in his goods, which he had committed to a carrier to convey to Southampton, and the carrier embezzled some of the goods; for remedy where in the merchant sued in the Star-chamber for redress. It is here said, that merchant-strangers have the king's safe conduct for coming into this realm; therefore they shall not be compelled to attend the ordinary trial of the common law; but, by expedition, they must sue before the king's council or in chancery, de die in diem, & de hora in horam; where the cause shall be determined by the law of nature. In like manner it is in the law of the state; when the necessity of the state requires it, they do, and may proceed according to natural equity, as in those other cases: because in cases, where the law of the land provides not, there the proceedings may be by the law of natural equity: and infinite are the occurrences of state unto which the common law extends not; and if those proceedings of state should not also be accounted the law of the land, then do we fall into the same inconveniency mentioned in Eadwrey's case, that the king should not be able to do justice in all cases within his own dominions. If then the king, or his council, may not commit, it must needs follow, that either the king must have no council of state, or, having such a council, they must have no power to make orders or acts of state; and, in this case, they must be without means to compel obedience to those acts: and so we shall allow them jurisdiction, but not coercion; which will then be as fruitless as the philosopher's 'Frustra potentia, quæ nunquam reducitur in actum.' Whereas the very act of Westminster. 1. shews plainly that the king may commit, and that his commitment is lawful; or else that act would never have declared a man to be irrepleviable, when he is committed by the command of the king, if the law-makers had conceived that his commitment had been unlawful. And Divine Truth informs us, That kings have their power from God, and are representative gods; the Psalmist calling them the 'Children of the Most High;' which is in a more especial manner understood of kings than of other men: for all the sons of Adam are, by creation, the children of God; and all the sons of Abraham are, by recreation, or regeneration, the children of the Most High: but it is said of kings, they are the children of the Most High, in respect of the power that is committed unto them. Who hath also furnished them with ornaments and arms fit for the exercising of that power, and given them scepters, swords, and crowns; scepters to institute, and swords to execute laws, and crowns as ensigns of that power and dignity with which they are invested. Shall we then conceive that our king hath so far transmitted the power of his sword to inferior magistrates, that he hath not reserved so much supreme power as to commit an offender to prison? In 10 Hen. 6. fol. 7, it appears, That a steward of a court leet may commit a man to prison; and shall not the king, from whom all inferior power is derived, have power to commit? We call him the Fountain of Justice; yet when those streams and rivulets which flow from that fountain are fresh and full, should we so far exhaust that fountain as to leave it dry? But they that will admit him so much power as to commit, do require an expressing of the cause! I demand then, whether they will have a general cause alledged, or a special? if a general, as they have instanced, for treason, felony, or a contempt? But, to leave fencing, and to speak plainly, as they intend it, if a loan of money should be required and refused, and thereupon a commitment ensue, and the cause is signified to be for a contempt; this being equally far from yielding the remedy sought for: why then, truly, in the next parliament, there would be required an expressing of the particular cause of commitment! And how unfit it would be for a king and council, in all cases, to express the particular cause, is easy to be judged; when there is no state or policy of government, whether it be monarchical, or of any other frame, which hath not some secrets of state, not communicable to every vulgar understanding. I will instance but one: if a king employ an ambassador to a foreign country or state, with instructions for his negotiation, and he pursues not his instructions; whereby dishonour or damage may ensue to the kingdom, is not this cause of commitment? And yet the particular instructions, and the manner of his miscarriage, is not fit to be declared in the warrant to the keeper, nor by him to be certified to the judges, where it is to be opened and debated in the presence of a great audience.—I therefore conclude, that for offences against the state, in cases of state government, the king or his council hath lawful power to punish by imprisonment, without shewing particular cause; where it may tend to the disclosing of the secrets of state government. It is well known to many, how much I have laboured in this law of the subjects liberty, very many years before I was in the king's service, and had no cause then to speak, but only examine; yet did I then maintain and publish the same opinion which now I have declared, concerning the king's supreme power in matters of state; and therefore I cannot justly be censured for speaking it at this present, only to merit of my master: but, if I may freely speak mine own understanding, I conceive it to be a question too high to be determined by any legal decision; for it must needs be a hard case of contention, when the conqueror must sit down with irreparable loss, as in this case: for, if the subject prevail for liberty, he loses the benefit of that state government, without which a monarchy may soon become an anarchy: or, if the state prevail, it gains absolute sovereignty, yet loses the subjects, not their subjection: for obedience we must yield, though nothing be left us but prayers and tears; but it loses the best part of them, which is their affections, whereby sovereignty is established, and the crown firmly fixed on his royal head. Between two such extremes there is no way to moderate, but to find a medium for accommodation of the difference, which is not for me to prescribe; but humbly to move your lordships, to whom I submit it."

Mr. Serjeant Ashley having ended his speech, the lord President said to the gentlemen of the commons house, 'That though, at this free conference, liberty was given by the lords to the king's counsel to speak what they thought fit for his majesty's service, yet Mr. Serjeant Ashley had no authority or direction from them to speak in that manner he hath now done.'

"The Lord Bishop of LINCOLN'S REPORT of the Fifth and last Part of the CONFERENCE.

"The Answers which the commons made to the arguments of Mr. Attorney and Mr. Serjeant Ashley, were to the following effect: viz. Mr. Littleton began and said, 'This was a great cause, and peradventure the greatest that ever was in Christendom: nothing like so proper to a private court, as to the court of parliament. They brought with them sufficient authority to justify what is said already: but if any new matter was offered, as he conceived some part of Mr. Serjeant's to be, he brought no more than ears to hear it, but had a tongue to answer to any point urged in this debate; and the proper subject of the discourse.'—And here he entered a Protestation, in the name of the commons, that their intent was not to call in question the power of the king, as well to commit as to hail, but to regulate it: and for the method of proceeding he said, That because they were opposed so suddenly, they would collect the heads of the opposition, according to law, and reply unto them. He said, they themselves were gentlemen of the law, the unworthiest of the house of commons, and not the most eminent of their calling; but yet they would clearly maintain the resolutions of their house. For that this controversy, which remains as yet in the nature of a disputation in this house, is already grown and improved as a full resolution in the other.—That Mr. Attorney began with Magna Charta, the subject of this disputation; that is, some general words in the same not rightly interpreted; and, in particular, what this lex terræ meant: that Mr. Attorney assented, 'That this statute concerned the king as well as the subject, yea, the king principally: but he doth not understand by this lex terræ, the same which the commons do, but a general law. You, said he, will have no man arrested but by writ original.' We never said so, replied Mr. Littleton; we never restrained the process of the law to writs original; but by the words 'Process of the Law,' we understand the whole proceedings of the law; and so take in the constables, and all those inferior ministers of justice, who, notwithstanding, are never used without a cause, as the constable executes his office when any affray is done, or feared to be done. So in Bagg's case, 11. Report, fol. 99. lex terræ is extended to the jurisdiction of courts; and so involves all proceedings in law. Nay, he said, the learned gentleman near him, sir Edw. Coke, extended the same to a wager in law, in 10th of his reports. This process doth include an original writ; and so goeth the authority of 42 Edw. 3. that 'due process of law' must be taken for original; as a part, not as the whole proceedings of the cause.—That Mr. Attorney's next objection was, that the king was not bound to express, because there may be matters of state, fear of revealing, &c. and added this expression, 'Must be done instantly, and must be true, unchangeable,' &c. Answer, that the commons do not require a particular, a general cause will serve the turn; as treason, suspicion of treason, felony, &c. there are many vitia sine nomine; like those in Aristotle; every species hath a proper name; and what inconvenience can there be to express one of those: Objection: If the cause be expressed, then presently, upon an Habeas Corpus, the party must be delivered or bailed; nay, indeed, delivered if the cause be of that nature. Respons. Commitments are of a double nature; superior, as from a king and council; and here the judges in discretion or respect are not presently to deliver, but to bail; inferior and lower, and here they are to deliver him.—That Mr. Attorney cited for his Answer, in the law, the statute of Westm. 1. chap. 15. which, said Mr. Littleton, 'non ponit, sed supponit,' makes no law, but declares a law; and all that is pertinent in the same, is the recital that a man is not replevable in the death of a man, matter of forest, command of the king, and command of the judges.—Here he denies replevable and bailable to be all one: they differed in nature and place: in nature, for replevin is by sureties, manucaptors; which they call plevins. Bailing is delivering to the hands of other men; which still hold him in prison if they please. Then they differ in place. Bailing is ever in a court of record, and to answer body for body. Replevin is in a sheriff's turn; for this difference he offered a Book-Case, 33 and 36 Edw. 3. placito 12. 13. but were they all one, yet this statute is restraining to the sheriffs alone; which he proved out of the first words thereof, 'And forasmuch as sheriffs and others which have taken and kept in prison, &c.' The word 'others' can never reach unto judges. For, gignissimum in suo genere, the best, by all course, is first named: and, therefore, if a man bring a writ of customs and services, and name rents and other things, the general words shall not include homage, which is a personal service, and of an higher nature, but shall extend to ordinary annual services. He quoted for this 31 Edw. 1. Title, Droit. fol. 67. So 13 Eliz. C. 10. and 'others having spiritual promotions,' coming after colleges, deans and chapters, shall not comprehend bishops, that are of a higher degree; quoted for the abp. of Canterbury's case, 2 Report, Fol. 46. besides that this word 'others,' is expounded by this statute in the conclusion, to comprehend under-sheriffs, constables, and bailiffs; such as kept men in prison: repleviable and not repleviable, are voces artis; a proper language to a sheriff: but that which receives no answer, is this: that the command of the justices, who derive their authority from the crown, is there equalled, as to this purpose, with the command of the king: and therefore by all reasonable construction, it must needs relate to officers that are subordinate to both: strange! are not the judges able to discharge their own commands? also, that this was meant of sheriffs, appears by the recital of 27 Ed. 1. C. 3. De finibus levatis; and so likewise by Fleta, L. 2. C. 52. in the articles of the charges in the sheriff's turn, he hath one, 'de replegiabilibus injuste detentis, & irreplegiabilibus dimissis.' And before, 'qui debent per plegios dimitti, qui non, declarat hoc statutum,' saith Fleta, speaking of this very statute: besides that they have an express book of it, 22 Hen. 6. Fol. 46. where Newton delivers this opinion, it cannot be intended that the sheriff did suffer him to go at large by mainprize, for where one is taken by the writ of the king, or commandment of the king, he is irrepleviable; but 'in such cases his friends may come to the justices for him,' &c. Objection: Stamford was a learned judge, but speaks nothing to this question, or against the declaration of the commons: Mr. Littleton bid Mr. Attorney read the sentence entire, and then he should find that the word sheriff must reach to all; or Stamford knew not what he said. Then he read it, and concluded that the word sheriff must either relate to all, or else he had not expressed his opinion. For Mr. Attorney's objection, 31 Hen. 6. Fol. 11. of Fortescue's opinion, that in a commitment made by the judges, we ought to presume the cause just. Answer; the commons do so presume of every one committed by the king, or council; but the question is, If the cause ought not to be expressed, that it may so appear? The place in the Register, 'De Homine replegiando,' he said, was answered before. To that record, 21 Ed. 1. Rot. 2. Renis's Case; where the sheriff of Warwick and Leicester was censured in parliament, for replevying a man committed by the earl of Warwick; when the king had given him a general command to shew no favour to any committed by that great peer. Answer, That the sheriff was justly punished; for the party was not repleviable by the sheriff, but bailable by the justices. In 22 Hen. 6. By the king's mouth, whereby none can be committed, he understands also the council, which are his mouth; and incorporated with the king; as you heard out of Stamford, 33 Hen. 6. fol. 28, 29. Poining's Case: he denied it was urged for them; but relied upon by Mr. Attorney for the contrary opinion. Yet Mr. Attorney confessed it proved nothing.

Vol. II.

The parties, in this case, committed per dominos de consilio, never desired, nor were ever denied bail or liberty; confessed by Mr. Attorney.—Out of 34 Eliz. containing the resolutions of all the judges, he read some part; and shewed judge Anderson's book under his own hand; insisted upon some words, that implied the cause ought to be expressed; and concluded, That it was neither for their tenet nor against it: for that assertion, that bailing was ex gratia curiæ, he granted it true in many cases; as where the cause doth appear, and the judges hold it fit to make some stay; but not where no cause is shewed. It may be grace, said he, yet it is the constant practice of the court; and herein he appealed to those precedents, offered unto your lordships out of the close rolls.—'The Report of 13 Jac. which is called Russell's Case; taken by a young student, is a gallinawfrey of 3 or 4 cases huddled together, and put as it were into an hotch-pot. Others interpret it for a sudden remittitur at the rising of the court. And you must note, also, That Russell was never returned to this court again. If a man deliver an opinion of a sudden, that is nothing to the case in hand. Judges, as students find in their year-books, have changed their opinions, and given better reasons for their contrary assertions. And that passage in parliament, 18 Jac. was at best but a sudden ejaculation, grounded upon 23 Hen. 6. which was nothing material. For that place, 16 Hen. 6. (Mounstre Defaits,) he answered, that of their authorities some are nearer the question, some farther off; yet all applicable. It is the dignity and honour of the king, 'Neminem a se tristem dimittere, to act these severities, not by himself, nor his own mouth, but by ministerial officers. Kings have sitten in their beds of justice as Ed. 6. in a trial of rape at the King's bench: yet did he not pronounce the sentence, but left that to his justices. It is the honour of the king to command none to prison, but leave it to his inferior ministers of justice. To that of 1st Hen. 7. fol. 4. Hussey's report of Markham, That he told Ed. 4. He could not command one to carry any to prison, he said it was a rule in law, that the king can do no wrong: but if he should command one to be arrested without cause, then he might be author of wrong; and, therefore, that is denied him.—He touched that place of Fortescue, 'Proprio ore nullus regum Angliæ,' &c. And here he desired to be rightly understood, for they of the house of commons do not exclude the commandment of the king; for they confess all that are imprisoned, are by his commandment; but it must be with a cause expressed: he said, that 36 Ed. 3. N. 9. is not in print. He saith, that he was in France; and that there he read many of their books: and he appeals to any that understands the language, if, 'ou arrest faire,' doth not signify to arrest, and not to delay by commandment of the king. Concerning Mr. Serj. Ashley, Mr. Littleton said, That for matter of law he was authorized to answer him: and for what that gentleman had objected, That the commons did think they had gained the cause, because the king's council had yielded the statutes to be in force: Alas! saith he, we do not labour for victory but for truth; convince our understandings by better reasons, and the cause shall be yours.—That Mr. Serjeant understood 'per legem terre,' many laws in England, Martial, Admiral, Ecclesiastical, and that 9 Ed. 3. called, Merchant-Law; to this Mr. Littleton replied, with some acrimony and a challenge to any man living, to shew, that lex terre should be spoken of any but the common law, in any law-book, statutes, or antient records: and so closed up his discourse."

"Sir Edward Coke spake next. 'As,' said he, 'the centre of the greatest circle is but a little prick, so the matter ever lies in a little room; but weighty businesses are spun out to a high length. This he said, was more weighty than difficult: his part was little; he would run over Mr. Attorney's Reasons briefly; and, said he, 'summa sequar vestigia rerum.' This tenet of theirs was expressed shortly and significantly: it was a wonder for him to hear the Liberty of the Subject should be thought incompatible with the regality of the king; for 'nihil tam proprium est imperii, quam legibus vivere,' saith Bracton. Nay further, 'Attribuit rex legi quod lex ei; dominium enim & imperium exercere, sine lege, non potest.'—First he, said, Mr. Attorney seemed to intimate, that, in this speciale mandatum, a cause should be conceived to blind the judges, when other matter was intended. He had heard indeed of that sentence, 'Qui nescit dissimulare, nescit regnare;' but he held it no good divinity; for David, in the 119th Psalm, desires 'a sound heart;' that is, a heart without dissimulation: ergo no king should cover to dissemble in his mandates. Then for that case of rebellion, in Ireland, he said, it was bona terra, mala gens. But, he said, O'Donnell's children lost nothing by the bargain; perissent nisi perisset; for they were better brought up here in the true religion, instead of popery. Besides, they have lost nothing, for their blood was tainted. It was charity to keep them. A strange proviso, that a thing happening once in 100 years should overthrow and mar so many statutes in continual use, against the old rule, 'Ad ea quæ frequentius accidunt, jura adaptantur!' And he never heard of such an objection.—In the next Reason, he said, Mr. Attorney came close to him, and said he was glad he had awaked him. That a king is trusted in greater things, as war, money, pardons, demisons; ergo, &c. Negatur, said he, for the liberty of the person is more than all these; it is maximum omnium humanorum bonorum, the very sovereign of all human blessings: yea, but the king may make money of brass, (saith Dionysius Halicarnassensis) or other base metal, as he heard queen Eliz. say, that her father, king Hen. 8. did hope to live so long, till he saw his face in brass; i. e. in brass money.

He said this was a main point: and that whatever the king's power was by the common law, yet was it qualified by acts of parl. And no man will deny but the king may limit himself by acts of parl.—He cited 9 Ed. 3. C. 4. 3 Hen. 5. C. 1. that the money must be of weight sterling; ergo, it must now be of the lay and fineness of sterling. In another statute, 'de dimissioe denariorum,' it is required the coin should be de legali metallo; ergo, not illegitimate. Why must the king have the mines of gold in my land, but for the use of his mint and coining? He cited also a law of King Edgar, C. 8. and of Canutus, C. 8. that no money should be current but of gold and silver. And for Pardons; they are also limited, in wilful murder; as he proved out of the 4 and 25 Ed. 3. And this he said by the way. Now his part was short; he had before expressed what books and warrants they had for their tenet. If he be a little more earnest than seems fitting, he craves your lordships pardon; it concerns him near. He takes occasion here to say (under reformation) his reasons were not answered, or not fully. He touched upon his former reason from imprisonment (see p. 266); that it is a badge of a villain to be imprisoned without cause; that this and 'taller luy haut & bas sont propria quarto modo' to villains: this he presents with all reverence; for we said he, speak for the future times only: our king is good, and the council most gracious; but 'non nobis nati sumus; it is for our posterity that we desire to provide, rather than for ourselves, that they be not in worse case than villains; for to be imprisoned without cause shewn, is to be imprisoned without cause at all. 'De non apparentibus & non existentibus, eadem est ratio.'—He agreed with Mr. Attorney in the enumeration of all the kinds of Habeas Corpus; and if they two were alone, he did not doubt but they should agree in all things. Only, he said, that for a freeman to be tenant at will for his liberty, he could never agree to it; it was a tenure that could not be found in all Littleton.—Then he also touched his former argument from universality; that the lords, the bishops, and all are jumbled and involved in this universality. Law doth privilege noblemen from arrests; this new doctrine, like the little god Terminus, yields to none. Nay, the judges themselves, when they should sit on the Bench, must be walking towards the Tower. Then he fell to a protestation, that he intended no prejudice at all to the king for matters of state; for the honourable must be maintained in honour, or this common-wealth could not subsist; but the question was, Whether they ought not to express the cause? He repeated again Plowden, 4 Eliz. pl. 236. The common law hath so admeasured the king's prerogative, as he cannot prejudice any man in his inheritance. He cited also 42 Ed. 3. c. 1. to prove, that all judgments given against Magna Charta are void.—Next he was pleased to say, He was not so well dealt with in one particular as he expected: For a student's report should not have been cited against him. He desired Mr. Attorney to remember, he had not veritatem ex cathedra, or infallibility of spirit; that was for the Pope. He said, he misgrounded his opinion upon 33 Hen. 6. which being nothing to the purpose, he is now assured his opinion is as little to the purpose.—Here he took notice of an objection, What, can you arrest none without a process or original writ? Why, the suspected fellow will run away? To which he answered, That process signifies the whole proceeding: and cited a rule in law, ‘Quando lex aliquod concedit, concedere videtur id, sine quo res ipsa esse non potest.’ The law gives process and indictment; ergo, gives all means conducing to the indictment. And this answers all Mr. Attorney’s cases of watchmen and constables.”—And here paused sir Ed. Coke.

“Mr. Noy offered Answers to the Inconveniences presented by Mr. Attorney. 1. he said, where it was objected, That it was inconvenient to express the cause, for fear of divulging arcana imperii; for hereby all may be discovered, and abundance of traitors never brought to justice: to this that learned man answered, That the judges, by intention of the law, are the king’s council, and the secret may safely be committed to all, or some of them who might advise whether they will bail him: and here is no danger to king or subject; for their oath will not permit them to reveal the secrets of the king; nor yet to detain the subject long, if, by law, he be bailable. 2. For that objection of the children of O’Donnell, he laid this for a ground, that the king can do no wrong: but, in cases of extreme necessity, we must yield sometimes for the preservation of the whole state: ‘ubi unius dampnum utilitate publica rependitur.’ He said there was no trusting children of traitors: no wrong done, if they did tabescere or marcescere in carcere. It is the same case of necessity, as when, to avoid the burning of a town, we are forced to pull down an honest man’s house; or to compel a man to dwell by the sea side for defence or fortification. Yet the king cannot do wrong: for ‘potentia juris est non injuria.’ ergo, the act the king doth, though to the wrong of another, is by law made no wrong: as if he commands one to be kept in prison, yet the king himself is not responsible for this wrong. He quoted a hook 42 Assiz. c. 5. —3. For the instance made of Westm. 1. he said, “There was a great difference between these three; 1. Mainprize; which is under a pain; 2. Bail; which is body for body, and no pain; for the party is ever in court to be declared against; 3. Replevin: which is as much as both; yet it is neither by surety nor by bail; for if replevied, then he is never in court. By this statute, saith Mr. Attorney, a man cannot be replevied; ergo, not bailed: non sequitur.” —4. Where it is said, That bail is ex gratia, he answered, ‘That if the prisoner comes by II. Corpus, then it is not ex gratia; yet the court may advise: but mark the words, ‘ad subjiciendum & recipiendum prout curia con- sideraverit.’ Now it is impossible that the judges do so, if no cause be expressed: for if they know not the cause, he may bring the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 4th II. Corpus, and so ad infinitum, till he find himself a perpetual prisoner: so that no cause expressed is worse for the man, than the greatest cause or villainy that can be imagined.”—And thus far proceeded that learned gentleman.

“Mr. Glanville said, ‘That, by favour of the commons, he had liberty to speak, if opportunity were offered: he will therefore apply his Answer to one particular of Mr. Attorney; who assigned to the king 4 great trusts; 1. Of War; 2. Coin; 3. Denizens; and, 4. Pardons. It is assented unto, that the king is trusted with all these 4 legal prerogatives: but the argument followeth not, That therefore he shall imprison without cause shewn. Again, the king is trusted in many prerogatives; ergo, saith Mr. Attorney, in this: ‘Non sequitur; quod non est sufficiens enumeratio partium.’ He said he would answer Mr. Attorney’s 4 great trusts with two rules; whereof the first should wipe off the 1st and 2nd; and the other, the 3rd and 4th. The 1st rule is this: there is no fear of trusting the king with any thing; but the fear of ill council against the subject: the king may easily there be trusted, where ill counsel doth equally engage both the king and subject; as it doth both in matters of war and coin. If he miscarry in the wars, it is not always ‘plectuntur achiivi.’ but he smarts equally with the people. If he abuse the coin, he loseth more than any of the people; ergo, he may safely be trusted with those flowers of the crown, wars and coinage. The 2nd rule he gave was this: when the king is trusted to confer grace, it is one thing; but when he is trusted to infer an injury, it is another matter. The former power cannot, by incounseling, be brought to prejudice another; the latter may. If the king pardon a guilty man, he punisheth not a good subject. If he denizen never so many strangers, it is but dammum sine injuria. We allow him a liberty to confer grace; but not, without cause, to infer punishments. And indeed he cannot do injury, for if he command to do a man wrong, the command is void, et actor fit author, and the actor becomes the wrong doer; and therefore the king may safely be trusted with war, coins, denizens, and pardons; but not with a power to imprison, without expression of cause or limitation of time; because, as the poet tells us, ‘libertas potior auro.’”—And thus far proceeded Mr. Glanville.

“Next Mr. Selden said, ‘Your lordships had heard all or most of the arguments brought, and answered fully: that there was hardly any thing objected that had the least colour. This he speaks not out of any overweening confidence as a counsellor; but desires your lordships to recall the several states and conditions of those you now hear. The king’s counsel speak for the king’s advantage, as glossers and parties; but the condition of the other gentlemen is this, that as they are members of the house of commons, and so bound to speak truth, and by a strict oath, to maintain the king's rights and pre-eminence: and therefore your lordships had good cause to put a value upon them, and what they say accordingly. Here he fell upon the resolution of the judges, in 34 Eliz.; which, he said, stuck with many, and was pressed by Mr. Attorney, as drawing on his side; and was also so pressed at the King's-bench. It is true, a fuller perspicuity might by care have been delivered therein; yet what is in it, he said, concludes for the Resolution of the commons. He instanced in one point: they may not be delivered by any court without trial at law; now, no trial where no cause: but in that case the matter is unintelligible. Quis & quare, are two questions. It is one question who, but another why they are committed. Then he said, there was indeed a sort of reply in that of 13 Jac. Russel's case: but that it was not Russel's case, but an omnigatherum of 3 or 4 cases full of mistakes. It mentions Harcourt, 40 Eliz. to have been bailed by command of the queen or council, and not a word thereof was true: it speaks of a letter filed in the crown office; but no letter was ever there filed: it cites the case of 34 and 36 Eliz. In one word, oddit, for there was nothing found in all this imaginary report. As for the Journals of the lower house, in 18 Jac. they are good records, so far as they are Journals of Orders and Resolutions: but as for things catched at by clerks, out of the mouths of men, they are declared long since to be of no authority; and the house doth generally conceive, that this particular is a mistake of the clerk.—And here ended Mr. Selden.

“Sir Ed. Coke put your lordships in mind, that you had the greatest cause in hand, that ever came into the Hall of Westminster, or, indeed, into any parliament. My lords, said he, your noble ancestors, whose places you hold, were parties to Magna Charta; so called for weight and substance, for, otherwise, many other statutes are greater in bulk; as Alexander, a little man, called magnus for his courage. And you, my lords, the bishops, said he, are commanded fulminate, to thunder out your anathemas against all infringers of Magna Charta. (Sententia lata super Chartas). And all the worthy judges that deserved their places, have ever had Magna Charta in great estimation. Now, as Justice hath a sword, so it hath a balance, ‘Ponderat hæc causas, percutit ille reos.’ Put together, my noble lords, in one balance 7 acts of parliament, records, precedents, reasons, all that we have spoken, and that of 18 Edw. 3. whereto I found no answer; and, in God's name, put into the other balance what Mr. Attorney hath said, his wit, learning, and great endowments of nature; and, if he be weightier, let him have it; if not, then conclude with us. You are involved in the same danger with us; and therefore we desire you, in the name of the commons of England, represented in us, that we might have cause to give God and the king thanks for your justice, in complying with us.”—And here rested sir E. Coke.

“Mr. Attorney summed up the argument. He observed, That many things and much matter had been uttered by the gentlemen of the commons: that to run over it all would spend much time; he would therefore observe some principal things wherein he and they did not differ. 1. ‘It was agreed the king may commit. 2. It was agreed the statutes were in force. But how this lex terræ is to be expounded, is the main apple of contention. If the cause be sufficiently expressed generally, then mandatum domini regis is a sufficient expression. To reduce this to the judicature of the judges, is to presuppose, not state the question. That the king hath an unlimited power, is not the state of the question: for then the king might imprison perpetually, be the cause right or wrong. Whether there be that necessity of expressing the cause, upon commitment or no, is a great part of the controversy. It was granted by one, that there may be a cause of an extraordinary nature, as O'Donneil's; but the rule of the house of commons is a new mathematical line, that admits of no latitude at all. To say subjects may be perpetually imprisoned, or without any cause, is no intention of the king. On the contrary side, to tie the king's command to the rule of his judges, and leave no latitude or breadth at all to turn him in, is a variation wherein your lordships wisdom must appear, to smooth and facilitate the roughness of the passage. He recommended all to your wisdoms to weigh (as sir Ed. Coke desired) in an equal balance, reasons, precedents, and resolutions of judges. This manifesto of the commons takes the matter upon great advantage, as resolved by that body; but this is our comfort that are counsel for the king, that you are all now counsellors of the king and kingdom. If all can be so ordered, as you shall not destroy the rights of the king, and shall favour the liberties of the subject as the cause requires, Mr. Attorney hath the utmost of his desires.”—And here he ended.

“Mr. Noye hereto rejoined, ‘The king might commit for a cause, not without: this was agreed on both sides. But Mr. Attorney said, He was not bound to express the cause. To which it was replied, That the judges are to judge between him and his people: ergo, no cause, no judgment; and therefore the king ought not to commit for any time; no, not an hour, without a cause; and that there was no cause.’”

Serjeant Ashley ordered into Custody, for Words spoken at the Conference on the Liberty of the Subject. Thus ended this long Report. When Mr. Serjeant Ashley had done speaking at the conference, in which he was of counsel for the crown, the lord president told the committee of the commons, That the serjeant had no authority, from their lordships, as to what he advanced in his argument, (see p. 315.) But the matter rested not here; for the doctrine advanced by this gentleman seemed so unconstitutional, that he was ordered into custody. And, on the 21st of April, a Petition of Mr. Serjeant Ashley was read to the lords, expressing his sorrow for the displeasure he had given their lordships, and humbly desiring to be admitted the recognition enjoined him. Hereupon he was ordered to be brought to the bar; where, kneeling, he made his submission, and humbly asked forgiveness for his fault, and was discharged out of custody.

Afterwards the lords went into a committee on the Liberty of the Subject. The house being resumed, it was agreed, as a general conclusion, 'That a commitment by the king, or his council, is good in point of authority; and, if the cause of commitment be just, then it is good for the matter. But these two concessions shall no way prejudice the king's authority, nor yet the Propositions of the house of commons.'

A further Conference relating to the Liberty of the Subject.] April 23. The lords agreed to have another conference with the other house on this subject; 'That they concur with the commons in their desire of all just liberties to the subject, but they do find it fit and necessary also to preserve the just prerogative of the king; and, to that end, that both houses might agree therein, this conference was desired.' This proposal was accepted by the commons, and a conference began which lasted two days. On the 25th, the abp. of Canterbury, from the committee of lords appointed for this business, reported, 'That they agreed on a further conference with the commons, in which they intended to offer some Propositions to them, which they had liberty to alter, add, or diminish as they thought proper: to shew them that the lords were neither out of love with their Propositions, nor in love with their own.'

The Lords Propositions thereupon.] The said Propositions were then read in these words, viz.

"I. That his maj. would be pleased graciously to declare, That the good old law called Magna Charta, and the six statutes, conceived to be declarations or explanations of that law, do still stand in force to all intents and purposes. II. That his maj. would be pleased graciously to declare, That, according to Magna Charta, and the statutes aforementioned, as also according to the most antient customs and laws of this land, every free subject of this realm hath a fundamental Property in his goods, and a fundamental Liberty of his person. III. That his maj. would be pleased graciously to declare, That it is his royal pleasure to ratify and confirm unto all and every his loyal and faithful subjects, all their several, antient, just liberties, privileges, and rights, in as ample and beneficial manner, to all intents and purposes, as their ancestors did enjoy the same under the best of his majesty's most noble progenitors. IV. That his maj. would be further pleased, graciously, to declare, for the good contentment of his loyal subjects, and for the securing them, from future fears, That, in all cases, within the cognizance of the common law concerning the Liberty of the Subject, his maj. would proceed according to the common law of this land, and according to the laws established in this kingdom, and in no other manner or wise. V. And as touching his majesty's royal prerogative, incident to his sovereignty, and intrusted him from God, 'ad communem totius populi salutem, et non ad destructionem,' That his maj. would resolve not to use or divert the same, to the prejudice of any of his loyal people in the Property of their goods, or Liberty of their persons: and in case, for the security of his majesty's royal person, the common safety of his people, or the peaceable government of his kingdom, his maj. shall find just cause, for reason of state, to imprison or restrain any man's person, his maj. would graciously declare, That, within a convenient time, he shall and will express the cause of the commitment or restraint, either general or special; and upon a cause so expressed, will leave him immediately to be tried according to the common justice of the kingdom."

The Abp. of Canterbury's Speech at the Conference.] The conference being agreed on, the abp. of Canterbury began it with this short speech.—

"Gentlemen of the house of commons; The service of the king and safety of the kingdom, do call upon my lords to give all convenient expedition, to dispatch some of the great and weighty businesses that are before us. For the better effecting whereof my lords have thought fit to let you know, that they do, in general, agree with you; and doubt not but you will agree with us, to the best of your powers, to maintain and support the fundamental laws of the kingdom, and the fundamental Liberties of the Subject: for the particulars, which may hereafter fall into debate, they have given me in charge to let you know, that what hath been presented by you unto their lordships, they have laid nothing of it by; they are not out of love with any thing that you have tendered unto them; they have voted nothing, neither are they in love with any thing proceeding from themselves: for that which we shall say and propose, is out of intendment to invite you to a mutual and free conference; that you with confidence may come to us, and we with confidence may speak with you; so that we may come to a conclusion of those things which we both unanimously desire. We have resolved of nothing, designed nothing, nor determined nothing; but desire to take you with us, praying help from you, as you have done from us. My lords have thought of some Propositions, which they have ordered to be read here, and then left with you in writing; that if it seem good to you, we may uniformly concur for the substance; and, if you differ, that you would be pleased to put out, add, alter, or diminish, as you shall think fit; that so we may come the better to this end, which we do both so desirously embrace."

The foregoing Propositions were then read to the commons, and afterwards the abp. told them, what had been before agreed on about adding or diminishing of them; to which, one of the committee,

Sir Dudley Diggs made this reply; "My Lords, It hath pleased God, many ways, to bless the knights, citizens, and burgesses, now assembled in parliament, with great comfort and strong hopes, that this will prove as happy a parliament as ever was in England. And in their consultations for the service of his maj. and the safety of this kingdom, these special comforts and strong hopes have risen from the continued good respect which your lordships so nobly, from time to time, have been pleased to shew unto them; particularly at this present, in your so honourable professions to agree with them in general, and desiring to maintain and support the fundamental laws and liberties of England. The commons have commanded me, in like sort, to assure your lordships they have been, are, and will be, as ready to propugn the just prerogative of his maj.; of which, in all their arguments, searches of records, and resolutions, they have been most careful, according to that which formerly was, and now again is, protested by them. Another noble argument of your honourable disposition towards them is expressed in this; That you are pleased to expect no present Answer from them, who are, as your lordships in your great wisdoms no doubt have considered, a great body that must advise upon all new propositions; and resolve upon them, before they can give answer, according to the ancient order of their house. But, it is manifest, in general (God be thanked for it) there is a great concurrence of affection to the same end in both houses; and such good harmony, that I intreat your lordships leave to borrow a comparison from nature, or natural philosophy: as two lutes, well strung and tuned, brought together; if one be played on, little straws or sticks will stir upon the other, though it lye still; so though we have no power to reply, yet these things said and propounded cannot but work in our hearts; and we will faithfully report these passages to our house, from whence, in due time, we hope your lordships shall receive a contentful answer."—However, the commons were not satisfied with these Propositions, which were conceived to choak the Petition of Right, then under consideration; but demurred upon them.

The King's Speech by the Lord Keeper, desiring the Parliament to rely on his Royal Word for their Liberties.] This great affair stood thus, between the two houses, till April 28th, when the king came to the house of lords, and sending for the Speaker, with the commons to attend him, he said, "My lords, I have given commandment to my lord-keeper to speak somewhat unto you in my name, trusting to his voice rather than my own." The Lord-Keeper, having first conferred with his majesty, said:

"My lords, and ye the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons; Ye cannot but remember the great and important affairs, concerning the safety both of state and religion, declared first from his majesty's own mouth, to be the causes of the assembling of this parliament: the sense whereof, as it doth daily increase with his maj. so it ought to do, and his maj. doubts not, but it doth, with you; since the danger increaseth every day, both by effluxion of time, and preparations of the enemy.—Yet his maj. doth well weigh, that this expence of time hath been occasioned by the Debate, which hath arisen in both houses, touching the Liberty of the Subject, in which, as his maj. takes in good part the purpose and intent of the houses, so clearly and frequently professed, that they would not diminish or blemish his just prerogative; so he presumes, that ye will all confess it a point of extraordinary grace and justice in him, to suffer it to rest so long in dispute without interruption. But now his maj. considering the length of time which it hath already taken, and fearing nothing so much as any future loss of that whereof every hour and minute is so precious; and foreseeing that the ordinary way of debate, though never so carefully husbanded, must, in regard of the forms of both houses, necessarily take more time than the affairs of Christendom can permit; his majesty, out of his great and princely care, hath thought of this expedient to shorten the business, by declaring the clearness of his own heart and intention: and therefore hath commanded me to let you know, That he holdeth the statute of Magna Charta, and the other six statutes insisted upon for the subjects' liberty, to be all in force; and assures you, that he will maintain all his subjects in the just freedom of their persons, and safety of their estates; and that he will govern according to the laws and statutes of this realm; and that you shall find as much security in his majesty's Royal Word and Promise, as in the strength of any law ye can make; so that hereafter ye shall never have cause to complain.—The conclusion is, That his maj. prayeth God, who hath hitherto blessed this kingdom, and put it into his heart to come to you this day, to make the success happy both to king and people; and therefore he desires, that no doubt or distrust may possess any man, but that ye will all proceed unanimously to his business."

Debate in the Commons on the King's Speech.] This being spoken, his maj. departed, and the lord-keeper ordered that a copy of it should be sent to the commons.—After the return of that body to their own house, Rushworth informs us that

Mr. Secretary Cooke made the following speech, in order to persuade them to comply with the king's desires: "His maj. puts us in mind of the great and important affairs of the state, and of his sense thereof, that by effluxion of time increaseth in him, and he doubts not but that it doth increase in us. Ye see his maj.'s moderation in the interpretation of all our actions; he saith, that he hopes we have the same sense he hath of the expence of time, that grew from the debates in both houses. We see how indulgent he is, that however the affairs of Christendom are great, yet he omits not this; nay, he takes in good part our proceedings and our declarations that we will not impeach the prerogative: also his maj. presumes that we will confess, that he hath used extraordinary grace, in that he hath endured dispute so long, yet he acknowledgeth it justice to stand as we have done.—However, out of a princely regard to the public, he is careful no more time be lost; and because he sees some extraordinary course must be taken to satisfy us, he observes, that in the form of the debate, such a length is required, as the urgent nature of his business will not possibly endure. It is to be presumed, that his government will be according to the laws: we cannot but remember what his father said, 'He is no king, but a tyrant, that governs not by law;' but this kingdom is to be governed by the common law, and his maj. assures us so much; the interpretation is left to the judges, and to his great council, and all is to be regulated by the common law: I mean not Magna Charta only, for that Magna Charta was part of the common law and the ancient law of this kingdom; all our difference is in the application of this law; and how this law, with difference, is derived into every court. I conceive there are two rules, the one of brass, that is rigid, and will not bend, and that is the law of the King's-bench; this law will not bend, and when it lights on subjects sitting, if it do not bend, it is unjust: and there comes in the law of chancery and equity; this is application of law in private men's causes, when it comes to meum & tuum. And thus the general government of cases, with relation to the common state of the kingdom, is from the council-board; and there they may vary from the law of the kingdom: suppose it be in time of dearth, any man's goods may in that time be forced, and be brought to the market: we saw the experience of it in coals in London, when the council-board caused them to be brought forth and sold. In a time of pestilence men may be restrained: if a schism be like to grow in a church, the state will inquire after the favourers of it: if there be fear of invasion, and it be encouraged by hope of a party amongst us, it is in the power of government to restrain men to their houses.—In the composition of these things, there is great difference: what differences have been between the courts of chancery and King's-bench? it is hard to put true difference between the king's prerogative and our liberties. His maj. saw expence of time would be prejudicial. It pleased God to move his maj. by a divine hand, to shew us a way to clear all our difficulties; let us attend to all the parts of it; there be 5 degrees; and there is more assurance than we could have by any law whatsoever, his maj. declares, that Magna Charta and the other statutes are in force. This is not the first time that the Liberty of the subject was infringed, or was in debate and confirmed. All times thought it safe, that when they came to a negative of power, it was hard to keep government and liberty together: yet his maj. stopped not there; but, according to the sense of these laws, that he will govern his subjects in their just liberties, he assures us our liberties are just; they are not of grace but of right; nay, he assures us he will govern us according to the laws of the realm, and that we shall find as much security in his maj.'s promise, as in any law we can make; and whatsoever law we shall make, it must come to his maj.'s allowance: and if his maj. find cause in his government, he need not put life to it: we daily see all laws are broken, and all laws will be broken for the public good; and the king may pardon all offenders; his maj. did see, that the best way to settle all at unity, is to express his own heart: the king's heart is the best guider of his own promise, his promise is bound with his own heart. What prince can express more care and wisdom?—Lastly, he saith, that hereafter ye shall never have the like cause to complain: may we not think the breach is made up? is not his maj. engaged in his royal word?—The conclusion is full of weight: and he prays God, that as God hath blessed this kingdom and put it into his heart to come amongst us, so to make this day successful. 'The wrath of a king is like the roaring of a lion,' and all laws, with his wrath, are of no effect: but 'The king's favour is like the dew upon the grass,' there all will prosper; and may God make him the instrument to unite all our hearts.—His maj. having thus discharged himself, he prays us to proceed to the business that so much concerns him. As his maj. hath now shewed himself the best of kings, let us acknowledge his maj.'s goodness, and return to that union which we all desired."

Sir Benj. Rudyard replied: "We are now upon a business of great importance, and the manner of handling it may be as great as even the business itself. Liberty is a precious thing, for every man may set his own price upon it, and he that doth not value it, deserves to be valued accordingly. For my own part, I am clear without scruple, that what we have resolved is according to law; and if any judge in England were of a contrary opinion, I am sure we should have heard of him before now. Out of all question the very point, the scope and drift of Magna Charta was, to reduce the regal to a legal power in matters of imprisonment, or else it had not been worth so much contending for. But there have been precedents brought to prove the practice and interpretation of the law. I confess I have heard many precedents of utility and respect, but none at all of truth or of law: certainly there is no court of justice in England, that will discharge a prisoner committed by the king, rege inconsulto, i. e.

* From a MS. in the Harleian Library. There is an incorrect copy of it in the Ephemeris: it is also in Rushworth, but some paragraphs are there omitted.

without acquainting the king; yet this good manners was never made or mentioned as a legal part of the delivery. It is objected, that the king ought to have a trust left and reposed in him; God forbid, but he should: and I hope it is impossible to take it from him; for it lies not in the wit of man to devise such a law, as shall be able to comprehend all particulars, all accidents, but that extraordinary cases must happen; which when they come, if they be conducted for the common good, there will be no law against them; yet must the law be general, for otherwise admissions and exceptions will fret and eat out the law to nothing. God himself hath constituted a general law of nature to govern the ordinary course of things; but he hath made no laws for miracles: yet there is this observation of them, that they are rather 'præter naturam' than 'contra naturam,' and always 'propter honores fines,' so likewise the king's prerogatives are rather beside the law than against it; and when they are directed to right ends for the public good, they are not only concurring laws, but even laws of singularity and excellency.— But to come nearer, let us consider where we are now, and what steps we have gone and gained: the king's learned counsel have acknowledged all the laws to be still in force, the judges have disallowed any judgment against these laws, the lords also have confessed that the laws are in full strength; they have further retained our resolutions entire and without prejudice: all this hitherto is for our advantage; but above all, his maj. himself, being publicly present, hath this day declared, by the mouth of my lord-keeper, before both houses, that Magna Charta, and the other six statutes are yet in force; that he will maintain his subjects in the liberty of their persons and the property of their goods, and that he will govern according to the laws of this kingdom. This is a solemn and binding satisfaction, expressing his gracious readiness to comply with his people in all their reasonable and just desires. The king is a good man, and it is no diminution to him to be called so; for whosoever is a good man shall be greater than a king that is not so. The king certainly is exceeding tender of his present honour and of his fame hereafter; he will think it hard to have a worse mark set upon him and his government, than any of his ancestors by extraordinary restraints: his maj. hath already intimated unto us, by a message, That he doth willingly give way to have the abuse of power reformed; by which I do verily believe, that he doth very well understand what a miserable power it is, which hath produced so much weakness to himself and to the kingdom; and it is our happiness that he is so forward to redress it. For my own part, I shall be very glad to see that good, old, decrepid law of Magna Charta, which hath been so long kept in and lain bed-ridden as it were; I should be glad, I say, to see it walk abroad again, with new vigour and lustre, attended by the other six statutes. For, questionless, it will be a general heartening to all.— I doubt not, but by a free conference with the lords, we shall happily fall upon a fair and fit accommodation, concerning the liberty of our persons, and property of our goods. I hope we shall have a bill to agree in the point against imprisonment for Loans, or privy-seals; but as for intrinsical power and reasons of state, they are matters in the clouds; where I desire we may leave them and not meddle in them at all; least, by way of admittance, we may lose somewhat of that which is our own already. Yet this, by the way, I will say of reason of state, that, in the latitude it is used, it hath eaten out almost not only all the laws, but all the religion of Christendom. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will only remember you of one precept, and that of the wisest man; 'Be not over-wise, be not over-just,' and he cited his reason; 'For why wilt thou be desolate.' Sir, if justice and wisdom may be stretched to desolation, let us thereby learn, that moderation is the virtue of virtues and the wisdom of wisdoms. Let it be our masterpiece so to carry our business, as we may keep parliaments on foot; for, as long as they are frequent, there will be no irregular power; which, though it cannot be broken at once, yet, in a short time, will be made weaker and moulder away. There can be no total and final loss of liberty but by loss of parliaments; for as long as they last, what we cannot get at one time, we may get at another. Let no man think that what I have said is the language of a private end. My aim is only for the good success of the whole; for, I thank God, my mind stands above any fortune that is to be gotten by base or unworthy means. No man is bound to be rich, or great; no, nor to be wise: but every man is bound to be honest. Out of my heart I have spoken.

Debate on a Bill for securing the Liberty of the Subject, &c.] Upon question, it was then ordered, That a select committee be named, of some lawyers, and others of the house, for the present framing of a bill, therein expressing the substance of the statutes of Magna Charta, and the other statutes, and of the Resolutions made in this house concerning the Liberty of the Subjects in their Persons and Estates, without one negative. Of the speeches on this occasion we meet with only the two following, which we copy from the 'Ephemeris Parliamentaria.'

Mr. Hackwell spoke as follows. "Mr. Speaker, I chose rather to discover my weakness by speaking, than to betray my conscience by silence: my opinion is, that we shall do well totally to omit our Resolutions out of this bill (see p. 280), and rely only upon a confirmation of the laws. The objections made against this opinion are two. 1. That we shall thereby recede from our own Resolutions. 2. That, by a bare confirmation of the old laws, without the inserting of our Resolutions by way of explanation, we shall be but in the same case as before. For the 1st, that though we desire only a confirmation, without adding of our resolutions, we do not thereby recede from our resolutions, I reason thus: our resolutions were drawn out of the sense of those laws, which are now desired to be confirmed; so that no question can be made by any of us, that have thus declared ourselves, but that our resolutions are virtually contained in those laws; if that be so, how can our acceptance of a confirmation of those laws be a departure from our resolutions? Nay, rather, I think the contrary is true: he who doubts, that by confirmation of these laws, our resolutions are not hereby confirmed, doubts whether we have justly deduced our resolutions out of those laws, and so calls our resolutions into question. The 2nd objection is, That, if we have nothing but a confirmation, we are in no better case than we were before these late violations of the law. This I deny, and do confidently affirm, That, although we have no more than a confirmation of those laws, which are recited in the bill that is now before us, we shall depart hence in far better case than we came; and that in divers respects. 1st, Some of the laws recited in this bill, and desired to be confirmed, are not printed laws; they are known to few professors of the law, and much less to others; and yet they are laws of a great consequence to the Liberty of the Subject, if not of greater, than any that are printed; as namely, 25 Ed. 3. N. 1. that Loans, against the will of the lender, are against reason and the freedom of the realm; and 36 Edw. 3. N. 9. by which Imprisonments by special commandment, without due process, are forbidden. These two are not printed. That excellent law, 'De Tallagio non concedendo,' in print, hath, in a public court, been said by a great counsellor to be but a charter and no law. The statute, 1 Rich. 3. against Benevolences, is, by some opinions in print, an absolute law. If we can get all these good laws, besides those six others, which are expositions of Magna Charta, in the point of the freedom of our persons, to be confirmed and put in one law to the easy view of all men, is not our case far better than when we came hither? 2ndly, Will not the occasion of the making of this law of confirmation, so notoriously known, be transmitted to all posterity? Certainly it will never be forgotten, that the occasion thereof was the imprisonment of those worthy gentlemen for not lending, and the resolution in the court of King's-bench of denying to bail them: and is not the occasion of making of a law a good rule to extend it? If so, then, by giving a confirmation upon this occasion we have bettered our case very much. 3dly, Have not the judges in the King's-bench, in open parliament, upon our complaint, disclaimed to have given any judgment in the point? Which, generally before, by the parliament was otherwise conceived; or now they say, it was but an award and no judgment (see p. 289): will such a notorious act, upon so important an occasion, and in so public a place, be quickly forgotten? Nay, will not be memory of it for ever remain upon record? Is not our case then much better than when we came hither. 4thly, Will not the Resolution of this house, and all our arguments and reasons against Imprisonment, without a cause expressed, (which, no doubt, by the course we have taken, will be transferred to posterity,) be a great means to stay any judge hereafter from declaring any judgment to the contrary; and especially if there be a likelihood of the meeting of a parliament? Is not our case in this very much amended? Lastly, have not we received Propositions from the lords, wherein, amongst other things, they declared, that they are not out of love with our proceedings? Is not this a great strengthening to it? But, after so long debate amongst them about it, they cannot take any just exception to it: and doth not this also much amend our case? From all these reasons, I conclude, That the second objection is also a weak objection. Now for reasons to move us to proceed in this course of accepting a confirmation; 1st, We have his majesty's gracious promise to yield to a confirmation of the old laws, from which we may rest most assured he will not depart: if we tender him, withal, our Resolutions to be enacted, we have no cause to doubt that we shall lose both the one and the other. And, 2ndly, we are no less assured of the lords joining with us; for, in their Propositions sent to us, they have delivered themselves to that purpose: this is then a secure way of getting somewhat of great advantage to us, as we have great hopes, and in a manner, assurance on this side; so, on the other side, we have great doubts and fears, that by offering our resolutions to be enacted, we shall lose all. For, 1st. We have had already experience of the lords, that they are not very forward to join with us in a declaration of our Resolutions to be law. If they stumble at a declaration, much more will they in yielding to make a law in the same point. And, have we not much more cause to doubt that his maj. will not yield unto it, seeing it toucheth him so near? Is it not the notice of his pleasure that hath wrought thus with the lords? If we should clog the bill with our Resolutions, and it should be rejected by the lords, or by the king, are not our resolutions much weakened by it? and are we not then in far worse case than before we made them? and if they resolve to reject our resolutions, will it not tend to a justification of all that hath been done against us in this great point of our liberty? Let us then, like wise men, conform our desires to our hopes and guide our hopes by probabilities; for other desires and other hopes are but vain. This is my poor opinion in this weighty business.

Mr. Mason spoke as follows: 'Mr. Speaker, I am of opinion, that in our proceedings in the matter now in debate, we should make use of the title of a statute, called 'circumspecte agatis;' for it concerns the liberty of our persons, without which we do not enjoy our lives. The question is, Whether in this bill, for the explanation of Magna Charta and the rest of the statutes, we shall provide that the cause of the commitment must be expressed upon the commitment, or upon the return of the Habeas Corpus? Before I speak to the question itself, I shall propose some observations, in my conceit, necessarily conducing to the debate of the matter. 1. That we ought to take care to provide for posterity, as our predecessors have done for us: and that this provident care cannot be expounded to be any distrust of the performance of his majesty's gracious declaration; this act providing for perpetuity, to which his highness's promise, unless it were by act of parliament, cannot extend. 2. That we having long debated, and solemnly resolved, our rights and privileges by virtue of these statutes; if we, now, shall reduce those Declarations and those Resolutions into one act, we must ever hereafter expect to be confined within the bounds of that act; it being made, at our suit, to be the limits of the prerogative in that respect; and it being an act of explanation, which shall receive no further explanation than itself contains. 3. That by this act we must provide a remedy against the persons which detain us in prison, for as to the commander there can be nothing certain.—Concerning the question itself: It hath been solemnly and clearly resolved by the house, That the commitment of a freeman, without expressing the cause, at the time of the commitment, is against the law. If, by this act of explanation, we shall provide only that the cause ought to be expressed upon the return of the H. Corpus; then, out of the words of the statute, it will necessarily be inferred, that before the return of the H. Corpus the cause need not to be expressed, because the statute hath appointed the time of the expression of the cause; and it will be construed, that if the makers of the statutes had intended that the cause should have been sooner shewn, they would have provided for it by the act; and then the act, which we term an act of explanation, would be an act for the abridging of Magna Charta and the rest of the statutes: Or, if this act do not make the commitment without expressing the cause to be lawful, yet it will clearly amount to a toleration of the commitment, without expressing the cause until the return of the H. Corpus; or be a general or perpetual dispensation, beginning with, and continuing as long as the law itself. And, in my understanding, the words of this intended law, (that no freeman ought to be committed without cause) can noways advantage us, or satisfy this objection; for, till the return of the H. Corpus, he that commits is judge of the cause, or at least hath a license, by this law, till that time to conceal the cause; and the gaoler is not subject to any action for the detaining of the prisoner upon such command; for if the prisoner demand the cause of his commitment of the gaoler, it will be a safe answer for him to say, that he detains the prisoner by warrant, and that it belongs not unto him to desire those who commit the prisoner to shew the cause, until he returns the H. Corpus; and if the prisoner be a suitor to know the cause from those that committed him, it will be a sufficient answer for them to say, they will express the cause at the return of the H. Corpus. In this case there will be a wrong, because the commitment is without cause expressed; and one that suffers that wrong, viz. the party imprisoned; and yet no such wrong-doer but may excuse, if not justify himself, by this law. In making of laws we must consider the Inconveniences which may ensue, and provide for the prevention of them, 'lex caveat de futuris.' I have taken into my thoughts some few Inconveniences, which I shall expose to your considerations; not imagining that these can happen in the time of our present gracious sovereign; but, in acts of parl. we must provide for the prevention of all inconveniences in future times. 1. If a man be in danger to be imprisoned in the beginning of a long vacation, for refusing to pay some small sum of money; and knows that, by this act, he can have no enlargement till the return of the H. Corpus in the term; and that the charge of his being in prison and of his enlargement by H. Corpus, will amount to more than the sum, he will part with money to prevent his imprisonment, or to redeem himself thence; because he cannot say any man doth him wrong, until the return of the H. Corpus; and the law resolves a man will pay a fine rather than be imprisoned; for the judgment which is given when one is fined, is ideo capiatur, and the highest execution for debt is a capias ad satisfaciendum, the law presuming any man will part with his money to gain his liberty: and if the prisoner procure an H. Corpus, and be brought into the King's-bench by virtue of it, yet the cause need not to be then expressed; the provision of this law being, that if no cause be then expressed, he shall be bailed: and no cause being shewn upon the return of the H. Corpus, yet it may be pretended, that, at the time of his commitment, there were strong presumptions of some great offence; but, upon farther examination, they are cleared: or it may be said, that the offence was of that nature, that the time of his imprisonment, before the return of the H. Corpus, was a sufficient punishment: so we may be frequently imprisoned in this manner, and never understand the cause; and have often such punishments, and have no means to justify ourselves: and for all these proceedings, this very law will be the justification or colour. 2. If by this act there be a toleration of imprisonment, without shewing cause until the return of the Habeas Corpus; yet it is possible to accompany that imprisonment with such circumstances of close restraint, and others which I forbear to express, as may make an imprisonment, for that short time, as great a punishment as a perpetual imprisonment in the ordinary manner. 3. The party may be imprisoned a long time before he shall come to be delivered by this law; the place of his imprisonment may be in the furthest parts of this kingdom; the judges always make the return of the H. Corpus answerable to the distance of the prison from Westminster; the gaoler may neglect the return of the first process, and then the party must procure an alias; the gaoler may be then in some other employment for the king, and excuse the not returning the body upon that process; and this may make the imprisonment for a year; and, in the end, no cause being returned, the party may be discharged: but in the mean time he shall have suffered imprisonment; he shall never know the cause; he shall have no remedy for it; nor be able to question any for injustice, which have not a justification, or excuse by this law. 4. The party may be imprisoned during his life, and yet there shall be no cause ever shewn. I will instance in this manner. A man may be committed to the farthest part of the kingdom westward; he obtains an H. Corpus; before the gaoler receives the H. Corpus, or before he returns it, the prisoner by warrant is removed from that prison to another, it may be the furthest northern part of the realm; the first gaoler returns the special matter, which will be sufficient to free himself; and in like manner the prisoner may be translated from one prison to another, and his whole life shall be a peregrination, or wayfaring from one gaol to another; yet he shall never know the cause, nor be able to complain of any who cannot defend their actions by this bill. 5. If the prisoner be brought into the court by H. Corpus, and no cause expressed, and thereupon he be enlarged, he may be presently committed again; and then his enlargement shall only make way for his commitment, and this may continue during his life, and he shall never know the cause; and this not remedied, but rather permitted by this act.—And there are also many things to be considered in this matter; the expence of the party in prison, his fees to the gaoler, his costs in obtaining and prosecuting an H. Corpus, and his charges in removing himself, attended with such as have the charge of his conduct; and all this the prisoner must sustain without any satisfaction, or knowing the cause.—The only reason given by those of the other opinion, (that it is requisite the king and council should have power to command the detainer of a man in prison for some time, without expressing the cause) is, because it is supposed that the manifestation of the cause, at first, may prevent the discovery of a treason. The reason is answered by the remedy proposed by this act; it being proposed, that it shall be provided by this bill, that upon our commitment, we may have instantly recourse to the chancery for an H. Corpus returnable in that court, which is always open; that presently upon the receipt thereof the writ must be returned, and the cause thereupon expressed. If then this remedy be really intended, the cause of commitment must presently appear; which contradicts the former reason of state.—And, in my opinion, we ought not only to take care that the subject should be delivered out of prison, but to prevent his imprisonment; the statute of Magna Charta, and the rest of the acts, providing that no man should be imprisoned but by the law of the land. And although the king or council, as it hath been objected, by might, may commit us without cause, notwithstanding any laws we can make; yet I am sure, without such an act of parl. such commitment can have no legal colour; and I would be loth we should make a law to endanger ourselves: for which reasons I conceive, that, there being so many ways to evade this act, we shall be in worse case by it than without it; since it provides no remedy to prevent our imprisonment without expressing the cause to be lawful; and administers excuses for continuing us in prison, as I have before declared; and thus, by providing for one particular, out of reason of state, which possibly may fall out in an age or two, we shall spring a leak which may sink all our liberties; and open a gap, through which Magna Charta; and the rest of the statutes, may issue out and vanish. I therefore conclude, that, in my poor understanding, (which I submit to better judgment) I had rather depend upon our former Resolutions, and the king's gracious declarations, than to pass an act in such manner as hath been proposed."

The King's Message to the Commons to rely on his Word.] May 1. Mr. Secretary Cooke delivered to the house the following Message from the king:—

"Mr. Speaker; I have a very short message to deliver from his maj. that shews both his royal care to be rightly understood of this house, and no less care to understand us in the best part; and to shew clearly it shall not be his fault if this be not a happy parliament, his majesty hath commanded me to desire this house clearly to let him know, Whether they will rest upon his Royal Word and Promise, made at several times, and especially by my lord-keeper's speech made in his own presence; which, if they do, he doth assure you; that it shall be really and royally performed."—Upon this there was a silence for some time. Then

Mr. Secretary Cooke proceeded thus:—
 "This silence invites me to a farther speech; and further to address myself. Now we see we must grow towards an issue: for my part, how confident I have been of the good issue of this parliament I have certified in this place and elsewhere; and I am still confident therein. I know his maj. is resolved to do as much as ever king did for his subjects: all this debate hath grown out of a sense of our sufferings, and a desire to make up again those breaches that have been made. Since this parliament begun, hath there been any discipline made like that which hath formerly been? When means were denied his maj. being a young king and newly come to the crown; which he found engaged in a war, what could we expect in such necessities? His maj. has called this parliament to make up the breach: his maj. assures us we shall not have the like cause to complain: he assures us the

that if they thought fit to secure themselves in their rights and liberties by way of bill, or otherwise, so it might be provided for with due respect to your honour, and the public good, you would be graciously pleased to give way unto it. Far from their intentions is it, any way, to inroach upon your sovereignty or prerogative; nor have they the least thought of straining or enlarging the former laws in any sort, by any new interpretations or additions; the bounds of their desires extend no further, than to some necessary explanation of that which is truly comprehended within the just sense and meaning of those laws, with some moderate provision for execution and performance, as in times past, upon like occasion, hath been used. The way how to accomplish these their just desires, is now under serious consideration with them; wherein they humbly assure your maj. they will neither lose time, nor seek any thing of your maj. but what they hope may be fit for dutiful and loyal subjects to ask, and for a gracious and just king to grant."

"His MAJESTY'S ANSWER as delivered by the LORD-KEEPER.

"Mr. Speaker, and you gentlemen of the house of commons, His maj. hath commanded me to tell you, that he expected an Answer by your actions, and not delay by your discourse. Ye acknowledge his trust and confidence in your proceedings; but his maj. sees not how you do requite him by your confidence in his words and actions: for what need explanations, if ye doubted not the performance of the true meaning? For explanations will hazard an in-breachment upon his prerogative. And it may well be said, What need a new law to confirm an old, if you repose confidence in the declaration his maj. made by me to both houses? And yourselves acknowledge, that your greatest trust and confidence must be in his majesty's grace and goodness, without which nothing ye can frame will be of safety or avail to you: Yet, to shew clearly the sincerity of his majesty's intentions, he is content that a bill be drawn for a confirmation of Magna Charta, and the other six statutes insisted upon, for the subjects liberties, if ye shall chuse that as the best way; but so as it may be without additions, paraphrases, or explanations. Thus, if you please, you may be secured from your needless fears, and this parliament may have the happy wished-for end: whereas, on the contrary, if ye seek to tie your king by new, and indeed impossible, bonds, you must be accountable to God and the country for the ill success of this meeting. His maj. hath given his Royal Word, that he shall have no cause to complain hereafter: less than which hath been enough to reconcile great princes, and therefore ought much more to prevail between a king and his subjects. Lastly, I am commanded to tell you that his majesty's pleasure is, That without further replies or messages, or other unnecessary delays, ye do what ye think fit to do speedily, remembering the last message that Secretary Cooke brought you, in point of time; his majesty always intending to perform his promise to his people."

Debate on the King's Answer.] Notwithstanding this intimation of his maj.'s good pleasure for a bill, yet, the very next day, Mr. Secretary Cooke again pressed the house to rely upon the king's word, saying, 'That he had rather follow others than himself begin this business: loss of time hath been the greatest complaint; the matter fallen now into consideration, is what way to take, whether to rely on his maj.'s word or on a bill. If we will consider the advantage we have in taking his maj.'s word, it will be of the largest extent, and we shall chuse that which hath most assurance; an act of parliament is by the consent of the king and parliament, but this assurance by word is, that he will govern us by the laws: the king promises that, and also that they shall be executed, that we shall enjoy as much freedom as ever: this contains many laws, and a great of all good laws; nay, it contains a confirmation of those very laws; an assurance, which binds the king farther than the law can: first, it binds his affection, which is the greatest bond between king and subject; and that binds his judgment also, nay his honour, and that not at home only, but abroad. The royal word of a king is the ground of all treaty; nay, it binds his conscience. This confirmation between both houses is in nature of a vow: for myself, I think it is the greatest advantage to rely on his maj.'s word.' He further added, 'This debate was fitter to be done before the house, and not before the committee; and that it was a new course to go into a committee of the whole house.'—Whereunto it was replied by sir John Elliot, 'That the proceeding in a committee is more honourable and advantageous both to the king and the house; for that way leads most to truth, as it is a more open way where every man may add his reasons, and make answer upon the hearing of other men's reasons and arguments.'—This being the general sense, the house was turned into a committee, to take into consideration what was delivered to the king by the Speaker, and what was delivered to them by the lord-keeper, and all other Messages; and the committee was not to be bound by any former order. The key was brought up, and were to go out without leave, first asked. In the debate of this business at the committee, some were for letting the bill pass, but sir Edw. Coke's reasons prevailed to the contrary. 'Was it ever known,' said he, 'that general words were a sufficient satisfaction to particular grievances? was ever a verbal declaration of the king, verbum regis, when grievances be, the parliament is to redress them. Did ever parliament rely on Messages? They put up petitions of their grievances and the king ever answered them. The king's answer is very gracious; but what is the law of the reality, that is the question, and not the difference in his Majesty: but the king must speak by record, and in particulars; and not in general. Did you ever know the king's message come into a bill of subsidies? all succeeding kings will say, ye must trust me as well as ye did my predecessors, and trust my messages; but messages of love never came into a parliament. Let us put up a PETITION OF RIGHT: not that I distrust the king, but that I cannot take his trust but in a parliamentary way."

Proceedings of the Lords on Matters of Privilege.] May 6. The lords had been, for some time, taken up with reading bills and other affairs of less moment, till this day, when the earl Marshal made a Report from their Committee of Privileges, &c. concerning four things which had been referred by the house to their consideration. Which were these."

"1. Whether a peer of parliament is to answer upon Oath, or upon his Honour only? 2. Whether a peer, having done his homage once to the king at his coronation, may be compelled to pay, in respect of homage, for lands held of the king in capite? 3. Whether the goods of a privileged person, taken in execution, (during the privilege of parliament,) ought not to be delivered to the party by the said privilege? 4. To consider of a bill for the release of such privileged persons, as should be arrested after the parliament ended, but during the privilege thereof."—His lordship further reported "That the committee finding the first of these references to be general, they considered only of the Answers of peers as defendants in courts. And that they had perused all the precedents, which were, either for their Answers in this kind, upon Protestation of Honour only, or upon common Oath; and, after mature consideration, they all agreed, una voce, that the nobility of this kingdom, and lords of the upper house of parliament, were, by antient right, to answer in all courts, as defendants, upon Protestation of Honour only, and not upon common Oath.—As touching the 2nd, in respect of Homage, the attorney-general desired to have time to consider thereof, and they agreed that he should be heard in the house as soon as he was ready.—To the 3rd, they had all agreed, that the goods of a privileged person, taken in execution, ought to be redelivered, and freed, as well as the person. Concerning the bill for setting at liberty such privileged persons, as should be arrested after the parliament ended, and during the privilege thereof, they had heard it read, and appointed Mr. Attorney to draw a new bill."—This Report being ended, the house went into a committee for a free debate upon the first question. And, after many arguments, they came at last to a general agreement; "That the nobility of this kingdom, as lords of the upper house of parliament, are, of antient right, to answer in all courts as defendants, upon Protestation of Honour only, and not upon the common Oath."

* See the proceedings of the lords, relating to this point of privilege. Vol. 1. p. 1202.

May 8. The Attorney-General delivered in his Opinion to the house concerning Homage; "That he had advised with the barons of the exchequer therein, and had perused records, and finds that homage once done, for lands held of the king, the party is to do it no more. But, as touching homage done at the coronation, he found no allowance, for these 300 years past, for discharge of homage afterwards. He found also, that homage once done, was to be certified out of chancery into the exchequer; and he found no certificate of any coronation homage: that he sent to the heralds for a copy of the said homage, wherein he noted, That there were no words for any land held of the king, as required by law." This Opinion was referred back to the committee of privileges; and the abp. of Canterbury acquainting the house, That he had a true copy of the Homage done by the lords at the coronation, he was desired to shew it the next day: when the abp. produced his copy of Homage made by the peers, which, for the archbishops and bishops kneeling, was in these words. "I, A, will be faithful, and bear true faith and troth unto you, my sovereign lord, and to your heirs, kings of England; and I shall do, and truly acknowledge the service of the lands which I claim to hold of you, as in right of the church, as God shall help me." Then kissed the king's left cheek.—For the lay-lords, thus: "I, N, become your liegeman of life and limb, and of all earthly worship; and faith and troth I shall bear unto you, to live and die against all manner of folks. So God help me." This homage being ended, they put forth their hands and touch the crown by way of ceremony, as promising to support it with all their power.—After this, the question about Respect of Homage was again referred to the committee for privileges, &c.

A Conference concerning the Petition of Right.] May 8. The lords received a Message from the commons, importing, That they desired a further Conference with their lordships in pursuance of former conferences had of late. It seems the commons had now finished their Petition of Right, and a clause relating to martial law was added to it. The lords agreed to the proposal; and a conference, by committees of both houses, was held in the Painted Chamber at two that afternoon.—The report of this Conference was made the next day, by the lord keeper, who said, "That sir Edw. Coke, after making an excuse for his long stay, expressed the great joy of the commons for the good concurrence between the lords and them in this business. That, at the first conference, the commons shewed unto their lordships what evidences they had of their liberties. Since which time, they received five Propositions, penned by a grave and reverend prelate, from their lordships; and it is fit they should give them a reason, why they have heard no sooner from them concerning the same. And said, That after some debate among themselves, concerning those Propositions, they received from his majesty five gracious Messages. I. That he would maintain all his subjects in their just Liberties of their Persons and Goods. II. That he would govern according to the laws and statutes of this kingdom. III. That we should find as much security in his majesty's word as in any law or statute whatsoever. IV. That we should enjoy all our freedoms, in as just and ample manner as our ancestors did in the time of any of his best predecessors. V. That for the securing of this, the house of commons might, if they thought fit, proceed by bill or otherwise.—Then he said, That these Messages of the king's being categorical, and their lordships Propositions but hypothetical, the commons had laid the latter aside; 'quia in potentia majoris cessat potestas minoris; & hæc sunt causæ,' said the knight, why their lordships heard from the commons no sooner about their Propositions.—He next said, That according to the king's Message, the commons had thought good to proceed in a parliamentary way; 'periculosum enim est, proborum virorum exemplo non comprobare;' and, if their lordships would please to concur herein, they doubt not but the success will be happy. That they had drawn up a Petition of Right, according to antient precedents, and left space for the lords to join therein with them. And he affirmed, That this manner of proceeding, by petition, was the antient way, until the unhappy divisions between the houses of York and Lancaster.—After this Report was ended, the said Petition was twice read, and referred to a select committee of lords, who were to meet that afternoon, and inform themselves of precedents of this kind.

May 9. The lord-keeper reported, That the committee had considered of the change of some words in the Petition, without alteration of the substance thereof. Then the said changes were read, which are not necessary here to insert, since they will fall apter, when they come to be debated, between the two houses, afterwards.

The King's Letter to the Lords touching the Liberty of the Subject.] May 12. The duke of Buckingham delivered a Letter from the King, sealed with the royal signet, which was read first by the lord-keeper, and then by the clerk; viz.

"To our Right Trusty and Right Well-beloved, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal of the Higher House of Parliament.

"Charles R.—We, being desirous of nothing more than the advancement of the good and prosperity of our people, have given leave to free debate upon the highest points of our prerogative royal; which, in the time of our predecessors, kings and queens of this realm, were ever restrained as matters that they would not have disputed; and in other things we have been willing so far to descend to the desires of our good subjects, as might fully satisfy all moderate minds, and free them from all just fears and jealousies; which, those Messages we have hitherto sent to the commons house will well demonstrate unto the world; yet we find it still insisted upon, that, in no case whatsoever, should it ever so nearly concern matters of state or government, neither we, nor our privy-council, have power to commit any man without the cause shewed; whereas it often happens, that, should the cause be shewed, the service itself would thereby be destroyed and defeated; and the cause alledged must be such as may be determined by our judges of our courts of Westminster, in a legal and ordinary way of justice; whereas the causes may be such, as those judges have not capacity of judicature, nor rules of law to direct and guide their judgment in cases of so transcendent a nature; which happening so often, the very intermitting of that constant rule of government, practised for so many ages, within this kingdom, would soon dissolve the foundation and frame of our monarchy.—Wherefore, as to our commons we made fair Propositions, which might equally preserve the just Liberty of the Subject: so, my lords, we have thought good to let you know, that, without the overthrow of our sovereignty, we cannot suffer this power to be impeached: notwithstanding, to clear our conscience and just intentions, this we publish, That it is not in our heart, nor will we ever extend our royal power, lent unto us from God, beyond the just rule of moderation, in any thing which shall be contrary to our laws and customs; wherein the safety of our people shall be our only aim. And we do hereby declare our royal pleasure and resolution to be, which, God willing, we shall ever constantly continue and maintain. That neither we, nor our privy-council, shall or will, at any time hereafter, commit or command to prison, or otherwise restrain the person of any man for not lending money unto us; nor for any other cause which in our conscience doth not concern the public good and safety of us and our people: we will not be drawn to pretend any cause, wherein our judgment and conscience are not satisfied; which base thought we hope no man can imagine, will fall into our royal breast: and, in all cases of this nature, which shall hereafter happen, we shall, upon the humble petition of the party, or address of our judges unto us, readily and really express the true cause of their commitment or restraint; so soon as with convenience and safety the same is fit to be disclosed and expressed: and that in all causes criminal, of ordinary jurisdiction, our judges shall proceed to the deliverance or bailment of the prisoner, according to the known and ordinary rules of the laws of this land, and according to the statutes of Magna Charta, and those other statutes insisted upon; which we do take knowledge stand in full force, and which we intend not to abrogate or weaken against the true intention thereof. This we have thought fit to signify, the rather to shorten any long debate upon this great question; the reason of the year being so far advanced, and our great occasions of state not lending many more days for longer continuance of this session of parliament. Given under our signet, at our palace at Westminster, 12th of May, in the 4th year of our reign."

Conference on the King's Letter.] The king's letter being read, a Message was immediately sent to the commons, for a present Conference between both houses in the Painted Chamber. Which being agreed to, and the lords returned from it, the lord-keeper declared, 'That, according to the direction of the house, he informed the commons of their lordships desire to continue a good correspondence with them. That they desired this conference to shew their proceedings on the Petition of Right, presented to their lordships by the commons; which, after much debate in the house, was referred to a select committee to be considered, 'Whether any thing, not altering the sense of the Petition, might be varied therein, so as it might be fit to receive from his majesty a gracious Answer.' That the committee returned to the house these Alterations, which are now offered to the commons, only narratively; and that they left the great point, in the said petition, concerning imprisonment without a cause expressed, to be debated by their house; but, before the lords had entered into it, they received a gracious letter from the king, this morning, which offers satisfaction to both houses therein; and before their lordships would proceed any further, they thought fit to acquaint them therewith.' That this being spoken, he, the lord-keeper, delivered unto the commons the said Petition of Right, and the Alterations thereof in a paper; and that he, likewise, did deliver unto them a copy of the King's Letter and read the original thereof, they acknowledging the said copy to agree therewith verbatim; and then he desired the commons to expedite this business, unto which they answered, 'They came with ears only.'

The report being ended, the lords referred the further consideration of this business to the afternoon. At which time, it was put to the question and agreed, That touching the point of imprisonment, in the Petition, that house should move the commons, That the Petition may be reduced, in the aforesaid point, within the compass of what his majesty had offered by his gracious letter.

The same day when the King's Letter was communicated to the commons, they laid it aside: and sir Tho. Wentworth said, 'It was a letter of grace; but the people will only like of that which is done in a parliamentary way; besides, the debate of it would spend much time, neither was it directed to the house of commons; and the Petition of Right would clear all mistakes: for, said he, some give it out, as if the house went about to pinch the king's prerogative.'

keeper reported the effect thereof to the lords, viz. "1st, His lordship repented the heads of what he spake, according to the directions of the house, this morning in the entrance of the said conference, on this manner: That at the last meeting, the lords made to the commons a Proposition of some Alterations to be made in the Petition; and doubt not but the commons have considered of them, and come prepared to confer. That, at the same time, the commons were made acquainted with his majesty's Letter; and had a copy delivered them to consider of it, as the lords also promised to do. That the lords have done accordingly; and taken into their thoughts, 1. The Propositions or tenets of the commons concerning the Subject's Liberty. 2. That part of the petition which concerns it. And, lastly, his majesty's Letter. That, upon all these, they have not proceeded to any resolution exclusive or conclusive; not to exclude the right or liberty of the subject, nor the Propositions or Petition concerning the same; nor yet to exclude the prerogative, or right of the king; nor to conclude themselves from more mature resolutions. But upon consideration of the Letter, they find gracious intentions in the king, and divers royal and good offers touching the liberty and freedom of the people. That they have considered of the present affairs; that our costs are increased by enemies, and likely to be more so, if there be no present preparations against them. That the state of the reformed religion abroad is miserable and distressed, and expects and depends on the success of this parliament; and therefore their lordships wish such a course to be taken as may best beget a right understanding between the king and his people. And, therefore, they have thought fit that the commons be moved, that the Petition concerning that point, for this time and session, be reduced into such a form as may be most agreeable to that which by this letter we may expect to have from the king."

The lord-keeper further reported, "That he having said thus much, sir Edw. Coke, one of the commons house, answered and expressed their great joy, for that the lords held so good correspondence with them, which they would endeavour to continue; and proceeded to speak to their Petition; and of their lordships proposed Alterations and Amendments; and of the king's Letter; and said, That they had voted their Petition, and expected reasons from the lords for those Alterations: and that the letter is no answer in a parliamentary way, to their petition, &c. That it will take up much time fully to consider thereof; and he offered to satisfy their lordships in the other part of the petition."

The lord-keeper also further reported, "That sir D. Diggs, one of the commons, desired to have leave to resort to their house, and they would return suddenly to the conference again."—After some small stay, the commons returned to the conference: and the lords having notice thereof, the house was adjourned during plea-

surc. Their lordships being returned, the house was resumed: and the lord-keeper reported, That the commons said, that they had related unto their house what their lordships had said concerning the king's Letter; and that their house had resolved not to enter into consideration thereof, for that it is no parliamentary course. And they explained what sir Ed. Coke had said, touching their voting of the Petition, viz. That they had voted it at a committee, not in their house, for otherwise they could not alter any part thereof."

This report ended, the lords considered what should be more said unto the commons; who attended in the Painted Chamber. And, after some small debate, it was agreed to return to the said conference, and the lord-keeper to let them know, that it is not the intent of the lords to rest only upon the king's Letter, for an answer to the petition; but to move the commons to frame the Petition, so as it may be best accommodated for the king's answer; and then to proceed in a parliamentary way. Their desire is not to change the substance of the Petition, (by those Alterations propounded,) but only to alter some phrases, which may, haply, be displeasing unto his majesty. And that the lords desire, that the point of Imprisonment may have precedence, before they debate any other point of the Petition.—Then the house was again adjourned during pleasure: and the lords went to the conference. Being returned, and the house resumed, the lord-keeper reported the Commons Answer to be, "That they conceive the lords propounded not unto them, that they should wholly rely on the king's Letter, for an answer to the Petition: yet, notwithstanding, they cannot proceed upon the said letter, it not being a parliamentary way. That if the lords will be pleased to propound the Alterations of the Petition, they will confer thereon."—This report ended, the lords began to debate amongst themselves an accommodation, touching the point of Imprisonment. And the house being put into a committee, and having agreed not to be concluded by any proposition of accommodation, it was resumed again. Agreed upon the question, That to-morrow morning the house shall proceed to the accommodation of this point in the Petition.

The Lords Addition to the Petition of Right.] The lords debated this matter for some days longer, till, on the 17th, their committee brought in an Addition to the Petition of Right; which was read in these words:

"We humbly present this Petition to your majesty, not only with a care of preserving our own liberties, but with due regard to leave entire that sovereign power, wherewith your maj. is trusted, for the protection, safety, and happiness of your people."

The said committee declared, That this was offered to be considered of, for an accommodation only, not that it should conclude their lordships in their opinion, nor exclude the Petition of Right presented to them by the commons.

Conference thereupon.] The lords agreed to these proposals of their committee, and resolved to have another conference with the commons, both about this Addition, and some other Alterations, formerly proposed, to their Petition of Right: in which, inter alia, the lord keeper was to tell them, That the lords did desire a good correspondence with them; which would tend to a happy success of this parliament. This conference was held in the afternoon of that day; when the lord keeper opened it in the manner following: "That whereas at the last conference there were some things propounded that came from their lordships, out of a desire the Petition might have the easier passage with his maj. not intending to violate, in any manner, the substance of the Petition; but it was then thought, that there was another part of the Petition of as great importance and weight: the lords, since the time of that conference, have employed themselves wholly to reduce the petition to such a frame and order, that they may give both to you and them hope of acceptance. And, after many deliberations, and much advice taken, my lords have resolved to represent unto you something which they have thought upon, yet not as a thing conclusive to them or you; and, according to their desires (having mentioned it in the beginning) have held it fit to conclude of nothing, till that you be made acquainted with it; and that there may be a mature advisement between you and them, so that there may be the happier conclusion in all this business. This being the determination of the lords, that nothing that is now offered unto you should be conclusive; yet they thought it convenient to present it unto you. This Alteration, (yet not alteration but addition) which they shall propound unto you, to be advised and conferred upon, which is no breach of the frame; they think meet, if it shall stand with your liking, to be put in the conclusion of the Petition, which I shall now read unto you. "We humbly present this Petition to your maj. not only with a care of preserving our own liberties, but with due regard to leave entire that sovereign power wherewith your maj. is trusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of your people." This is the thing the lords do present unto you as the subject of this conference, concerning the adding of this in the conclusion of the Petition: and as they know this is new, and that you cannot presently give an answer to it, therefore they desire that you do, with some speed, consider of it; and their lordships will be ready this afternoon."

Debate in the Commons on the Lords Addition.] The commons being returned to their house, and the Addition being debated, it produced several speeches. For the following we are obliged to Mr. Rushworth:

Mr. Afford said, 'Let us look into the Records, and see what they are; what is 'Sovereign power?' Bodin saith, That it is free from any conditions. By this we shall acknowledge a regal as well as a legal power. Let us give that to the king the law gives him, and no more.'

Mr. Pym. 'I am not able to speak to this question, for I know not what it is. All our Petition is for the laws of England, and this power seems to be another distinct power from the power of the law. I know how to add sovereign to the king's person, but not to his power: and we cannot 'leave' to him a 'sovereign power;' for we never were possessed of it.'

Mr. Hackwell. 'We cannot admit of these words with safety: they are applicable to all the parts of our Petition: it is in the nature of a saving, and by it we shall imply as if we had encroached on his prerogative. All the laws we cite are without a saving; and yet now, after the violation of them, must we add a saving? I have seen divers petitions where the subject claimed a right, yet there I never saw a saving of this nature.'

Sir Edw. Coke. 'This is magnum in parvo. This is propounded to be a conclusion of our Petition. It is a matter of great weight; and, to speak plainly, it will overthrow all our Petition; it trenches to all parts of it; it flies at Loans, at the Oath, at Imprisonment, and at Billeting of Soldiers: this turns all about again. Look into all the petitions of former times; they never petitioned wherein there was a saving of the king's sovereignty. I know that prerogative is part of the law, but 'Sovereign Power' is no parliamentary word. In my opinion it weakens Magna Charta, and all the statutes; for they are absolute, without any saving of 'Sovereign Power'; and should we now add it, we shall weaken the foundation of law, and then the building must needs fall. Take we heed what we yield unto: Magna Charta is such a fellow, that he will have no 'Sovereign.' I wonder this 'Sovereign' was not in Magna Charta, or in the confirmations of it. If we grant this, by implication we give a 'Sovereign Power' above all laws. Power in law is taken for a power with force: the sheriff shall take the power of the county; what it means here, God only knows. It is repugnant to our Petition: that is, a Petition of Right, grounded on acts of parliament. Our predecessors could never endure a salvo jure suo, no more than the kings of old could endure for the church, 'Salvo honore Dei & ecclesie.' We must not admit of it, and to qualify it is impossible. Let us hold our privileges according to the law: that power that is above this, is not fit for the king and people to have it disputed further. I had rather, for my part, have the prerogative acted, and I myself to lye under it, than to have it disputed.'

Sir Tho. Wentworth. 'If we do admit of this Addition, we shall leave the subject worse than we found him; and we shall have little thanks for our labour when we come home. Let us leave all power to his maj. to punish malefactors; but these laws are not acquainted with 'Sovereign Power.' We desire no new thing, nor do we offer to trench on his majesty's prerogative: we may not recede from this Petition, either in part or in whole.'

Mr. Noye. 'To add a saving is not safe: doubtful words may beget ill construction; and the words are not only doubtful words, but words unknown to us, and never used in any act or petition before.'

Mr. Seiden. 'Let us not go too hastily to the question: if there be any objections, let any propound them, and let others answer them as they think good. If it hath no reference to our Petition, what doth it here? I am sure all others will say it hath reference, and so must we. It doth far exceed all examples of former times. What man can shew me the like? I have made that search that fully satisfies me, and I find not another besides 28 Eliz. We have a great many petitions and bills of parliament in all ages, in all which we are sure no such thing is added. That clause of 28 Edw. 1. was not in the Petition, but in the king's answer.—In Magna Charta there were no such clauses. The Articles themselves are to be seen in a library at Lambeth, in a book of that time, upon which the law was made. There was none in the articles in king John's time, for these I have seen; and there is no saving. In the statutes of 'Confirmatio Chartarum' is a saving, les autients aids; that is, pur fille maryer, & pur faire fitz chevalier, and for ransom. And in the articles of king John in the original charter (which I can shew) there those three aids were named therein, and they were all known. In the 25th Edw. 3. there is a Petition against Loans, there is no saving; and so in others. As for that Addition in the 28th of Edw. 1. do but observe the petitions after Magna Charta; as 5 Edw. 3. they put up a petition; whereas, in Magna Charta, it is contained, that none be imprisoned, but by due process of law; those words are not in Magna Charta, and yet there is no saving; and so in the 28th of Edw. 3. and 36, 37, and 42 of Edw. 3. all which pass by petition, and yet there is no saving in them: and there are in them other words that are not in Magna Charta, and yet no saving.—As to what we declared, by the mouth of our speaker, this parliament, that it was far from our heart to encroach on the king's prerogative; we then spake of the king's prerogative by itself, and we are bound to say so: but speaking of our own rights, shall we say, We are not to be imprisoned saving, but by the king's 'Sovereign Power'? Say, my lands (without any title) be seized in the king's hands, and I bring a Petition of Right; and I go to the king and say, 'I do by no means seek your maj.'s right and title;' and, after that, I bring a petition, or monstrance de droit, setting forth my own right and title; and, withal, set down a saving, that I leave entire his maj.'s right; it would be improper. It was objected, that in the 28th of Edw. 1. in the end of 'Articuli super Chartas,' which was a confirmation of Magna Charta, and Charta de Foresta, in the end there was a clause, 'Savant le droit & signiory;’ the words are in that roll that is now extant, but the original roll is not extant.—In the 25th of Edw. 3. there was a confirmation of the charter. In the 27th of Edw. 3. the parliament was called, and much stir there was about the charter, and renewing the articles; but then little was done. In 28 Edw. 1. the commons, by petition or bill, did obtain the Liberties and Articles at the end of the parliament; they were extracted out of the roll, and proclaimed abroad. The Addition was added in the proclamation; but in the bill there was no ‘saving;’ yet afterwards it was put in; and to prove this, though it is true there is no parliament-roll of that year; yet we have histories of that time: in the library at Oxford, there is a Journal of a Parliament of that very year which mentions so much; as also in the public library at Cambridge, there is in a MS. that belonged to an abbey: it was of the same year, 28 Edw. 1. and it mentions the parliament and the petitions, and ‘Articulos quos petierunt sic confirmavit rex, ut in fine adderet, salvo jure coronæ regis,’ and they came in by proclamation. But, in London, when the people heard of this clause being added in the end, they fell into execration for that addition; and the great earls, that went away satisfied from the parliament, hearing of this, went to the king; and afterwards it was cleared at the next parliament. Now, there is no parliament-roll of this, of that time; only in the end of Edw. 3. there is one roll that recites it.’

Reasons given by the Lords for their Addition.] The lords afterwards at a conference, tendered reasons to fortify their Addition; which were briefly reported to the commons that the lord-keeper said, “That the lords were all agreed to defend and maintain the just liberties of the subject, and of the crown; and that the word ‘leave’ was debated amongst them; and thereby they meant to give the king nothing now, but what was his before: as to the words ‘Sovereign Power,’ as he is a king he is a sovereign, and must have power; and he said the words were easier than the word prerogative. As for the word ‘that’ it is a relative and referred to that power, that is for the safety of the people; and this, said he, can never grieve any man; being thus published, it is not sovereign power in general. But now, in consultation of our reasons, he said, Magna Charta was not with a ‘saving;’ but, said he, you pursue not the words of Magna Charta, and therefore it needs an Addition.—As for the 28th Edw. 1. he said there was a ‘saving;’ and an ill exposition cannot be made of this; and both houses have agreed it in substance already; that the commons did it in a speech delivered by the Speaker; and that we say we have not a thought to inroach on the king’s sovereignty; and why may we not add it in our Petition?”

Mr. Mason’s Speech in Answer thereto.] Upon this report, Mr. Mason spake as follows:—

* From Sir John Napier’s MS.

‘Mr. Speaker; In our Petition of Right, we mention the laws and statutes; by which it appeareth, that no tax, loan, or the like, ought to be levied by the king, but by common assent in parliament: that no freeman ought to be imprisoned but by the law of the land: and that no freeman ought to be compelled to suffer soldiers in his house. In the Petition we have expressed the breach of these laws, and desire we may not suffer the like; all which we pray as our rights and liberties. The lords have proposed an Addition to this petition, in these words: whether we shall consent to this Addition, is the subject of this day’s discourse: and because my lord keeper, at the conference, declared their lordships had taken the words of the Petition apart, I shall do so too. The word ‘leave,’ in a petition, is of the same nature as ‘saving’ in a grant or act of parliament: when a man grants but part of a thing he saves the rest; when he petitions to be restored but to part, he leaveth the rest: then, in the end of our Petition, the word ‘leave’ will imply, that something is to be left of that, or at least with a reference to what we desire. The word ‘entire’ is very considerable. A conqueror is bound by no law, but hath power dare leges; his will is a law: and although William the Conqueror, at first, to make his way to the crown the more easy, and the possession of it more sure, claimed it by title; yet afterwards, when there were no powerful pretenders to the crown, the title of conquest (to introduce that absolute power of a conqueror) was claimed; and the statute of Magna Charta, and other statutes mentioned in our Petition, do principally limit that power. I hope it is as lawful for me to cite a Jesuit, as it is for Dr. Manwaring to falsify him; Suarez, in his first book, de Legibus, c. 17. delivereth his opinion in these words, ‘Amplitudo & restrictio potestatis regum, circa ea quæ per se mala vel injusta non sunt, pendent ex arbitrio hominum, & ex ambigua conventionne, vel pacto, inter reges & regnum.’ And he farther expresseth his opinion, that the king of Spain was so absolute a monarch, that he might impose tribute without consent of his people, until about 200 years since; when it was concluded between him and his people, that without consent of his people by proxies, he should not impose any tribute. And Suarez’s opinion is, that, by that agreement, the kings of Spain are bound to impose no tribute without consent.—And this agreement that author calls a restraining of that ‘Sovereign Power.’ The statutes then, mentioned in our Petition, restraining that absolute power of the conqueror; if we recite those statutes, and say, we ‘leave entire that Sovereign power,’ we do take away that restraint, which is the virtue and strength of those statutes; and do hereby set at liberty this claim of sovereign power of a conqueror, which then will be limited and restrained by no laws: this may be the danger of the word ‘entire.’—The next word delivered by the lords as observable, is the particle 'that.' And it was said, that all sovereign power is not mentioned to be left, but only that with which the king is trusted for our protection, safety, and happiness: but I conceive this to be an exception of all sovereign power; for all sovereign power in a king, is for the protection, safety, and happiness of his people. If all sovereign power be excepted, you may easily judge the consequence; all loans and taxes being imposed by colour of that 'sovereign power.' The next word is 'trusted,' which is very ambiguous; whether it be meant trusted by God only, as a conqueror; or by the people also, as a king; who is to govern also according to laws, ex pacto. In this point, I will not presume to adventure further; only I like it not, by reason of the doubtful exposition it admits.—I have likewise considered the proposition itself, and therein I have fallen upon a dilemma, that this Addition shall be construed, either to refer unto the Petition, or not: if it do not refer unto the Petition, it is merely useless and unnecessary, and unbefitting the judgment of this grave and great assembly to add to a Petition of this weight. If it hath reference unto it, then it destroys not only the virtue and strength of our Petition of Right, but our rights themselves: for the Addition, being referred to each part of the Petition, will necessarily receive this construction, viz. That none ought to be compelled to make any gift, loan, or such like charge, without common consent, or act of parliament; unless it be by the 'sovereign power,' with which the king is trusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of his people: that none ought to be compelled to sojourn or billet soldiers, unless by the same sovereign power: and so of the rest of the rights contained in the Petition. Then the most favourable construction will be, that the king hath an ordinary prerogative, and by that he cannot impose taxes or imprison; that is, he cannot impose taxes at his will, or employ them as he pleaseth: but that he hath an extraordinary and transcendent 'sovereign power,' for the protection and happiness of his people; and for such purpose he may impose taxes, or billet soldiers as he pleaseth. And we may assure ourselves, that hereafter all loans, taxes, or billeting of soldiers, will be said to be for the protection, safety, and happiness of the people: certainly, hereafter, it will be conceived, that an house of parliament would not have made an unnecessary Addition to this Petition of Right; and therefore it will be resolved, 'That the Addition hath relation to the Petition, which will have such operation as I have formerly declared: and I the rather fear it, because the late loan and billeting have been declared to have been by 'sovereign power,' for the good of ourselves; and if it be doubtful whether this proposition hath reference to the Petition or not, I know who are to judge whether loans or imprisonments hereafter be by that sovereign power, or not?—A parliament, which is a body made up of several wits, and may be dissolved by one commission, cannot be certain to decide this question: we cannot resolve that. If the judges shall determine the words of the king's Letter read in this house, reciting, 'That the cause of commitment may be such, that the judges themselves have not capacity of judicature, nor rules of law to direct and guide their judgments in cases of that transcendent nature; why then the judges, and the judgments, may be easily conjectured. It hath been confessed by the king's counsel, that the statute of Magna Charta binds the king, then it binds his sovereign power; and here is an Addition of saving the king's 'sovereign power.'—I shall next endeavour to give some answer to the Reasons given by the lords. The 1st is, That it is the intention of both houses, to maintain the just liberty of the subject, and not to diminish the just power of the king; and therefore the expression of that intention in this Petition, cannot prejudice us. To which I answer: 1st, That our intention was, and is, as we then professed; and no man can assign any particular in which we have done to the contrary; neither have we any way transgressed in that kind in this Petition: and if we make this Addition to the Petition, it would give some intimation, that we have given cause or colour of offence therein; which we deny, and which if any man conceive so, let him assign the particular, that we may give answer thereunto. By our Petition, we only desire our particular rights and liberties to be confirmed to us; and, therefore, it is not proper for us to mention therein 'sovereign power' in general, it being altogether impertinent to the matter of the Petition. There is a great difference between the words of the Addition, and the words proposed therein as the reason thereof, viz. between just power, which may be conceived to be limited by laws; and 'sovereign power,' which is supposed to be transcendent and boundless. The 2nd reason, delivered by their lordships, was, That the king is sovereign; that as he is sovereign, he must have power, and that this 'sovereign power' is to be left: for my part, I would so leave it, as not to mention it; but if it should be expressed to be left in this Petition, as it is proposed, it must admit something to be left in the king of what we pray, or at least admit some sovereign power in his maj. in these privileges which we claim to be our right; which would frustrate our Petition and destroy our right, as I have formerly shewed. The 3rd reason given for this Addition, was, That in the statute of 'Articuli super Chartas,' there is a saving of the seigniority of the crown. To which I give this answer, That Magna Charta was confirmed above 30 times; and a general saving was in none of these acts of confirmation, but in this only; and I see no cause we should follow one ill, and not 30 good precedents; and the rather, because that saving produced ill effects, that are well known, That saving was by act of parliament; the conclusion of which act is, that in all those cases the king did well, and all those that were at the making of that ordinance did intend, that the right and seignior of the crown should be saved: by which it appears, that the saving was not in the Petition of the commons, but added by the king; for in the Petition, the king's will is not expressed. In that act the king did grant, and part with, to his people, divers rights belonging to his prerogative; as, in the first chapter, he granted, that the people might chuse 3 men, which might have power to hear and determine complaints made against those that offended in any point of Magna Charta; though they were the king's officers, and to fine and ransom them: and in the ch. 8, 12, and 19 of that statute, the king parted with other prerogatives; and therefore there might be some reason of the adding of, 'that sovereign power,' by the king's council: but, in this Petition, we desire nothing of the king's prerogative; but pray the enjoying of our proper and undoubted rights and privileges; therefore there is no cause to add any words, which may imply a saving of that which concerns not the matter in the Petition.—The 4th reason given by their lordships, was, that by the mouth of our Speaker, we have, in this parliament, declared, That it was far from our intention, to inroach upon his majesty's prerogative; and that therefore it could not prejudice us, to mention the same resolution in an Addition to this Petition. To which I answer, That that declaration was a general answer to a message from his majesty to us, by which his maj. expressed, that he would not have his prerogative straitened by any new explanation of Magna Charta, or the rest of the statutes: and therefore that expression of our Speaker's was then proper to make it have reference to this Petition; there being nothing therein contained but particular rights of the subject, and nothing at all concerning his majesty's prerogative. 2ndly, That answer was to give his maj. satisfaction of all our proceedings in general; and no man can assign any particular in which we have broken it; and this petition justifies itself, that in it we have not offended against our protestation: and I know no reason why this declaration should not be added to all the laws we shall agree on, in this parliament, as well as to this Petition. The last reason given was, That we have varied in our Petition from the words of Magna Charta; and therefore it was very necessary, that a saving should be added to the Petition. I answer, That in the statutes of 5, 25, and 28 Edw. 3. and other statutes, by which Magna Charta is confirmed, the words of the statutes of explanation differ from the words of Magna Charta itself; the words of some of the statutes of explanation being, That no man ought to be apprehended, unless by indictment, or due process of law; and the other statutes differing from the words of Magna Charta in many particulars; and yet there is no saving in those statutes, much less should there be any in a

Petition of Right. These are the answers I have conceived to the reasons of their lordships; and the exposition, I apprehend, which must be made of the proposed words, is added to our Petition. And therefore I conclude, that, in my opinion, we may not consent to this Addition, which yet I submit to better judgments.

Further Proceedings, relating to the Petition of Right.] May 19. The commons received a Message from the king, importing, only, "That it was not his intent to interrupt them with his messages; but being obliged to go to Portsmouth, in a day or two, on pressing occasions, he desired they would proceed with the business they were upon with all expedition."—This message was no sooner delivered, than they agreed to send to the lords, to have a free and a mutual conference with them, about the exceptions their lordships had taken to their Petition, as well as the Additional Clause, proposed at the last conference; to which they said, they were urged by a gracious message from his majesty. The conference was held the same day, and the several Alterations again debated between them: but no conclusion was made of the business, for that time; nor at another conference, the next day, on the same affair.

May 21. The lord-keeper delivered a Message to the lords, from the king, to this purpose: "That his maj. had commanded him to let them know, that he discerned all his affairs depended upon the resolution of that house touching the Petition: that his wants were great and pressing, and himself to go shortly to Portsmouth; therefore, he desired, before his going, to see his business in forwardness: and expected, that they would resolve, that day whether they would join with the commons in the Petition or not." The lords, having taken this Message into consideration, returned for Answer, by the duke of Buckingham, That they had sent to the commons to require an immediate conference about it; and their answer was, that they could not, conveniently, meet till the next morning. But it was not till May 23d that this conference was held; and in the afternoon of that day, the lord-keeper was ordered to report one part of the conference, and the lord-president the other.

The Lord Keeper's Report of Mr. Glanville's Speech against the Addition made by the Lords.]

The Lord-keeper began and reported his part of the Conference, delivered in a speech from Mr. Glanville, to this purpose:

"My Lords, I am commanded by the commons, to deliver unto your lordships their reasons, why they cannot admit of the Addition tendered unto them by your lordships. But for an introduction to the business, please you to remember, that a Petition of Right was shewed to your lordships, wherein we desired you would join with us; a Petition, my lords, fitting for these times, grounded upon law, and seeking no more than the subjects just liberty. This Petition consisteth of 4 parts: 1. loans, aids, and taxes: 2. imprisonment of men's persons: 3. billeting of soldiers: 4. commissions issued for martial law, and put in execution upon several persons.—Grossing under the burthen of these, we desire remedy, and wish your lordships would join with us; which you having taken into consideration, we must confess have dealt nobly and freely with us, not to conclude any thing till you hear our just reasons; for which we thank your lordships, and hope you will value those reasons, which we shall now offer. The work of this day will make a happy issue, if your lordships please to relinquish this, as we formerly, upon conference with your lordships, have done some other things: for the proposition, my lords, we have debated it thoroughly in our house: and I am commanded to deliver unto you the reasons, why we cannot insert this clause. Neither your lordships nor we desire to extend liberty beyond its due bounds, nor to incroach upon the king's prerogative.—The 1st reason I am to lay down is touching Sovereign Power, which I beseech you not to accept as mine own, being but a weak member of that strong body; but, as the reasons of the whole house, upon great and grave considerations. First, the words Sovereign Power, hath either reference, or no reference to the petition: if no reference, then superfluous; if a reference, dangerous, and operative upon the petition: and we think your lordships purpose is not to offer unto us any thing that may be vain, or to the hindrance of any thing wherein you have already joined with us. The Petition declareth the right of the subject, which yet may be broken by the words sovereign power, and so the virtue of the petition taken away: the end of the petition is not to enlarge the bounds of law; but, their liberties being infringed, to reduce them to their antient bounds: and shall we, by admitting of these words, 'sovereign power,' instead of curing the wound, launch it, and cut in deeper?—The next point is the word 'intrusted'; a word of large latitude and deep sense. We know there is a trust vested in the king, but regulated by law; we acknowledge that in penal statutes, the king may grant another power to dispense with the law: but Magna Charta, inflicting no penalty, leaveth no trust; but claimeth its own right; therefore the word 'intrusted,' would confound this distinction.—Our next reason is, We think it absolutely repugnant to any course of parliament, to put a saving to the petition: in former times, the course of petitioning the king was this. The lords and the speaker, either by words or writing, preferred their petition to the king; this then was called the bill of the commons, which being received by the king, part he rejected and put out, other part he ratified; and as it came from him it was drawn into a law, but this course, in the 2 Hen. 5. was found prejudicial to the subject; and since in such cases, they have petitioned by petition of right, as we now do, who came to declare what we demand of the king; for if we should tell him what we should not demand, we should then not proceed in a parliamentary course. Now, for that which is alledged by your lordships, 'De Articulis super Chartas,' That, my lords, is not like this, which is a saving upon particulars, but this petition, consisting of particulars, would be destroyed by a general saving. The saving 'de Articulis super Chartas,' are of 3 aids; for ransoming the king's person, for knighting the king's eldest son, and once for marrying the king's eldest daughter. These, by the form of the petition, shew, that they came in upon the king's answer, and not upon the petition; first then followed the savings, which under favour we think are no reasons to make us accept of this saving, being not pertinent to the petition.—The statute 28 Edw. I. (which confirmed Magna Charta with a saving) was, in fact, set aside by the 34th of the same king, which restored Magna Charta to its first purity: and if the said statute of the 28th did lay some blemish upon it, shall we now make the subject in worse case, by laying more weight upon it? God forbid!—In the next place, you reason thus, 'That this which you wish we would admit of, is no more than what we formerly did profess by our Speaker, when we sent the king word, we had no purpose at all to trench upon his prerogatives: It is true, my lords, we did so; but this was not annexed to any petition, for in that manner, we should never have done it.—And here I am commanded (with your favours) to deliver unto your lordships what a learned member of our house, (Mr. Selden) delivered there, touching this point. 'The king, saith he, and the subject have two liberties, two manners joining one upon another: the king is informed the subject hath intruded upon him, but upon trial it appeareth not to be so; were it fitting think you, that the subject should give security, that he should not incroach or intrude on that manner, because the king had been informed he did so? I think you will be of another mind. Wherefore I am commanded (seeing we cannot admit of this Addition) to desire your lordships, to join with us in the Petition; which being granted, and the hearts of the king and people knit together, I doubt not but his maj. will be safe at home, and feared abroad.'

The Lord President's Report of Sir H. Martin's Speech on the same Occasion.] The lord-keeper having finished his report of Mr. Glanville's speech at the conference, the lord-president* proceeded to the other, which was spoken by sir Henry Martyn; as follows:—'My Lords; The work of this day, wherein the house of commons have employed the gentleman who spake last and myself, is to reply to the answer, which it hath pleased the lord-keeper to make to those reasons, which the commons offered to your lordships consideration, in justification of their refusal, to admit, into their Petition, the Addition recommended by your lordships; which reasons of the commons, since they have not given such satisfaction to your lordships as they desired, and well hoped, (as by the lord-keeper's answer appeared) it is thought fit, for their better order and method in replying, to divide the lord-keeper's answer into two parts; a legal, and a rational. The reply to the legal part your lordships have now heard. Myself come instructed to reply to the rational; which, also, consisteth of two branches: the 1st deduced from the whole context of the Additional Clause; the 2nd enforced out of some special words of it.—In the former are these reasons why the same deserved to be accepted of by the commons. 1st, because it would afford good satisfaction to the king. 2. To your lordships. 3. It was agreeable to what the commons themselves had often protested, and expressed by the mouth of their speaker.—To avoid all misunderstandings and misconceit herein, which, otherwise, might be taken against the commons, upon the refusal of the propounded Addition, I will first state the question, and open the true point of difference between your lordships and us; which, indeed, is not, as is conceived, touching the truth of this Addition, in the quality of a proposition: for, so considered, we, as well as as heartily as your lordships possibly can do, agree it to be a true proposition.—Wherefore, give me leave to rehearse that oath, which every member of the house of commons hath taken this session; and doth take every parliament, viz. 'I, A B, do utterly testify and declare in my conscience, that the king's highness is the supreme governor of this realm in all causes, &c. and to my power will assist and defend all jurisdictions, privileges, pre-eminences, and authorities, granted or belonging to the king's highness, or united or annexed to the imperial crown of this realm.' So that your lordships need not to borrow, from our protestations, any exhortations to us to entertain a writing in assistance of the king's sovereign power: since we stand obliged, by the most sacred bond of a solemn oath, to assist and defend the same, if cause or occasion be required. The only question and difference is this; whether this Addition shall be received into our Petition, as any part thereof; which to do, your lordships reasons have not persuaded us; because, so to admit it were to overthrow the very fabric and substance of our Petition of Right. For these words being added to our Petition, viz. 'We humbly present this Petition to your majesty, &c. with due regard to leave entire 'that' sovereign power,' &c. do imply manifestly an exception to our Petition. And such an exception, as being of the nature of the thing whereunto it is an exception, 'Exceptio est de Regula,' must, of necessity destroy the Petition; so far as to the case excepted. 'Exceptio firmat regulam in casibus non exceptis, in casibus exceptis destruit regulam.' Then this Addition, being joined to our Petition, must produce this construction, viz. 'We pray that no freeman may be compelled, by imprisonment, to lend money to his maj. without his assent in parliament; nor be imprisoned without a cause expressed; nor receive soldiers into his house against his will; nor undergo a commission of martial law for life and member, in time of peace, &c. except his maj. be pleased to require our monies, and imprison us without cause shewed, and put soldiers into our houses, and execute martial law upon us in time of peace, by virtue of his Sovereign Power.' By which construction, (necessarily following, upon this Addition) our right in the premises is annihilated and the effect of the Petition frustrated.—Neither may it seem strange, that this Addition, which of itself, in quality of a proposition, we confess to be most certain and true, being added to our Petition, (which is also true) should overthrow the very frame and fabrique of it: seeing the logicians take knowledge of such a fallacy, called by them 'Fallacia bene divisivis, ad male conjuncta.'—The 2nd part of my lord-keeper's rational part, was inferred out of the last words of this Addition; by which his lordship said, that they did not 'leave entire' all 'Sovereign Power,' but that only, where-with his maj. is trusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of his people. As if he would infer, 'that Sovereign Power wherewith,' &c. in this place to be Terminus diminuentum, and in that consideration would induce us to accept it; but under his lordships correction, we cannot so interpret it: for, 1st, We are assured that there is no such distinction of Sovereign Power; as if some Sovereign Power was for the happiness and protection of the people, and some otherwise; for all Sovereign Power, whether trusted by God or by man, is only 'ad salutem & pro bono populi regi commissa.' 2ndly, In this place, these words 'Sovereign Power,' wherewith his maj. is trusted for the happiness of the people, are so far from barring the force of 'Termini diminuentis,' that is, of words of qualification or limitation; that in truth they are terms of important advantage against our Petition; obliging us, whensoever his maj.'s Sovereign Power shall be exercised upon us, in all or any the particulars mentioned in this Petition, to submit thereunto without further inquiry; as taking it pro confesso, that it conduced to our protection, safety, and happiness.—Having spoken this, in reply to the rational part, whereby the lord-keeper laboured to persuade us to entertain this Addition, the commons, desirous to gain your lordships absolute conjunction with them in presenting this Petition, hath commanded me to deliver you these reasons or arguments also.—The first drawn from the persons of the petitioners, the house of commons; whose moderate and temperate carriage in this parliament, be it spoken without vanity and yet in much modesty, may seem to deserve your lordships assistance in this Petition, ex congruo & cou-

digno: especially if you would be pleased to consider the discontents, pressures and grievances, under which themselves in great number, and the parts for which they serve, lamentably groaned, when they first arrived here: and which was daily represented unto them by frequent packets and advertisements, out of their several counties: all which, notwithstanding, have not been able to prevail upon our moderation; or to cause our passion to over-rule our discretions: and the same yet continueth in our hearts, in our hands, and in our tongues; as appeareth in the mould of this Petition; wherein we crave no more, but that we may be better treated hereafter.—My lords, we are not ignorant in what language our predecessors were wont to express themselves upon much lighter provocation; and in what stile they framed their Petitions: no less amends could serve their turn than severe commissions to enquire upon the violators of their liberties; banishments of some, executions of other offenders; more liberties, new oaths of magistrates, judges and officers; with many other provisions, written in blood: yet, from us, there hath been heard no angry words in this Petition; no man's person is named: we say no more than what a worm trodden upon would say, (if he could speak,) 'I pray tread upon me no more! The second argument, to move your lordships not to urge this Addition to be inserted into our Petition, is taken 'à circumstantia temporis,' 'There is a time for all things' saith the wise man; 'and a word spoken in due season is like apples of gold in pictures of silver;' and unseasonably spoken as ungracious.—This time is not seasonable for the said Addition; because Sovereign Power nunc male auditur. Some late influences have made the aspect thereof not to seem so comfortable and gracious, as heretofore it hath been; and as it may, by God's grace, hereafter be again. In the mean time, since angry men say, that Sovereign Power hath been abused, and moderate men wish it had not been so used; the express reservation thereof in our Petition, as this Addition would have it, cannot possibly be seasonable.—The 3d argument is à circumstantia loci. Of all places the Petition is the worst to settle this Addition in; which 'leaveth Sovereign Power entire;' for the Petition, being a thing that concerneth every man so nearly, it will run through every man's hands; and every man will be reading of it. In perusing whereof, when they shall fall upon this Additional Clause, of the king's Sovereign Power, presently they will run descendant upon these words, 'Sovereign Power,' What is the nature of it? What the extent? Where the bounds and limits? Whence the original? What is the use? With many such other captious and curious questions, which will yield no real advantage or advancement to Sovereign Power. For it was ever held that it was then farthest best, when it is to be used with tacit veneration; not when it is to be disputed, or popularly examined. The 4th and last argument is the loyalty and dutiful care of the commons; who conceive the entertainment of this Addition unto their Petition, might prove a disservice to his maj. to say no more; and do therefore refuse it.—It is true, that joined with your lordships, we make the great council of the king and kingdom. And, albeit your lordships may know other things better than we, yet your lordships will give us leave to think, and say, That the state and consideration of the several parts for which we serve; their dispositions and inclinations; their apprehensions, their fears and jealousies, are best known unto us. The chiefest scope and end of all our endeavours in this parliament is, to make up all rents and breaches between the king and his subjects, to draw them and knit them together, from that distance, whereof the world abroad takes too much notice, and so to work a perfect union and reconciliation between them.—To this purpose, although we right well understand how the generality of the kingdom hath been impoverished, and their substance exhausted, with late loans and contributions, and other extraordinary charges: yet we have not forbore to express our willingness to grant 5 entire Subsidies; which is to take, as it were, 5 ounces of good blood more from them; thereby to make a real demonstration to his maj. of the true hearts and zeal of his people to supply and support him in an ample measure, even out of their weak estates and decayed means: and thereby to recover and regain his majesty's former good opinion and affection unto them.—On the other side, we have made choice of four epidemical diseases, which especially infest and annoy the body of this commonwealth, to be presented unto his maj. in this Petition: the very view and Relation whereof cannot (as we assure ourselves) but make such an impression on his majesty's royal heart, as will easily move compassion; and, with compassion, a ready assent in his maj. to ease and free his good subjects from all sense of the present, and fear of the like evils hereafter: and consequently beget in the subjects, so eased and freed, a reciprocal and mutual proportion of love and thankfulness.—Now, if instead of such a clear resolution from his maj. for their present relief and future security, the people shall observe, in the conclusion of this Petition, such a reservation of Sovereign Power, as will not only revive the memory of past sufferings, but also minister just suspicion, that in time to come, when it shall please the king to make use of his like sovereign power, they may undergo the like calamities again: we appeal to your lordships wisdom, whether the Petition be likely to produce the good ends which we desire and propound unto ourselves? Nay, I will beseech your lordships to give us leave to use the figure called reticentia; that is, to insinuate and intimate unto your lordships more mischiefs and greater inconveniences, that might arise out of the interpretation of this Addition, than is safe or fit for us to utter.—Wherefore, since the admittance of your lordships Addition unto our

Petition, is incoherent and incompatible with the body of the same, since there is no necessary use of it, for the saving of the king's prerogative; since the moderation of our Petition deserves your lordships cheerful conjunction with us; since this Addition is unseasonable for the time, and improper in respect of the place where your lordships will have it inserted; and, lastly, since it is neither agreeable to those for whom we act, nor answerable to that love and duty which we owe to his maj. to hazard a matter of such unspeakable consequence, (as we aim at) by admitting this Addition into our Petition; I must conclude with a most hearty and affectionate prayer, that you would be pleased to join with the commons, in presenting their Petition unto his maj. as it is by them conceived, without this Addition."

These two reports being ended, the lords deferred the debate on the reasons contained in them, to another time: but as the lord president had reported, That the commons would not have disliked such a Proposition as the Addition is by itself, separated from the Petition, to which it was no way to relate, the house was therefore moved to treat with them again, to consider of any other way, either by manifestation, declaration, or protest. Another conference was hereupon desired, to propose this; the result and report of which, the next day was, "That the commons denied to treat of accommodation by a committee, as was proposed by the lords, for these reasons; 1. That the business was of so great weight, as appears by the long deliberation thereof, both in their house and in the lords; and their strength consisted in their whole body, like a sheaf of arrows. 2 Their house was confident, that the Petition, rightly taken, needed no accommodation. 3. Their great desire to give satisfaction to his maj. and to his pressing occasions, with all possible speed; which would be deferred by this treaty of accommodation: wherefore they desired their lordships to consider this, and also the clearness of their Petition."—After this a long debate ensued, but nothing was concluded on that day.

The Lords at length give up their Addition.]

May 26. The lords went again upon this affair; when their committee for Accommodation was ordered to withdraw, and consider of somewhat, at least, to clear themselves from any design to restrain the just prerogative of the crown. Some little time after they returned, and brought in a form of a Declaration which they had agreed upon; which was read in these words:—

"May it please your most excellent majesty, We the lords spiritual and temporal, in your high court of parliament assembled, do humbly and unanimously declare unto your maj. that our intention is not to lessen or impeach any thing, which, by the oath of supremacy, we have sworn to assist and defend."

This Declaration was read 3 times, put to the question, and assented to, nem. dis. The lords also agreed, now, to join with the commons, in their Petition of Right, with only two small alterations, which the latter had before admitted of. Another conference was then required; in which the lord keeper delivered himself as follows:—

"Gentlemen, Ye that are knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons, I have many times, in this parliament, by command from my lords, declared the great zeal and affection, which my lords have to maintain and nourish the good concurrence and correspondence, which hath hitherto continued between both houses; that there might be a happy issue in this great business, for the common good of the king and kingdom, now, that which I have to say this day from my lords, is to let you know, this fair proceeding is not a profession of words only; but really and indeed, concerning the Petition, which hath been long in agitation, as the weight of the cause required. Since the last conference, my lords have taken it into their serious and instant consideration; and at length are fallen upon a resolution, which I am to acquaint you with. The lords have unanimously agreed with you in omnibus, and have voted, that they will join with you in your Petition, with the only alteration of the word 'means' to be put instead of the word 'pretence'; and for the word 'unlawful' to be put out, before these words, 'not warrantable by the laws and statutes of this realm:' which two alterations yourselves consented unto. So that concerning this business there remains nothing now, but that, having the Petition in your hands, ye will, if ye have not already, vote it as they have done, and so prepare it for his maj.; and my lords will take order, that the king be moved for a speedy access to present the same to his maj." After some pause, he said, "There rests one thing which my lords have commanded me to add, That, in regard this Petition toucheth upon certain charges raised by the lords tenants, and other persons, many times for good use, for the service and safety of the kingdom; ye take it into your care and consideration, and provide a law for assessing of such charges, as the occasion of the time shall require."

But before this conference was held, the lords sent the duke of Buckingham to the king, to know when his maj. would be pleased to admit their house to deliver the Declaration unto him; who, soon returning, his grace said, "That this was so welcome a thing to his maj. that he had appointed the lords to come presently." Which, we conclude was done; but nothing more is entered in the Journals about it.

May 27. The commons sent a message to the lords, by sir Edw. Coke, and others, "To render them their most hearty thanks, for their noble and happy concurrence with them all this parliament: and they acknowledged that their lordships had not only dealt nobly with them in words, but also in deeds." That this Petition, which they were now to deliver, contained the true liberties of the subjects of England, and a true exposition of the Great

Charter, not great for the words thereof, but in respect of the weight of the matter contained therein, the Liberties of the People : that their lordships concurring with the commons, had crowned the work ; and therefore they doubted not, but as the first parliament of king James was called felix parliamentum, so this might be justly stiled parliamentum benedictum. Sir Edward concluded with the humble desire of the commons, that the lords would join with them to beseech his maj. for the more strength of this Petition, and the comfort of his loving subjects to give a gracious answer to the same in full parliament." This said, he delivered the Petition of Right, fairly engrossed ; and then they withdrew into the Painted Chamber.

The Petition of Right agreed to by both Houses and delivered to the King.] The Petition was read once, and afterwards, the messengers being called in again, the lord keeper told them, 'That the lords had taken their message into consideration ; and as they had concurred in the substance, so likewise they desired to do in circumstance : but because they think it will be somewhat long to debate the manner of delivering this petition to the king ; and the last desire of the commons was to avoid all delays, they said they would send to them by messengers of their own.' And, the same day, the lords sent to acquaint the other house, that they had read the Petition 3 times, and had voted it with one unanimous consent.

May 28. The lords sent a deputation of some of their members to wait upon the king, to know the time when his majesty would please to be waited on by both houses, with their Petition ; who appointed three of the clock that afternoon for that purpose. Then it was agreed, that the lord keeper should only say, on the delivery, 'That he was commanded, by one unanimous consent of both houses of parliament, now assembled, to present unto his majesty an humble Petition of Right ; that he was not to trouble him with any additional preface, but only desire leave to read it : and that it was also the desire of both houses, in respect of the great weight of the business, for the strengthening of it, and for the more comfort of his loving people, that his majesty would please to give his assent in full parliament.'

May 29. The lord-keeper acquainted the lords with the delivery of the Petition of Right to the king ; and also reported a message to them, from his maj. to this effect : "That the king, having now received the Petition of both houses, had commanded him to signify to the lords, that he had resolved to give an Answer thereto with speed, having a desire to finish this session as soon as might be : therefore it was the king's pleasure to have no recess at Whitsuntide, but to sit on and dispatch business ; which he thought to tell them now, before any were gone in expectation of a recess."

June 2. The king came to the house of lords, and, being seated on the throne, the commons attending, his maj. made the following short speech to both houses.

"Gentlemen, I am come hither to perform my promise. I think no man can think it long, since I have not taken so many days in answering the Petition, as ye have spent weeks in framing it : and I am come hither to shew you, that, as well in formal things as essential, I desire to give you as much content as in me lies."—After this the lord-keeper spake as followeth :

"My lords, and ye the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons ; his maj. hath commanded me to say unto you, that he takes in good part, that in considering how to settle your own liberties, ye have generally professed in both houses, that ye have no intention to lessen or diminish his prerogative ; wherein as you have declared and cleared your own intentions, so now his maj. comes to clear his ; and to strike a firm league with his people, which is then most likely to be constant and perpetual, when the conditions are equal, and known to be so.—These cannot be in a more happy estate, than when your liberties shall be an ornament and a strength to his maj.'s prerogative, and his prerogative a defence of your liberties ; in which his maj. doubts not, but both he and you shall take a mutual comfort hereafter ; and, for his part, he is resolved to give an example, and so to use his power, that, hereafter ye shall have no cause to complain.—This is the sum of that which I am to say to you from his maj. : and that which farther remains, is, that you hear your own Petition read, and his majesty's gracious Answer." The clerk of the parliament then read the said Petition, in hæc verba :

"PETITION OF RIGHT.

"The PETITION exhibited to his MAJESTY by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and commons in this present Parliament assembled, concerning divers RIGHTS and LIBERTIES of the SUBJECT, with the King's ROYAL ANSWER thereunto in full Parliament.

"To the King's most excellent maj. : humbly shew unto our sovereign lord the king, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in parliament assembled, that whereas it is declared and enacted, by a statute made in the reign of king Edw. 1. commonly called, 'Statutum de Tallagio non concedendo,' that no tallage or aid shall be laid or levied, by the king or his heirs, in this realm, without the good-will and assent of the archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other the freemen of the commonalty of this realm : and by authority of parliament, holden in the 25th year of king Edw. 3. it is declared and enacted, that from thenceforth no person shall be compelled to make any loans to the king against his will, because such loans were against reason and the franchises of the land. And, by other laws of this realm, it is provided, that none should be charged, by any charge or imposition called a Benevolence, nor by such like charge; by which the statutes before mentioned, and the other the good laws and statutes of this realm, your subjects have inherited this freedom, that they should not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge, not set by common consent in parliament: yet nevertheless, of late, divers commissions, directed to sundry commissioners in several counties, with instructions, have issued, by pretext whereof, your people have been in divers places assembled, and required to lend certain sums of money unto your maj. and many of them, upon their refusal so to do, have had an unlawful oath administered unto them, not warrantable by the laws and statutes of this realm, and have been constrained to become bound to make appearance, and give attendance before your privy council, and in other places; and others of them have therefore been imprisoned, confined, and sundry other ways molested and disquieted: and divers other charges have been laid and levied upon your people, in several counties, by lords lieutenants, deputy lieutenants, commissioners for musters, justices of peace, and others, by command or direction from your maj. or your privy council, against the laws and free customs of this realm.—And whereas also, by the statute called, 'The Great Charter of the Liberties of England,' it is declared and enacted, that no freeman may be taken or imprisoned, or be disseized of his freeholds or liberties, or his free customs, or be outlawed or exiled, or in any manner destroyed, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land. And in the 28th year of the reign of king Edw. 3. it was declared and enacted by authority of parliament, that no man, of what estate or condition that he be, should be put out of his lands or tenements, nor taken, nor imprisoned, nor disherited, nor put to death, without being brought to answer by due process of law: Nevertheless, against the tenor of the said statutes, and other the good laws and statutes of your realm, to that end provided, divers of your subjects have of late been imprisoned, without any cause shewed; and when, for their deliverance, they were brought before your justices, by your maj.'s writs of Habeas Corpus, there to undergo and receive as the court should order, and their keepers commanded to certify the causes of their detainer, no cause was certified, but that they were detained by your maj.'s special command, signified by the lords of your privy council; and yet were returned back to several prisons, without being charged with any thing, to which they might make answer by due process of law.—And whereas of late, great companies of soldiers and mariners have been dispersed into divers counties of the realm, and the inhabitants, against their wills, have been compelled to receive them into their houses, and there to suffer them to sojourn, against the laws and customs of this realm, and to the great grievance and vexation of the people:—And whereas, also, by authority of parliament, in the 25th year of the reign of king Edw. 3. it is declared and enacted, that no man shall be fore-judged of life or limb against the form of the Great Charter, and other the laws and statutes of this realm; and by the said Great Charter, and other the laws and statutes of this your realm, no man ought to be adjudged to death, but by the laws established in this your realm, either by the customs of the same realm, or by acts of parliament: and, whereas, no offender of what kind soever is exempted from the proceedings to be used, and punishments to be inflicted by the laws and statutes of this your realm: nevertheless, of late, divers commissions, under your Majesty's great seal, have issued forth, by which, certain persons have been assigned and appointed commissioners with power and authority to proceed, within the land, according to the justice of martial law against such soldiers and mariners, or other dissolute persons joining with them, as should commit any murder, robbery, felony, mutiny, or other outrage or misdemeanor whatsoever; and by such summary course and order, as is agreeable to martial law, and is used in armies in time of war, to proceed to the trial and condemnation of such offenders, and them to cause to be executed and put to death, according to the martial law: by pretext whereof, some of your Majesty's subjects have been, by some of the said commissioners, put to death; when and where, if by the laws and statutes of the land they had deserved death, by the same laws and statutes also they might, and by no other ought to have been adjudged and executed: and, also, sundry grievous offenders by colour thereof, claiming an exemption, have escaped the punishment due to them by the laws and statutes of this your realm, by reason that divers of your officers and ministers of justice have unjustly refused, or forborn to proceed against such offenders, according to the same laws and statutes, upon pretence that the said offenders were punishable only by martial law, and by authority of such commissions as aforesaid; which commissions, and all others of like nature, are wholly and directly contrary to the said laws and statutes of this your realm:—They do therefore, humbly, pray your most excellent maj. That no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield, any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent by act of parliament; and that none be called to make answer, or take such oath, or to give attendance, or be confined, or otherwise molested or disquieted concerning the same, or for refusal thereof: and that no freeman, in any such manner as is before-mentioned, be imprisoned or detained: and that your maj. will be pleased to remove the said soldiers and mariners; and that your people may not be so burdened in time to come: and that the aforesaid commissions for proceeding by martial law, may be revoked and annulled; and that hereafter no commissions of like nature may use forth to any person or persons whatsoever, to be executed as aforesaid, lest, by colour of them, any of your majesty's subjects be destroyed or put to death, contrary to the laws and franchise of the land.—All which they most humbly pray of your most excellent maj. in their Rights and Liberties, according to the laws and statutes of this realm: and that your maj. would also vouchsafe to declare, That the wards, doings and proceedings, to the prejudice of your people, in any of the premisses, shall not be drawn hereafter into consequence for example: and that your maj. would be also graciously pleased for the further comfort and safety of your people, to declare your royal will and pleasure, that, in the things aforesaid, if your officers and ministers shall serve you, according to the laws and statutes of this realm, as they tender the honour of your maj. and the prosperity of this kingdom.”

THE KING'S ANSWER.

“The king willeth, that Right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm; and that the statutes be put in due execution, that his subjects may have no cause to complain of any wrongs or oppressions, contrary to their just Rights and Liberties, to the preservation whereof, he holds himself, in conscience, as well obliged, as of his own prerogative.”

Before we proceed to give an account how the commons relished the King's Answer to their Petition of Right, it is necessary here to insert in affair, which happened about this time, and which proved of some consequence in the sequel.

Mr. Rouse's Charge against Dr. Manwaring. [June 3. Mr. Rouse, a member of the house of commons, brought in a Charge to that house against one Dr. Roger Manwaring, which some days after was seconded with a declaration, which he delivered in this manner.—“Mr. Speaker, I am to deliver, from the committee, a Charge against Mr. Manwaring, a preacher and doctor of divinity, but a man so criminalous, that he hath turned his titles into accusation; for the better they are, the worse is he that dishonours them. Here is a great charge that lies upon him, it is great in itself, and great because it hath many great charges in it; ‘Serpens qui serpentem devorat fit draco’; his charge, having digested many charges into it, becomes a monster of charges. The main and great one is this: a plot and practice, to alter and subvert the frame and fabrick of this estate and common-wealth. This is the great one, and it hath others in it that give it more weight. To this end, 1. He labours to infuse into the conscience of his maj. the persuasion of a power not bounding itself with laws, which king James of famous memory, calls, in his speech to the parliament, tyranny, yea, tyranny accompanied with perjury. 2. He endeavours to persuade the conscience of the subjects, that they are bound to obey commands illegal; yea, he damns them for not obeying them. 3. He robs the subjects of the property of their goods. 4. He brands them that will not lose this property, with most scandalous speech and odious titles; to make them both hateful to prince and people; so to set a division between the head and the members, and between the members themselves. 5. To the same end, not much unlike to Faux and his fellows, he seeks to blow up parliaments and parliamentary powers.—These five, being duly viewed, will appear to be so many charges; and they make up altogether the great and main charge; a mischievous plot to alter and subvert the frame and government of this state and common-wealth. And now, though you may be sure, that Mr. Manwaring leaves us no property in our goods; yet, that he hath an absolute property in this charge, Audite ipsam Belluam. Hear himself making up his own charge.” Here Mr. Rouse read several passages out of his book, and then proceeded, “You have heard his Charge made up by his own words, and withal I doubt not but you seem to hear the voice of that wicked one ‘Quid dabitis?’ What will you give me, and I will betray this state, kingdom, and commonwealth? But there are two observations (I might add a third, which is like unto ‘A three-fold cord which cannot easily be broken’) will draw the charge more violently upon him. The first is of the time when this doctrine of destruction was set forth; it was preached in the heat of the Loan, and of those Imprisonments which accompanied the Loan; and it was printed in the beginning of that term, which ended in a remittitur: so that you might guess there might be a double plot, both by law and conscience, to set on fire the frame and estate of this commonwealth; and one of these entailed foxes was Mr. Manwaring. Another note may be taken of the time, that is, the unseasonableness of it; for this doctrine of the Loan, in case of necessity, was the year after an assent in parliament, to 4 Subsidies and 3 fifteens; which might have served for a sufficient stopple for the doctor's mouth, to keep in his doctrine of necessity, A second observation may be of the means, by which he seeks to destroy this common-wealth; his means are divinity, yea, by his divinity he would destroy both king and kingdom. 1. The king: for can there be a greater mischief to a prince, than to put the opinion of deity into his ears? for, if from his ears it should pass to his heart, it might be mortal: you know how Herod perished. Now this man gives a participation of divine omnipotence to kings; and though a part may seem to qualify, yet all doth seem again to fill up that qualification; and very dangerously, if we remember what God saith of himself, ‘I am a jealous God.’ 2. He goes about to destroy the kingdom and commonwealth by his divinity; but do we ever find in scripture such a destroying divinity? Surely I find there, ‘That God is a God of order, and not of confusion.’ And that ‘the Son of God came to save, and not to destroy. By which it seems he hath not his divinity from God, nor from the son of God: but, from the scriptures, I find there is one in hell called 'the Destroyer.' And that we may know he went to hell for his divinity, he names sundry jesuits and friars, with whom he consulted and traded for his divinity. But, not to bely even hell itself, the jesuits are honestest than he; for if he had not brought more hell unto them than he found in them, he had never found this divinity which he hath brought forth; yea, in his quotations he hath used those shifts and falshoods, for which boys are whipt in schools, and yet by them he thinks to carry the cause of a kingdom.—But, for a conclusion, to give the true character of this man, whom I never saw, I will shew it you by one whom I know to be contrary to him: Samuel we know all to be a true prophet; now we read of Samuel, That 'he writ the law of the kingdom in a book, and laid it up before the Lord.' And this he did, as one of Mr. Manwaring's own authors affirms, that the king may know what to command, and the people what to obey: but Mr. Manwaring, finding the law of this kingdom written in books, tears it in pieces, and that in the presence of the Lord in a pulpit; that the king may not know what to command, nor the people what to obey. Thus Mr. Manwaring, being contrary to a true prophet, must needs be a false one; and the judgment of a false prophet belongs to him. I have shewed you an evil tree, that bringeth forth evil fruit; and now it rests with you to determine, whether the following sentence shall follow, 'Cut it down, and cast it into the fire.'

Sanderson, in his life of Charles I. informs us, That this Dr. Manwaring preached two bold sermons, one before the king, and the other at his parish church. In the first he asserted; "That the king's royal command, imposing taxes and loans, without consent of parliament, did so far bind the conscience of the subjects of this kingdom, that they could not refuse the payment without peril of damnation." The other was on this topic, "That the authority of parliament was not necessary for the raising Aids and Subsidies." This author adds, he well remembers what the king said when he was afterwards censured for it; 'He that will preach more than he can prove, let him suffer for it; I give him no thanks for giving me my due.' So that this being entirely the business of parliament, he was left, both by the king and church, to their sentence; which will follow in the sequel.

The King's Answer to the Petition of Right, not agreeable to the Commons.] Mr. Rushworth tells us, That on the 3d of June the King's Answer to the Petition of Right was read in the commons, and seemed too scant, in regard to so much expence of time and labour, as had been employed in contriving it: and, that thereupon, sir John Elliott stood up, and made a long speech, wherein he gave forth so full and lively a representation of all Grievances, both general and particular, as if they had never before been mentioned. There is only a short abstract of it in the Collections, but the following copy of it at large, is taken from sir John Napier's M.S.

Sir J. Elliot recapitulates all their Grievances.] Sir John Elliot rose and said—"Mr. Speaker, We sit here as the great council of the king; and in that capacity it is our duty to take into consideration the state and affairs of the kingdom; and where there is occasion, to give them a true representation by way of counsel and advice, with what we conceive necessary or expedient for them. In this consideration, I confess, many a sad thought hath affrighted me: and that not only in respect of our dangers from abroad, which yet I know are great, as they have been often in this place, prest and dilated to us, but in respect of our disorders here at home, which do enforce those dangers, and by which they are occasioned: for, I believe, I shall make it clear unto you, that both, at first, the cause of these dangers were our disorders, and our disorders now are yet our greatest dangers; and not so much the potency of our enemies, as the weakness of ourselves do threaten us; and that saying of the father may be assumed by us; 'Non tam potentia sua quam negligentia nostra.' Our want of true devotion to heaven, our insincerity and doubling in religion, our want of councils, our precipitate actions, the insufficiency or unfaithfulness of our generals abroad, the ignorance or corruptions of our ministers at home, the impoverishing of the sovereign, the oppression and depression of the subject, the exhausting of our treasures, the waste of our provisions, consumption of our ships, destruction of our men. These make the advantage to our enemies, not the reputation of their arms. And if in these there be not reformation, we need no foes abroad; time itself will ruin us."—To shew this more fully, I believe, you will all hold it necessary, that they seem not an aspersion on the state, or imputation on the government, as I have known such notions misinterpreted; but far is this from me to propose, who have none but clear thoughts of the excellency of the king, nor can have other ends but the advancement of his majesty's glory: I shall desire a little of your patience extraordinary to open the particulars; which I shall do with what brevity I may, answerable to the importance of the cause and the necessity now upon us; yet with such respect and observation to the time, as I hope it shall not be thought troublesome.—For the first then, our insincerity and doubling in Religion is the greatest and most dangerous disorder of all others; this hath never been unpunished, and of this we have many strong examples of all states, and in all times, to awe us. What testimony doth it want? Will you have authority of books? Look on the collections of the committee for Religion, there is too clear an evidence. See then the commission procured for composition with the Papists in the North;

mark the proceedings thereupon; and you will find them to little less amounting than a toleration in effect: the slight payments and the easiness in them, will likewise shew the favour that is intended. Will you have proofs of men, witness the hopes, witness the presumptions, witness the reports of all the Papists generally: observe the dispositions of commanders, the trust of officers, the confidence in secretaries to employments in this kingdom, in Ireland, and elsewhere: these all will shew it hath too great a certainty; and to this add but the incontrovertible evidence of that all-powerful Hand, which we have felt so sorely that gave it full assurance; for as the heavens oppose themselves to us for our impiety, so it is we that first opposed the heavens.—For the second, our Want of Councils, that great disorder in a state, with which there cannot be stability. If effects may shew their causes, as they are often a perfect demonstration of them, our misfortunes, our disasters serve to prove it; and the consequences they draw with them. If reason be allowed in this dark age, the judgment of dependencies and foresight of contingencies in affairs do confirm it. For if we view ourselves at home, are we in strength, are we in reputation equal to our ancestors? If we view ourselves abroad, are our friends as many; are our enemies no more? Do our friends retain their safety and possessions? Do not our enemies enlarge themselves, and gain from them and us? To what counsel owe we the loss of the Palatinate, where we sacrificed both our honour, and our men sent thither; stopping those greater powers appointed for that service, by which it might have been defensible. What counsel gave direction to the late action, whose wounds are yet bleeding, I mean the expedition to Rhee, of which there is yet so sad a memory in all men? What design for us, or advantage to our state could that import? You know the wisdom of our ancestors, and the practice of their times, how they preserved their safeties. We all know, and have as much cause to doubt as they had, the greatness and ambition of that kingdom, which the whole world could not satisfy. Against this greatness and ambition, we likewise know the proceedings of that excellent queen, Elizabeth; whose name, without admiration, falls not into mention even with her enemies. You know how she advanced herself, and how she advanced this nation in glory and in state; how she depressed her enemies, and upheld her friends; how she enjoyed a full security, and made them then our scorn, whom now are made our terror! Some of the principles she built on were these; and, if I mistake, let reason and our statesmen contradict me. 1st. To maintain, in what she might, an unity in France, that that kingdom, being at peace within itself, might be a bulwark to keep back the power of Spain by land. Next to preserve an amity and league between that state and us, that so we might come in aid of the Low-Countries, and by that means receive their ships and help them by sea. This trouble cord, so working between France, the States, and England, might enable us, as occasion should require, to give assistance unto others; and, by this means, the experience of that time doth tell us that we were not only free from those fears that now possess and trouble us, but then our names were fearful to our enemies. See now what correspondency our actions had with this; square them by these rules. It did induce, as a necessary consequence, a division in France between the protestants and their king, of which there is too woful and lamentable experience. It hath made an absolute breach between that state and us; and so entertains us against France, and France in preparation against us, that we have nothing to promise to our neighbours, nay hardly to ourselves. Nay, observe the time, in which it was attempted, and you shall find it not only varying from those principles, but directly contrary and opposite ex diametro to those ends; and such, as from the issue and success, rather might be thought a conception of Spain, than begotten here with us." [Here there was an interruption made by sir H. May chancellor of the duchy, and one of the privy-council, expressing a dislike, but the house ordered sir John to go on: whereupon he proceeded thus:] "Mr. Speaker, I am sorry for this interruption, but much more sorry if there hath been occasion; wherein, as I shall submit myself wholly to your judgment to receive what censure you should give me, if I have offended: so, in the integrity of my intentions and clearness of my thoughts, I must still retain this confidence, that no greatness shall deter me from the duties which I owe to the service of my king and country; but that with a true English heart, I shall discharge myself as faithfully and as really, to the extent of my poor power, as any man, whose honours, or whose offices, most strictly oblige him.—You know the dangers Denmark is in, and how much they concerned us; what in respect of our alliance and the country; what in the importance of the Sound; what an advantage to our enemies the gain thereof would be? What loss, what prejudice to us by this disunion; we breaking upon France, France enraged by us, and the Netherlands at amazement between both? Neither could we intend to aid that luckless king, whose loss is our disaster? Can those now, that express their troubles at the hearing of these things, and have so often told us, in this place of their knowledge in the conjunctures and disjunctures of affairs, say, they advised in this? Was this an act of council, Mr. Speaker? I have more charity than to think it; and, unless they make a confession of themselves I can not believe it.—For the next the Insufficiency and Unfaithfulness of our Generals, (that great disorder abroad,) what shall I say? I wish there were not cause to mention it; and, but out of the apprehension of the danger that is to come, if the like choice hereafter be not prevented, I could willingly be silent: but my duty to my sovereign, my service to this house, and the safety and honour of my country, are above all respects: and what, so nearly, trenches to the p. ejudice of this, must not, shall not, be forborn. At Cadiz then, in that first expedition we made, when we arrived and found a conquest ready, the Spanish ships I mean fit for the satisfaction of a voyage; and of which some of the chiefest, then there themselves, have since assured me that the satisfaction would have been sufficient, either in point of honour, or in point of profit: why was it neglected? Why was it not achieved, it being of all hands granted, how feasible it was? After, when with the destruction of some of our men, and with the exposition of some others, (who though their fortune since have not been such,) by chance came off: when, I say, with the loss of our serviceable men, that unserviceable fort was gained, and the whole army landed; why was there nothing done? why was there nothing attempted? If nothing was intended, wherefore did they land? If there was a service, wherefore were they ship'd again?—Mr. Speaker, it satisfies me too much in this, when I think of their dry and hungry march into that drunken quarter, (for so the soldiers termed it,) where was the period of their journey; that divers of our men, being left as a sacrifice to the enemy, that labour was at an end.—For the next undertaking, at Rhée, I will not trouble you much; only this in short: was not that whole action carried against the judgment, and opinion of those officers, that were of the council? Was not the first, was not the last, was not all, in the landing, in the intrenching, in the continuance there, in the assault, in the retreat, without their assent? Did any advice take place of such as were of the council? If there should be made a particular inquisition thereof, these things will be manifest, and more. I will not instance the Manifesto that was made for the reason of these arms; nor by whom, nor in what manner, nor on what grounds it was published; nor what effects it hath wrought, drawing, as it were, almost the whole world into league against us: nor will I mention the leaving of the Wines, the leaving of the Salt which were in our possession; and of a value, as 'tis said, to answer much of our expence; nor that great wonder which no Alexander or Cæsar ever did, the enriching of the enemy by courtesies when our soldiers wanted help: nor the private intercourses and parties with the Fort, which continually were held: what they intended may be read in the success, and upon due examination thereof they would not want their proofs.—For the last Voyage to Rochelle, there needs no observations; it is so fresh in memory: nor will I make an inference or corollary on all. Your own knowledge shall judge what truth, or what sufficiency they express.—For the next, the Ignorance and Corruption of our Ministers, where can you miss of instances? If you survey the court, if you survey the country; if the church, if the city be examined; if you observe the bar, if the bench; if the ports, if the shipping; if the land, if the seas: all these will render you variety of proofs, and that, in such measure and proportion, as shews the greatness of our disease to be such, that, if there be not some speedy application for remedy, our case is almost desperate.—Mr. Speaker, I fear I have been too long in these particulars that are past, and am unwilling to offend you; therefore in the rest I shall be shorter: and in that which concerns the impoverishing of the king, no other arguments will I use, than such as all men grant. The Exchequer, you know, is empty, and the reputation thereof gone; the ancient lands are sold; the jewels pawned; the plate engaged; the debts still great; almost all charges, both ordinary and extraordinary, borne up by projects: what poverty can be greater? what necessity so great? what perfect English heart is not almost dissolved into sorrow for this truth?—For the Oppression of the Subject, it needs no demonstration; the whole kingdom is a proof; and for the exhausting of our treasures, that very oppression speaks it. What waste of our provisions, what consumption of our ships, what destruction of our men have been; witness that Journey to Algiers: witness that with Mansfield—witness that to Cadiz—witness the next—witness that to Rhée—witness the last. (I pray God we may never have more such witnesses.) Witness likewise the Palatinate—witness Denmark—witness the Turks—witness the Dunkirkers—witness all. What losses we have sustained, how we are impaired in munition, in ships, in men! It is beyond contradiction, that we were never so much weakened, nor ever had less hope but to be restored.—These, Mr. Speaker, are our dangers; these are they which do threaten us, and these are like the Trojan horse brought cunningly to surprize us: in these do lurk the strongest of our enemies, ready to issue on us, and if we do not speedily expel them, these are the signs, these the invitations to others: that they will so prepare their entrance, that we shall have no means left of refuge or defence: for we have these enemies at home, how can we strive with those that are abroad? If we be freed from these, no other can impeach us? Our ancient English virtue, like the old Spartan valour, cleared from these disorders; our being in sincerity of religion and once made friends with heaven; having maturity of councils, sufficiency of generals, incorruption of officers, opulence in the king, liberty in the people, repletion of treasure, plenty of provisions, reparation of ships, preservation of men: our ancient English virtue, I say, thus rectified, will secure us; unless there be a speedy reformation in us. I know not what hopes or expectations we have.—These are the things, sir, I shall desire to have taken into consideration, that as are the great council of the kingdom, and by the apprehension of these dangers, we are ruly represent them unto the king; whereto, conceive, we are bound by a treble obligation, of duty to God, of duty to his majesty, and of duty to our country.—And therefore I wish it may so stand with the wisdom and judgment of the house, that they may be drawn into the body of a Remonstrance, and in all humility expressed; with a prayer unto his maj. That, for the safety of himself, for the safety of the kingdom, and for the safety of religion, he will be pleased to give us time to make perfect acquisition thereof, or to take them into his own wisdom, and there give them such timely information as the necessity and justice of the case doth import. And thus, sir, with a true affection and loyalty to his maj. and with a firm duty and service to my country, I am suddenly, and it may be with some disorder, expressed the weak apprehensions I have; therein, if I have erred, I humbly crave your pardon, and so submit myself to the censure of the house."

Rushworth observes, 'That many of the members thought it not suitable to the wisdom of the house, in that conjuncture, to begin to recapitulate those misfortunes which were now obvious to all; accounting it more discretion not to look back but forward; and, since the king was so near to meet them, that the happiness they expected might not be lost: and these were for petitioning his maj. for a fuller Answer.' It was intimated by sir Hen. Martin, 'That this speech of sir J. Elliot was suggested from disaffection to his majesty.' And there wanted not some who said, 'It was made out of dislike to his majesty's Answer to their Petition: but sir J. Elliot protested the contrary; and that himself and others had a resolution to open these last mentioned Grievances, to satisfy his maj. therein, only they staid for an opportunity that averment of sir J. Elliot was attested by sir Tho. Wentworth and sir Rob. Philips.—In this debate sir Edw. Coke pronounced, 'That an humble Remonstrance be presented to his maj. touching the present dangers, and the means of safety both for the king and kingdom; which was agreed to by the house; and thereupon the committee for the bill of Subsidies was ordered to expedite the said remonstrance.'—In all, or most of these debates, the serjeant was ordered to attend on the outside of the door of the house, and no man was to offer to go out, upon penalty of being sent to the Tower.

Sir B. Rudyard's Speech for better Maintenance of the inferior Clergy. About this time the committee, of which Mr. Pym was chairman, being appointed to consider of a bill for the better maintenance of the inferior Clergy, Sir Benj. Rudyard made the following speech:—"Mr. Pym; I did not think to have spoken to this bill, because I was willing to believe that the forwardness of this committee would have prevented me; but now I hold myself bound to speak, and to speak in earnest.

In the first year of the king, and the second convention, I first moved for the increase and enlargement of poor Ministers Livings: I shewed how necessary it was, though it had been neglected; this was also commended to the house by his maj. There being then, as now, many accusations on foot against scandalous ministers, I was bold to tell the house, that there were also scandalous livings, which were much the cause of the other; livings of five pounds, nay even five marks a year; that men of worth and parts would not be muzzled up to such pittances; that there were some such places in England, as were scarce in all Christendom beside, where God was little better known than amongst the Indians. I exemplified it in the utmost skirts of the North, where the prayers of the common people are more like spells and charms than devotions; the same blindness and ignorance is in divers parts of Wales, which many in that country do both know and lament. I also declared, that to plant good ministers was the strongest and surest means to establish true religion; that it would prevail more against Papistry, than the making of new laws, or executing of old; that it would counter-work court-conivance and luke-warm accommodation; that though the calling of ministers be never so glorious within, the outward poverty will bring contempt upon them; especially among those, who measure them by the ounce, and weigh them by the pound; which indeed is the greatest part of men. Mr. Pym, I cannot but testify how, being in Germany, I was exceedingly scandalized to see the poor stipendiary ministers of the reformed churches there, despised and neglected by reason of their poverty, being otherwise very grave and learned men. I am afraid this is a part of the burthen of Germany, which ought to be a warning to us. I have heard many objections and difficulties, even to impossibilities against this bill. To him that is unwilling to go, there is ever a bear or a lion in the way. First let us make ourselves willing, then will the way be easy and safe enough. I have observed, that we are always very eager and fierce against papistry, against scandalous ministers, and against things which are not so much in our power. I should be glad to see that we did delight as well in rewarding as in punishing, and in undertaking matters within our reach, as this is absolutely within our power: our own duties are next us, other men's further off. I do not speak this, that I do dislike the destroying and pulling down of that which is ill; but then let us be as earnest to plant and build up that which is good in the room of it; for why should we be desolate? the best and the greatest way to dispel darkness and the deeds thereof, is to let in light: we say that day breaks, but no man can ever hear the noise of it; God comes in the still voice: let us quickly mend our candlesticks, and we cannot want lights.—I am afraid this backwardness of ours will give the adversary occasion to say, that we chuse our religion because it is the cheaper of the two, and that we would willingly serve God with somewhat that costs us nought. Believe it, Mr. Pym, he that thinks to save any thing by his religion, but his soul, will be a terrible loser in the end : we sow so sparingly, and that is the reason we reap so sparingly, and have no more fruit. Methinks whosoever hates papistry, should by the same rule hate covetousness ; for that is idolatry too. I never liked hot professions and cold actions, such a heat is rather the heat of a distemper and disease, than of life and saving health.—For scandalous ministers, there is no man shall be more forward to have them severely punished than I will be ; when salt has lost its savour, fit it is to be cast on that unsavoury place, the dunghill. But, sir, let us deal with them as God hath dealt with us : God, before he made man, made the world, a handsome place for him to dwell in ; so let us provide them convenient livings, and then punish them in God's name : but, till then, scandalous livings cannot but have scandalous ministers. It shall ever be a rule to me, that where the church and commonwealth are both of one religion, it is comely and decent that the outward splendour of the church should hold a proportion, and participate with the prosperity of the temporal state ; for why should we dwell in houses of cedar, and suffer God to dwell in tin ? It was a glorious and religious work of king James, and I speak it to his unspeakable honour, and to the praise of that nation ; who (though that country be not so rich as ours, yet they are richer in their affections to religion) within the space of one year caused churches to be planted through all Scotland, the Highlands and borders, worth 30*l*. a year a-piece, with a house and some glebe belonging to them ; which 30*l*. a year, considering the cheapness of the country, and the modest fashion of ministers living there, is worth double as much as any where within 100 miles of London. The printed act and commission, whereby it may be executed, I have here in my hand, delivered unto me by a noble gentleman of that nation, and a worthy member of this house, sir Francis Stuart.—To conclude ; although christianity and religion be established generally throughout this kingdom, yet, until it be planted more particularly, I shall scarce think this a christian commonwealth ; seeing it hath been moved and stirred in parliament, it will lie heavy upon parliaments, until it be effected.—Let us do something for God, here, of our own, and no doubt God will bless our proceedings in this place the better for ever hereafter : and, for my own part, I will never give over soliciting this cause as long as parliaments and I shall live together.”

June 4. The lord keeper delivered a Message to the lords from the king, to this effect : “ That his maj. upon many pressing and urgent occasions, had resolved to hasten an end to this session, and prorogue the parliament to a further time ; and had appointed Wednesday, the 11th of June, for that purpose : and had commanded this to be signified to both houses, in order that those businesses, which were before them of greater consequence, might be expedited.”

The King's Message to both Houses to expedite Business. The same day a Message from the king was delivered to the commons, by their Speaker, to this purport : “ That his maj. having, upon the Petition exhibited by both houses, given an Answer full of justice and grace, for which we and our posterity have just cause to bless him, it is now time to grow to a conclusion of the session ; and therefore his majesty thinks fit to let you know, that as he doth resolve to abide by that Answer, without further change or alteration, so he will royally and really perform unto you what he hath thereby promised. And further, that he resolves to end this session upon Wednesday the 11th of this month ; and therefore wisheth, that the house would seriously attend those businesses, which may best bring the session to a happy conclusion, without entertaining new matters ; and so husband the time, that his maj. may, with the more comfort, bring us speedily together again : at which time, if there be any further Grievances, not contained or expressed in the Petition, they may be more maturely considered than the time will now permit.”

Declaration of the Commons against Dr. Manwaring. After the reading of this Message, the house, instead of taking any notice of it, proceeded with a Declaration against Dr. Manwaring ; which was the same day presented to the lords at a conference between the committees of both houses : and Mr. Pym was appointed by the commons to manage that conference.—The Declaration was as follows :

“ THE DECLARATION OF THE COMMONS
against ROGER MANWARING, Clerk, Doctor in Divinity.

“ For the more effectual prevention of the apparent ruin and destruction of this kingdom, which must necessarily ensue, if the good and fundamental laws and customs, therein established, should be brought into contempt and violated ; and that form of government thereby altered, by which it hath been so long maintained in peace and happiness ; and to the honour of our sovereign lord the king, and for the preservation of his crown and dignity, the commons in this present parliament assembled, do, by this their bill, shew and declare against Roger Manwaring, clerk, D. D. that whereas, by the laws and statutes of this realm, the free subjects of England do undoubtedly inherit this right and liberty, not to be compelled to contribute any tax, tallage, or aid, or to make any loans, not set or imposed, by common consent, by act of parliament : and whereas divers of his maj.'s loving subjects, relying upon the said laws and customs, did, in all humility, refuse to lend such sums of money, without authority of parliament, as were lately required of them : nevertheless he, the said Roger, in contempt, and contrary to the laws of this realm, hath lately preached in his maj.'s presence, two several sermons: that is to say, the 4th of July last, one of the said sermons; and, the 29th of the same month, the other; both which he has since published in print, in a book entitled 'Religion and Allegiance;' and, with a wicked and malicious intention to seduce and misguide the conscience of the king, touching the observation of the laws and customs of this kingdom, and of the rights and liberties of the subjects; to incense his royal displeasure against his good subjects so refusing; to scandalize, subvert, and impeach the good laws and government of this realm, and the authority of the high court of parliament; to alienate the king's heart from his people, and to cause jealousies, sedition, and division in the kingdom; he, the said Roger doth, in the said sermons and book, persuade his maj. as follows:—1st. That his maj. is not bound to keep and observe the good laws and customs of this realm, concerning the rights and liberties of the subjects aforementioned: and that his royal will and command in imposing loans, taxes, and other aids upon his people, without common consent in parliament, doth so far bind the consciences of the subjects of this kingdom, that they cannot refuse the same, without peril of eternal damnation! 2nd. That those of his majesty's loving subjects, who refused the Loan aforementioned, in such manner as is before cited, did therein offend against the law of God, and against his majesty's supreme authority; and, by so doing became guilty of impiety, disloyalty, rebellion, and disobedience, and liable to many other censures; which he, in the several parts of his book, doth most falsely and maliciously lay upon them. 3rd. That the authority of parliament is not necessary for the raising of aids and subsidies; that the slow proceedings of such assemblies are not fit for the supply of the urgent necessities of the state, but rather apt to produce sundry impediments to the just designs of princes, and to give them occasion of displeasure and discontent. All which the commons are ready to prove, not only by the general scope of the same sermons and book, but likewise by several clauses, assertions, and sentences therein contained; and that he, the said Roger by preaching and publishing the sermons and book aforementioned, did most unlawfully abuse his holy function, instituted by God in his church, for the guiding of the consciences of all his servants, and chiefly of sovereign princes and magistrates; and for the maintenance of the peace and concord betwixt all men, especially betwixt the king and his people; and hath thereby most grievously offended against the crown and dignity of his maj. and against the prosperity and good government of this state and common-wealth. And the said commons, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter on any other occasion, any impeachment against the said Roger; and also of replying to the answers, which the said Roger shall make unto any of the matters contained in this present bill of complaint; and of offering further proof of the premisses, or any of them, as the cause, according to the course of parliament, shall require, do pray, that the said Roger may be put to answer to all and every the premisses; and that such proceeding, examination, trial, judgment, and exemplary punishment may be thereupon had and executed, as is agreeable to law and justice."

Mr. Pym's Speech in Support thereof.] This Declaration ingrossed in parchment being read,

Mr. Pym addressed himself to the lords in this manner; "That he should speak to this cause with more confidence, because he saw nothing to discourage him; if he considered the matter, the offences were of a high nature, and of easy proof; if he considered their lordships, who were the judges, their own interest, their own honour, the example of their ancestors, the care of their posterity, would all be advocates with him, in this cause, on the behalf of the common-wealth; if he considered the king our sovereign, (the pretence of whose service and prerogative might perchance, be sought unto as a defence and shelter for this delinquent) he could not but remember that part of the king's Answer to the Petition of Right of both houses, 'That his maj. held himself bound in conscience to preserve their liberties,' which this man would persuade him to impeach." He further said, "that he could not but remember his majesty's love to piety and justice, manifested upon all occasions, and he knew love to be the root and spring of all other passions and affections. A man therefore hates, because he sees somewhat in that which he hates contrary to that which he loves; a man therefore is angry, because he sees somewhat in that where-with he is angry, that gives impediment and interruption to the accomplishment of that which he loves. If this be so, by the same act of apprehension, by which he believes his majesty's love to piety and justice, he must needs believe his hate and detestation of this man, who went about to withdraw him from the exercise of both." Then he proceeded to that which, he said, was the task enjoined him, 'To make good every clause of that which had been read unto them;' which, that he might the more clearly perform, he proposed to observe that order of parts, into which the said Declaration was naturally dissolved. 1. Of the preamble. 2. The body of the charge. 3. The conclusion or prayer of the commons. The preamble consisted altogether of recital; 1. Of the inducements upon which the commons undertook this complaint. 2. Of those laws and liberties, against which the offence was committed. 3. Of the violation of those laws which have relation to that offence.—From the connection of all these recitals, he said, there did result 3 positions, which he w^{as} to maintain as the ground-work and foundation of the whole cause. 1. That the form of government in any state, could not be altered without apparent danger of ruin to that state. 2. The law of England, whereby the subject is exempt-with Turks and Jews, in the second sermon, (p. 47.) 'What a paradox is this? What a Turk will do for a Christian, and a Christian for a Turk, and a Jew for both, &c. much less should Christian men deny the same to a Christian king.'—The third comparison is with Corah, Dathan, and Abiram, Theudas, and Judas, which is taken out of the second sermon, (p. 49.) where he labours to deprive of all merit in Christ's sufferings those who refused this loan. 'Corah, Dathan, and Abiram, whom, for their murmurings, God suddenly sunk into hell fire, might as well alledge their sufferings had some resemblance with that of the three children in the Babylonian furnace; and Theudas and Judas, the two incendiaries of the people in the days of Cæsar's tribute, might as well pretend their cause to be like the Maccabees.'—Thus Mr. Pym ended the 2nd Article of the Charge, upon which he said, 'were imprinted other two of these six characters of malice formerly vented; i. e. A wicked intention to increase his majesty's displeasure against his good subjects so refusing, and to alienate his heart from the rest of his people: both which were points so odious, that he needed not to add any further enforcement or illustration.'—The third Article contained three Clauses. 1. That the authority of parliament is not necessary for the raising of Aids and Subsidies. 2. That the slow proceedings of such assemblies are not fit to supply the urgent necessity of the state. 3. That parliaments are apt to produce sundry impediments to the just designs of princes, and give them occasion of displeasure and discontent.—For proof of all these positions, Mr. Pym alledged two places, containing the two first of those six considerations, which are propounded by the doctor to induce the refusers to yield to the loan, in his first sermon, (p. 26, 27.) '1st. If they would please to consider, that though such assemblies, as are the highest and greatest representations of a kingdom, be most sacred and honourable, and necessary also to those ends to which they were at first instituted; yet know we must, that they were not ordained to this end, to contribute any right to kings, whereby to challenge tributary aids and subsidiary helps; but for the more equal imposing, and more easy exacting, of that which unto kings doth appertain by natural and original law and justice, as their proper inheritance annexed to their imperial crowns from their birth. And therefore, if, by a magistrate that is supreme, upon necessity extreme and urgent, such subsidiary helps be required, a proportion being held respectively to the ability of the persons charged; and the sum and quantity so required surmount not, too remarkably, the use and charge for which it was levied; very hard would it be for any man in the world, that should not accordingly satisfy such demands, to defend his conscience from that heavy prejudice of resisting the ordinance of God, and receiving to himself damnation; though every of those circumstances be not observed, which, by the municipal law, is required.' 2nd, 'If they would consider the importunities that often may be urgent and pressing necessities of state that cannot stay without certain and apparent danger, for the motion and revolution of so great and vast a body as such assemblies are; nor yet abide their long and pausing deliberation when they are assembled, nor stand upon the answering of those jealous and over-wary cautions and objections made by some; who, wedded over-much to the love of epidemical and popular errors, and bent to cross the most just and lawful designs of their wise and gracious sovereign, (and that under the plausible shews of singular liberty and freedom) would, if their conscience might speak, appear nothing more than the satisfying either of private humours, passions, or purposes.'—Here Mr. Pym observed, he needed not draw any argument or conclusions from these places; the substance of the Charge appearing sufficiently in the words themselves: and to this third Article he fixed two other of these six characters of malice, viz. That it is his wicked intention to avert his majesty's mind from calling of parliaments, and to cause jealousies, seditions and divisions in the kingdom; which he enforced thus: if parliaments, saith he, be taken away, mischiefs and disorders must needs abound, without any possibility of good laws to reform them; grievances will daily increase, without opportunities or means to redress them: and what readier way can there be to raise distractions betwixt the king and people, and to create tumults and distempers in the state, than this?—And so he concluded this third Article of the Charge.—Next, the limitations, the doctor had provided to justify, or at least to excuse, himself, were propounded to be three. 1. That he did not attribute to the king any such absolute power, as might be exercised at all times, or upon all occasions, according to his own pleasure; but only upon necessity extreme and urgent. 2. That the sum required must be proportionable to the ability of the party, and to the use and occasion. 3. That he did not say, that the substance of the municipal or national laws might be omitted or neglected, but the circumstances only.—To these were offered 3 Answers, the first general, the other two particular. The general Answer was this, 'That it is all one to leave the power absolute, and to leave the judgment arbitrary when to execute that power; for although these limitations should be admitted, yet it is left to the king alone to determine what is an urgent and pressing necessity; and what is a just proportion, both in respect of the ability, and of the use and occasion; and what shall be said to be a circumstance, and what the substance, of the law. Thus the subject is left without remedy; and the legal bounds being taken away, no private person shall be allowed to oppose his own particular opinion, in any of these points, to the king's resolution; so that all these limitations, though specious in shew, are in effect fruitless and vain.'—The first particular Answer applied to that limitation of urgent necessity, was taken from the case of Normandy; as it appears in the commentaries of Guiliam Jeremie, upon the customary laws of that duchy: they having been oppressed with some grievances, contrary to their franchise, made their complaint to Lewis X. who by his charter, in 1311, acknowledging the right and custom of the country, and that they had been unjustly grieved, did grant and provide, 'That, from thence-forward, they should be free from all subsidies and exactions, to be imposed by him and his successors; yet with this clause, 'Si necessitie grande ne le requieret'; which small exception hath devoured all these immunities: for though these states meet every year, yet they have little or no power left, but to agree to such levies as the king will please to make upon them.'—The second particular Answer applied to the limitation and diminution of this power, which may be pretended to be made by this word, 'circumstance', (as if he did acknowledge the king to be bound to the substance of the law, and free only in regard of the manner) was this, That, if the places be observed, it will appear, that he intends, by that word, 'The assembly of parliaments, and assent of the people for such contribution, which is the very substance of the right and liberty now in question. The circumstances of aggravation, observed to be annexed to this cause, were these: the first, from the place where these sermons were preached; the court, the king's own family, where such doctrine was before so well believed that no man needed to be converted. Of this there could be no end, but either simoniacal, by flattery and soothing to make way for his own preferment; or else extremely malicious, to add new afflictions to those who lay under his majesty's wrath, disgraced and imprisoned; and to enlarge the wound, which had been given to the laws and liberties of the kingdom. The second was, from the consideration of his holy function: he is a preacher of God's Word; and yet he had endeavoured to make that, which was the only rule of justice and goodness, to be the warrant for violence and oppression. He is a messenger of peace, but he had endeavoured to sow strife and dissension, not only amongst private persons, but even betwixt the king and his people, to the disturbance and danger of the whole state: he is a spiritual father, but like that evil father in the gospel, he hath given his children stones instead of bread; instead of flesh he hath given them scorpions. Lastly, he is a minister of the church of England, but he hath acted the part of a Romish Jesuit; they labour our destruction, by dissolving the oath of allegiance taken by the people; he doth the same work, by dissolving the oath of protection and justice taken by the king. A third point of aggravation was drawn from the quality of those authors, upon whose authority he doth principally rely, being for the most part friars and Jesuits; and from his fraud and shifting, in citing even those authors to purposes quite different from their own meanings. Touching which it was presumed, that most of his places are such as were intended, by the authors, concerning absolute monarchies, not regulated by laws or contracts betwixt the king and his people: and, in answer to all authorities of this kind, were alledged certain passages of a speech from our late sovereign king James, to the lords and commons at Whitehall, 1609, viz. 'In these our times, we are to distinguish betwixt the state of kings in their first original; and between the state of settled kings and monarchs, that do at this time govern in civil kingdoms, &c. Every just king, in a settled kingdom, is bound to observe the paction made to his people by his laws, in framing his government agreeable thereunto, &c. All kings that are not tyrants or perjured will be glad to bound themselves within the limits of their laws; and they that persuade them to the contrary are vipers and pests, both against them and the common-wealth.' It was secondly observed, that (in the p. 27 of his first sermon) he cites these words, 'Suarez de Legibus, lib. v. c. 17. Acceptationem populi non esse conditionem necessariam, ex vi juris naturalis aut gentium, neque ex jure communi.' The Jesuit adds, 'neque ex antiquo jure Hispaniæ;' which words are left out by the doctor, lest the reader might be invited to enquire what was 'antiquum jus Hispaniæ;' though it might have been learned, from the same author, in another place of that work, that about 200 years since, this liberty was granted to the people by one of the kings, that no tribute should be imposed without their consent. And this author adds further, 'that, after the law introduced and confirmed by custom, the king is bound to observe it.' From this place Mr. Pym took occasion to make this short digression, 'That the kings of Spain being powerful and wise princes, would never have parted with such a mark of absolute royalty, if they had not found in this course more advantage than in the other: and the success and prosperity of that kingdom, through the valour and industry of the Spanish nation, so much advanced since that time, do manifest the wisdom of that change.—The third observation of fraud, in perverting his authors, was this, 'The doctor cites (p. 20 of his first sermon) these words out of the same Suarez, de Legibus, Lib. v. cap. 15. fol. 300. 'Tributa esse maxime naturalia, & præ se ferre justitiam, quia exiguntur de rebus propriis;' this he produceth in proof of the just right of kings to lay tributes. And no man, that reads it, doubts, but that, in the opinion of Suarez, the king's interest and property in the goods of his subjects is the ground of that justice; but the truth is, that Suarez, in that chapter, had distributed tributes into divers kinds, of which he calls one sort, Tributum reale, and describes it thus, 'Solent ea vocari pensiones quædam, quæ penduntur regi-bus & principibus ex terris & agris, quæ a principio, ad sustentationem illorum applicata fuerunt; ipsi vero in feodum in aliis ea donarunt sub certa pensione annua, quæ, jure civili, canon appellari solet, quia certa regula & lege præscripta erat: so that the issue is, That this, which Suarez affirms for justification of one kind of tribute, which is no more than a fee-farm, or rent, due by reservation in the grant of the king's own lands, the doctor herein, worse than a Jesuit, doth wrest to the justification of all kinds of tribute exacted by imposition upon the goods of the subjects, wherein the king had no interest or property at all.—The last aggravation was drawn from his behaviour since these sermons preached, whereby he did continue still to multiply and increase his offence; yea, even since the sitting of and his being questioned in parliament upon the 4th of May last, he was so bold, as to publish the same doctrine in his own parish church of St. Giles; the points of which sermons are these: 'That the king had right to order all, as to him should seem good, without any man's consent. That the king might require, in time of necessity, aid; and if the subjects did not supply, the king might justly avenge it. That the property of estates and goods was ordinarily in the subject; but extraordinarily, that is, in case of the king's need, the king hath right to dispose them.'—These assertions in that sermon, he said, would be proved by very good testimony; and therefore he desired the lords, that it might be carefully examined; because the commons held it to be a great contempt offered to the parliament, for him to maintain that so publicly, which was here questioned. They held it a great presumption for a private divine to debate the right and power of the king; which is a matter of such a nature as to be handled only in this high court, and that with moderation and tenderness. And so he concluded that point of aggravation.—Lastly, He produced some such precedents as might testify what the opinion of our ancestors would have been, if this case had fallen out in their time: and herein, he said, he would confine himself to the reigns of the first three Edwards, two of them princes of great glory: He began with the eldest, West. I. c. 34. By this statute, 3 Edw. I. provision was made against those who should tell any false news or device, by which any discord or scandal may arise betwixt the king, his people, and great men of the kingdom. By 27 Edw. I. it was declared by the king's proclamation, sent into all the counties of England, that they that reported that he would not observe the Great Charter, were malicious people who desired to put trouble and debate betwixt the king and his subjects, and to disturb the peace and good estate of the king, the people, and the realm. In 5 Edw. II. H. de Beaumont, for giving the king ill counsel against his oath, was put from the council, and restrained from coming into the presence of the king under pain of confiscation and banishment. By 19 Edw. II. commissions were granted to inquire upon the statute of West. I. touching the spreading of news, whereby discord and scandal might grow betwixt the king and his people. In 10 Edw. III. proclamation went out to arrest all them who had presumed to report, that the king would lay upon the wools certain sums besides the ancient and due customs; where the king calls these reports, 'Exquisita mendacia, &c. que non tantum in publicam læsionem, sed in nostrum cedunt damnum, & dedecus manifestum.'—In 12 Edw. III. the king writes to the abp. of Canterbury, excusing himself for some impositions which he had laid, professing his great sorrow for it; desires the abp. by indulgences and other ways, to stir up the people to pray for him, hoping that God would enable him, by some satisfactory benefit, to make amends, and comfort his subjects for those pressures. To these temporal precedents he added an ecclesiastical precedent out of a book called 'Papilla Oculi,' being published for the instruction of confessors, in which all the articles of Magna Charta are inserted with this direction, 'hos articulos ignorare non debent, quibus incumbit confessiones audire, infra provinciam Cantuariensem'. He likewise remembered the proclamation, 8 Jacobi, for the calling in and burning of Doctor Cowell's Book, for which these reasons are given, 'For mistaking the true state of the parliament of the kingdom, and fundamental constitution and privileges thereof: for speaking irreverently of the common law, it being a thing utterly unlawful for any subject to speak or write against that law under which he liveth, and to which we are sworn, and resolve to maintain'. From these precedents he collected, that if former parliaments were so careful of false rumours and news, they would have been much more tender of such doctrines as these, which might produce great occasions of discord betwixt the king and his people.—If those, who reported the king would lay impositions, and break his laws, were thought such heinous offenders, how much more should the man be condemned, who persuaded the king he is not bound to keep those laws? If that great king was so far from challenging any right in this kind, that he professed his own sorrow and repentance for grieving his subjects, with unlawful charges; if confessors were enjoined to frame the consciences of the people to the observances of these laws, certainly such doctrine, and such a preacher as this, would have been held most strange and abominable in all those times?—The third general part was the conclusion or prayer of the commons, which consisted of 3 clauses. 1. They reserved to themselves liberty of any other accusation; and for this, he said, there was great reason, that as the doctor multiplied his offences, so they may renew their accusations. 2. They save to themselves liberty of replying to his Answer, for they had great cause to think that he, who would shift so much in offending, would shift much more in answering. 3. They desire he might be brought to examination and judgment; this they thought would be very important for the comfort of the present age, and for the security of the future against such wicked and malicious practices.' And so Mr. Pym concluded, 'That seeing the cause had strength enough to maintain itself, his humble suit to their lordships was, that they would not observe his infirmities and defects, to the diminution or prejudice of that strength.'—The conclusion of this affair will fall in the sequel.

The King's Message requiring the Lords to adjourn.] June 5. When the lords were met, the king sent to require the lord-keeper to come to him immediately. Who, after some time, being returned, his lordship signified, "That it was the king's pleasure that the house and all committees should be adjourned to the next day." After the delivery of this message, the lords, doubting that there would be a sudden dissolution of the parliament, fell into consideration of the weak estate of the kingdom, and of the friends and allies abroad, and the great strength of the house of Austria, the king of Spain's ambitious aspiring to a monarchy, and his great preparations for war. This being freely debated, the house was moved to name a select committee to present the same to his maj. and the danger likely to ensue to this kingdom, if the parliament should be now dissolved, without any happy conclusion towards resisting the impending evil. But the house being informed, by several lords of the privy-council then present, that there was no cause to apprehend or fear any sudden dissolution of the parliament, the naming of the committee was deferred for that time.

The King's Message to the Commons forbidding them to meddle with Affairs of State.] The same day the commons received a Message from the king, which the Speaker delivered in these words.—"His majesty wished them to remember the Message he last sent them, by which he set a day for the end of this session; and he commanded the Speaker to let them know, that he will certainly hold that day prefixed without alteration; and because that cannot be, if the house entertain more business of length, he requires them, that they enter not into, or proceed with any new business, which may spend greater time, or which may lay any scandal or aspersion upon the state, government, or ministers thereof."

Sir Rob. Philips. 'I perceive, that towards God, and towards man, there is little hope, after our humble and careful endeavours, seeing our sins are many and so great: I consider my own infirmities, and if ever my passions were wrought upon, it is now. This message stirs me up; especially when I remember with what moderation we have proceeded. I cannot but wonder to see the miserable strait we are now in: what have we not done to have merited? Former times have given wounds enough to the peoples liberty: we came hither full of wounds, and we have cured what we could: yet what is the return of all, but misery and desolation? What did we aim at, but to have served his maj. and to have done that which would have made him great and glorious? If this be a fault, then we are all criminous: what shall we do, since our humble purposes are thus prevented, which were not to have laid any aspersion on the government, for they tended to no other end, but to give his maj. true information of his and our danger? And to this we are enforced out of a necessary duty to the king, our country, and to posterity; but we being stopped, and stopped in such manner as we are now enjoined, must leave to be a council. I hear this with that grief as the saddest message of the greatest loss in the world. But let us still be wise, be humble, let us make a fair declaration to the king.—Let us presently inform his maj. that our firm intents were to shew him in what danger the common-wealth and state of Christendom stands; and therefore since our counsels are no better acceptable, let us beg his maj.'s leave, every man to depart home; and pray to God to divert those judgments and dangers which too fearfully and imminently hang over our heads.'

Sir John Elliot. 'Our sins are so exceeding great, that unless we speedily turn to God, God will remove himself further from us; ye know with what affection and integrity we have proceeded hitherto to have gained his majesty's heart; and, out of the necessity of our duty, were brought to that course we were in: I doubt, a misrepresentation to his majesty hath drawn this mark of his displeasure upon us: I observe in the message, amongst other sad particulars, it is conceived, that we were about to lay some aspersions on the government. Give me leave to protest, that so clear were our intentions, that we desire only to vindicate those dishonours to our king and country. It is said also, as if we cast some aspersions on his majesty's ministers: I am confident no minister, how dear soever, can'—

Here the Speaker started up from the chair, and apprehending sir John intended to fall upon the duke, &c. said, with tears in his eyes, 'There is a command laid upon me to interrupt any that should go about to lay an aspersion on the ministers of state.' Upon this sir John sat down, and

Sir Dudley Diggs said, 'That unless we may speak of these things in parliament, let us arise and be gone, or sit still and do nothing.' Hereupon there was a deep silence in the house for a while, which was broken by

Sir N. Rich, in these words: 'We must now speak, or for ever hold our peace; for us to be silent, when king and kingdom are in this calamity'

* From Rushworth, except the several Speeches, and parts of Speeches, distinguished by an Asterisk, (*) which are supplied from a MS. out of the Harleian Library.

mony, is not fit. The question is, whether we shall secure ourselves by silence, yea or no? I know it is more for our own security, but it is not for the security of those for whom we serve; let us think on them: some instruments desire a change, we fear his majesty's safety, and the safety of the kingdom; I do not say we now see it; and shall we now sit still and do nothing, and so be scattered? Let us go to the lords, and shew our dangers, that we may then go to the king together, with our representation thereof.'

Others said, 'That the speech, lately spoken by sir John Elliot, had given offence, as they feared, to his majesty.' Hereupon the house declared, "That every member of the house is free from any undutiful speech, from the beginning of the parliament to that day; and ordered, That the house be turned into a committee, to consider what is fit to be done for the safety of the kingdom; and that no man go out upon pain of being sent to the Tower." But before the Speaker left the chair, he desired leave to go forth for half an hour; and the house ordered that he might go forth, if he pleased. Then the house was turned into a grand committee, Mr. Whitby in the chair. Immediately after the Speaker was withdrawn,

Mr. Kirton said*, 'The king is as good a prince as ever reigned; it is the enemies to the commonwealth that have so prevailed with him, therefore let us aim now to discover them; and I doubt not, but God will send us hearts, hands, and swords to cut all his and our enemies throats.' And added, 'That for the Speaker to desire to leave the house in such a manner was never heard of before; and he feared would be ominous.'

Mr. Wandesford. 'I am as full of grief as others: let us recollect our English hearts, and not sit still, but do our duties: two ways are propounded, to go to the lords, or to the king. I think it is fit we go to the king, for this doth concern our liberties, and let us not fear to make a remonstrance of our rights: we are his counsellors. There are some men which call evil good, and good evil, and bitter sweet. Justice is now called popularity and faction.'

Sir Edw. Coke. 'We have dealt with that duty and moderation that never was the like, 'rebus sic stantibus,' after such a violation of the liberties of the subject; let us take this to heart. In the 30th Edw. 3. were they then in doubt in parliament to name men that misused the king? they accused John de Gaunt, the king's son, the lord Latimer, and lord Nevil, for misadvising the king, and they went to the Tower for it. Now, when there is such a downfall of the state, shall we hold our tongues? How shall we answer our duties to God and men? In the 7th and 11th of Hen. 4. there the council are complained of, and removed from the king, because they mewed him up, and dissuaded him from the common good: and why are we now to be tied from that way we were in? And why may we not name those that are the cause of all our evils? In the 4th Hen. 3. and the 27th Edw. 3. and in the 13th Rd. 2. the parliament moderated the king's prerogative; and nothing grows to abuse, but this house hath power to treat of it. What shall we do? Let us palliate no longer; if we do, God will not prosper us. I think the duke of Bucks is the cause of all our miseries, and till the king be informed thereof, we shall never go out with honour, or sit with honour here: that man is the grievance of grievances: let us set down the causes of all our disasters, and they will all reflect upon him. As for going to the lords, that is not via regia; our liberties are now impeached; we are deeply concerned: it is not via regia, for the lords are not participant with our liberties. It is not the king but the duke' [A great cry of 'Tis he, 'tis he'] that saith, 'We require you not to meddle with state government, or the ministers thereof.' Did not his maj. when prince, attend the upper house, in our prosecution of lord chancellor Bacon and the lord treasurer Middlesex?

* Mr. Kirton. 'The duke is not only admiral by sea, and hath undone all the shipping; but is also admiral by land, and hath ruined, by oppression and violence at home, and connivance abroad, the whole state of this kingdom; and his treachery, it is like, will overthrow his maj. being that he will not suffer the king to hear truth; for he that speaks truth to his maj. is ruined by the duke.'

* Mr. Sherlaug. 'Are there not persons in the court of the greatest quality that are Popish, and are favoured there? Are there not in our late armies and shipping Popish commanders, that have had the greatest and chiefest trust? Is it probable there can be any good intended, when those that use the king's power seek an utter subversion of our religion; and therefore let such be voted, at this committee, the common enemies of the kingdom.'

* Mr. Knightly. 'The duke of Bucks is not only an enemy to this state, but to all Christendom; and, I pray, let that be put to question.'

* Mr. Ashburnham. 'I cannot be silent and hear that man spoken of; and I pray God that, whilst you are speaking of him, we do not overthrow ourselves, 'Commune periculum petit commune auxilium.'

* Mr. Prynn. 'It is not the duke of Bucks alone that is the cause of these evils, but there are some other great persons worthy of blame: but he could not be drawn to name them.'

* Sir Archer Croft. 'Take away the great one and the rest will vanish.'

* Sir Rob. Philips. 'His maj. to our great misfortunes, is still drawn to give an answer to our requests, contrary to his good intentions; and to answer us by dark oracles; and it is not king Charles counselling himself, but ill counsel followed that is given him by ill counsellors. If we have named my lord of Buckingham to be the only man of guilt, he must thank himself, and his ill advices to the king, that force men to lay him open.'

Mr. Whitaker.* 'There is a commonwealth of papists, nobility, gentry, clergy and commonalty that serve the duke constantly: in Drury-Lane there are 3 families of papists there residing, for one of protestants; inasmuch as it may well be called Little Rome. He added, 'That one Morley, a divine, informed him, that sir Allen Apsley (a retainer of the duke's) had poisoned 4000 men at the Isle of Rhece, by furnishing ill victuals.'

Mr. Selden. 'Let a Declaration be drawn under 4 heads. 1. To express the house's dutiful carriage towards his majesty. 2. To tender our liberties that are violated. 3. To present what the purpose of the house was to have dealt in. 4. That that great person, (the duke,) fearing himself to be questioned, doth interpose and cause this distraction. All this time we have cast a mantle on what was done last parliament; but now, being driven again to look on that man, let us proceed with that which was then well begun; and let the Charge be renewed that was made last parliament against him, to which he made an Answer; but the particulars thereof were so insufficient, that we might demand judgment on that very answer only.'

In conclusion, the house agreed upon several heads concerning innovation in religion, the safety of the king and kingdom, misgovernment, misfortune of our late designs, with the causes of them: and whilst it was moving to be put to the question, That the duke of Buckingham shall be instanced to be the chief and principal cause of all those evils, the Speaker, who, when he had leave to go out, went privately to the king, brought this message, "That his majesty commands, for the present, they adjourn the house till to-morrow morning, and that all committees cease in the mean time." And the house was accordingly adjourned.

The King's Message to the Lords.] June 6. The lord keeper delivered a Message from the king to the lords, in these words, viz. "His maj. takes notice, to your great advantage, of the proceedings of this house, upon hearing of his Message yesterday; and he accounts it as a fair respect, that you would neither agree of any committee, nor send any Message to him, though it was in your hearts; but yielded yourselves to his majesty's message and deferred your own Resolutions, until you should meet again, at the time by him appointed. Yet his maj. takes it in extrem good part to hear what you intended; especially that you were so sensible of the inconveniences that might ensue on the breach of this parliament; which, if it had happened, or should hereafter happen, his maj. assures himself that he shall stand clear, before God and man, of the occasion. But his maj. saith, you had just reason to be sensible of the danger, considering how the state of Christendom standeth, in respect of the multitude and strength of our enemies, and weakness of our party; all which his maj. knows very exactly, and, in respect thereof, called this parliament. The particulars his maj. holds it needless to recite, especially to your lordships, since they are apparent to all men; neither will it be needful to iterate them to his maj. whose cares are most intensive upon them and the best remedies that can be thought of for them, if his subjects will do their parts. Therefore his maj. gives your lordships hearty thanks, and bids me tell you, That nothing hath been more acceptable to him, all the time of this parliament, than the dutiful and direct proceedings of this house; which he professeth hath been the chief motive to his maj. to suspend those intentions which were in him, not far from a resolution."

Another Message to the Commons by their Speaker.] The same day, the Speaker of the house of commons brought a Message from the king, which he delivered to that house, as follows; 'In my service to this house I have had many undeserved favours from you, which I shall ever with all humbleness acknowledge; but none can be greater than that testimony of your confidence yesterday shewed unto me, whereby I hope I have done nothing, or made any representation to his maj. but what is for the honour and service of this house; and may my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, before I will speak to the disadvantage of any member thereof: I have now a Message to deliver unto you: viz.'

"Whereas his maj. doth understand, that ye did conceive his last Message to restrain you in your just privileges; these are to declare his intentions, that he had no meaning of barring you from what hath been your right, but only to avoid all scandals on his counsel and actions past; and that his ministers might not be, nor himself under their names, taxed for their counsel unto his maj. and that no such particulars should be taken in hand, as would ask a longer time of consideration than what he hath prefixed, and still resolves to hold; that so, for this time, all Christendom might take notice of a sweet parting between him and his people: which if it fall out, his maj. will not be long from another meeting, when such grievances, if there be any, at their leisure and convenience may be considered."

Mr. Speaker proceeded. 'I will observe somewhat out of this message; ye may observe a very good inclination in his maj. towards this house. I was bold to take notice of that liberty ye gave me, yesterday, to go to his maj.; I know there are none here but did imagine whither I went; and but that I knew ye were desirous and content that I should leave you, I would not have desired it. Give me leave to say, this message bars you not of your right in matter, nay not in manner; but it reacheth to his counsels past, and for giving him counsel in those things which he commanded. It is not his majesty's intentions to protect any abettor of Spain. The end of this was, that we might meet again sweetly and happily.'

Sir Robert Philips, upon this message being delivered by the Speaker, said: 'I rise up with a disposition, somewhat in more hope of comfort than yesterday; yet, in regard of the uncertainty of councils, I shall not change much: in the first place I must be bold, without flattering, a thing not incident to me, to tell you, Mr. Speaker, you have not only, at all times, discharged the duty of a good Speaker, but of a good man; for which I render you many thanks. Another respect touching his majesty's Answer to our Petition; 1st, If that answer fall out to be short, I free his majesty; and I believe his resolution was to give that which we all expected: but in that, as in others, we have suffered, by reason of interposed persons between his maj. and us; but this day is, by intervenient accidents, diverted from that, but so as in time we go to his maj.: therefore let us remove those jealousies in his maj. of our proceedings, that by some men, overgrown, have been misrepresented: we have proceeded with temper, in confidence of his majesty's goodness to us and our fidelity to him: and if any have construed that what we have done hath been done out of fear, let him know, we came hither freemen, and will ever resolve to endure the worst; and they are poor men that make such interpretations of parliaments; in this way and method we proceeded; and if any thing fall out unhappily, it is not king Charles that advised himself, but king Charles misadvised by others and misled by misordered counsel; it becomes us to consider what we were doing, and now to advise what is fit to be done. We were taking consideration of the state of the kingdom, and to present to his maj. the danger he and we are in. If since, any man hath been named in particular (though I love to speak of my betters with humility) let him thank himself and his councils, but those necessary jealousies give us occasion to name him; I assure myself we shall proceed with temper, and give his maj. satisfaction, if we proceed in that way. His majesty's message is now explanatory in point of our liberties, that he intends not to bar us of our rights, and that he would not have any aspersion cast on the counsels past; let us present to his maj. shortly and faithfully, and declare our intentions that we intend not to lay any aspersions upon him; but out of necessity to prevent the imminent dangers we are surrounded with, only to present to him the affairs at home and abroad; and to desire his maj. that no interposition or misinformation of men in fault may prevail, but to expect the issue that shall be full of duty and loyalty.

Further Debate on Grievances.] The commons Journals inform us, That notice being taken of Mr. Kirtou's speech, 'That he hoped, they had all hearts, hands, and swords to cut the throats of the enemies to the king and state,' (p. 403); that expression, being this day called in question, it was resolved, 'That therein he had said nothing beyond the bounds of duty and allegiance;' and that they all concurred with him therein.

June 7. Information was given to the commons by Mr. Kirton.* 'That at this present there are 32 pieces of ordnance ready shipped for to be sent to Rotterdam; and yet the town of Weymouth, having ordnance assigned, cannot be suffered to be possessed of them though it be for the defence of this kingdom.' He also certified, 'That there were commissions now granted to 4 Londoners to go and trade with the Dunkirkers; whose information to our enemies of our designs, and which way our shipping are bent, may be of dangerous consequence to our state.' He added, 'That there was a commission in the crown-office for enjoining of excises upon this kingdom: that Burlemachi had a warrant of privy-seal in form, and, as he confessed before the committee, to disburse 30,000*l.* for buying of German horse, in which Dalbier was employed; that 1000 of them are already levied, and arms provided for them in Holland; but that he had heard they were lately countermanded. That my lord duke wrote into Germany the last day of May, in which he said, that the 1000 horse and arms, which were to come for England, should be stayed, but they were all then ready to come for Embden.'

* Mr. Parker said, 'That the intent of bringing over those German horse were to cut our throats, or else to keep us at their obedience.'

* Mr. Windham said, 'That there were yesterday, 12 German commanders of those horse come to town, and some of them in Paul's church, and those that procured them were sir W. Balfour and Mr. Dalbier; and that two ships of England were enforced to bring over those horse, to the loss of their own voyage elsewhere; and there be books of precedents come over, where the manner of the Holland excise is repeated and recited.'

* Sir John Maynard. 'Dalbier was the only cause of the overthrow of our army at the Isle of Rhé, he being an engineer; and boasted that it was his doing that got the French so cheap a victory over the English, and that they might thank him for it; therefore this fellow, being a stranger and a juggler, is decreed an unfit man to be a commander in our kingdom. And that it was confessed by Williamson, clerk of the crown, that the business of the excise is at this present in my lord-keeper's hand, and under the broad seal.' The question was then put and agreed to, 'That if any member of the house knew any thing touching the Excise, that should be set upon native commodities in this realm, and did hold his peace, he should be voted an enemy to the state, and no true Englishman.'

The King gives a more explicit Answer to the Petition of Right.] The same day a motion was made in the lords, to have a conference with the commons about the king's Answer to their Petition of Right; which being held this day, both houses agreed to address the king, 'That he would please to give a clear and satisfactory Answer, in full parl. to the said Petition." The lords sent a committee of their house, to attend the king with this message; who, after some time, being returned, they said, 'That his maj. would come to the house, that day, at 4 n the afternoon, and there receive the said request, and give an answer.'—In the mean time, another committee was appointed to put down in writing what the lord-keeper should say to the king; it was, likewise, agreed that he should stand in his place, as a peer, and there deliver this request of both houses to his maj. and afterwards go to his place of state. At the time appointed, the king came to the house of lords; and being in his robes, placed on the throne, the commons with their Speaker attending, the king commanded the clerk of parliament to cut out his former Answer which was entered in the Journal, under the Petition of Right; and, at the same time, gave unto the said clerk his present Answer. This being done, the lord-keeper stood up in his place, as a peer, and spoke as follows.—

"May it please your most excellent majesty, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in parliament assembled, taking into consideration that the good intelligence, between your maj. and your people, doth much depend upon your majesty's Answer unto their Petition of Right formerly presented: with unanimous consent, do now become most humble suitors unto your maj. that you would be pleased to give a clear and satisfactory answer thereunto in full parliament."—Whereunto the king replied,

"The Answer I have already given you was made with so good deliberation, and approved by the judgments of so many wise men, that I could not have imagined but it should have given you full satisfaction: but, to avoid all ambiguous interpretations, and to shew you there is no doubleness in my meaning, I am willing to pleasure you as well in words as in substance. Read your Petition, and you shall have such an Answer as I am sure will please you."

The Petition was read, and then the clerk said this Answer, "Soit Droit fait comme il a été désiré."

Then the king further said: "This I am sure, is full; yet no more than I granted you in my first Answer; for the meaning of that was to confirm all your liberties; knowing according to your own protestations, that you either mean nor can hurt my prerogative. And I assure you that my maxim is, That the peoples liberties strengthen the king's prerogative, and that the king's prerogative is to defend the peoples liberties. You see now how ready I have shewed myself to satisfy your demands, so that I have done my part; therefore, if this parliament hath not a happy conclusion, the sin is yours; I am free of it."

There is a Memorandum entered in the Lords Journal, 'That at the end of the king's first speech, at the Answer to the Petition, and on the conclusion of the whole, the commons gave a great and joyful applause.' Then his maj. arose and departed.—Rushworth informs us, that the commons returned to their own house with unspeakable joy; and resolved so to proceed as to express their thankfulness; and now frequent mention was made of proceeding with the bill of Subsidies; of sending the bills, which were ready, to the lords, and of perfecting the bill of Tunnage and Poundage. Sir John Strangeways also expressed his joy at the Answer; and further added, 'Let us perfect our remonstrance: king James was wont to say, He knew that by parliaments which otherwise he could never have known.'

June 10. The king sent the following Message to the commons by sir Humphrey May:—"His maj. is well pleased that your Petition of Right and his Answer, be not only recorded in both houses of parliament, but also in all the courts of Westminster: and his pleasure is that it be put in print, for his honour, and the content and satisfaction of his people; and that you proceed cheerfully to settle business for the good and reformation of the common-wealth."

Bill of five Subsidies passed.] June 12. The commons read a third time, and passed, the bill for granting 5 Subsidies to the king; and ordered that it should be carried up to the lords. Sir Edw. Coke went with it, and almost the whole house attended him.

Proceedings against Dr. Manwaring before the Lords.] June 9. The lord-keeper having reported the Declaration before mentioned, (see p. 388) and the substance of Mr. Pym's speech on the delivery of it, the lords ordered that the said Manwaring should be taken into custody, and brought to answer the Charge exhibited against him, the next morning.—June 10. The lords sent to desire the king to grant some longer time to this session; to which his maj. returned for Answer, 'That so as the great business of the nation, which was intended to go hand in hand with the Petition of Right, might receive no delay; he was contented to enlarge the time of this session, some few days, to dispatch the business of both houses.' This Answer was also sent to the commons.—The lords examined several witnesses in Dr. Manwaring's cause: the proceedings wherein we shall give, de die in diem, from their Journals.

June 11th. Roger Manwaring, doctor in divinity, being this day brought to the bar, the Declaration of the commons against him was read. Then Mr. Serjeant Crew and Mr. Attorney-General did charge him with the offences contained in the said Declaration: and opened the proofs of the said offences out of the several places of his two sermons, which he preached before the king in July last. And they did further charge the said Roger for preaching a third sermon 4th of May last, sitting the parliament, in his own parish church of St. Giles in the Fields; wherein he delivered 3 Articles to this effect, viz. 1. "That in man-

ters of Supplies, in cases of necessity, the king had right to order all, as seemed good to him, without consent of his people. 2. That the king might require loans of his people, and avenge on such as should deny. 3. That the subject hath property of his goods in ordinary; but, in extraordinary, the property was in the king.—And they charged the said Manwaring with great presumption, to dispute the right of the king and liberty of the subject, and the right of the parliaments, in his ordinary sermons.—The Charge being ended, the lord-keeper demanded of Dr. Manwaring, Whether he did acknowledge the 3 tenets to be preached by him in his sermons 4th of May: this he absolutely denied. Whereupon the clerk read the examination of H. Clayton, esq. and sir D. Norton, knt. who had affirmed some parts thereof upon their oaths. Then Dr. M. being admitted to speak for himself, protested before God, upon his salvation, “That he never had any meaning to persuade the king to alter the fundamental laws of the kingdom: his only ends were to do his maj. service; and to persuade a supply in cases of extreme necessity: he desired favour and justice to explain himself; and, because his book consists of many conclusions, that the spiritual lords might be judges of the inferences and logical deductions therein.” He further humbly besought their lordships to allow him counsel to speak for him, in point of law; time to answer the particulars; a copy of the Charge in writing; and recourse to his books at home, upon caution to attend again, when their lordships shall appoint.—The prisoner being withdrawn, and, after some debate on his requests, brought to the bar again, the lord-keeper, by direction of the house, blamed him for that he divided his judges; by requiring a part of his Charge against him to be referred to the lords the bishops; whereas the whole matter belongs to all the lords jointly.—Then his lordship told him, That the house had considered of his other requests, and granted him these, viz. 1. To have a copy of his Charge. 2. To have time till Friday morning to make his Answer. 3. To have leave to go to his own house, and to abide there with a keeper. And his lordship further told him, That if, upon recollecting himself, he shall desire access to their lordships to-morrow morning, it shall be granted him.

June 12. A Message from the commons, by sir Edw. Coke and others. The message consisted of two parts: The first concerning the Petition of Right exhibited to his maj. by both houses; that his majesty's Answer thereunto had caused an expression of exceeding great joy throughout the whole kingdom: and, that this joy might be made perpetual, to the honour of the king and comfort of his people, the commons were in consultation amongst themselves, to move their lordships, That the said Petition, with the Answer, might be entered in both houses; that it might be enrolled in all the courts of justice in Westminster hall, for a mirror to the judges: and that it might be printed amongst the statutes of this session. But that, before they could come to move their lordships to join with them in desiring the king that all this might accordingly be done, they were prevented by his majesty's gracious Message to the same effect; of which they have already made an entry in their house. The commons, therefore, desire that the same message may be entered here also; and then all the rest will necessarily follow.—The 2nd part of their Message was concerning Dr. Manwaring's Book: They said they found his majesty's command set upon the first leaf, to warrant the printing of that book; but that this they had cause to suspect, because, though they found those words struck out in the original, they still stood in the printed book. And, as they conceive the printer durst not do it without warrant, they therefore desired their lordships to examine by what means this special command was derived, from his maj. to the printer? And when their lordships have found the party, or parties, who gave the warrant, the commons demand to have him or them punished, with as much severity or more, as Manwaring himself.—Answer. “The lords do, unanimously, agree, That his majesty's said Message for the entering, enrolling, and printing of the said Petition and Answer, shall be entered here, as is desired: and, as concerning the examination who gave the warrant for printing of Dr. Manwaring's Book, their lordships will take it into consideration; and do that therein, which shall be fit.”

The same day, upon another Message of the commons to the upper house, it was ordered by their lordships, That Rd. Badger, who printed Dr. Manwaring's Book, be presently brought before their lordships; who, being brought to the bar, sworn and examined, answered, That Dr. Manwaring, himself, delivered him his two sermons to be printed, with the bishop of London's signification to that effect, under his lordship's hand: and that when the book was fully printed, Dr. M. brought the title of his said book, written with his own hand, as it is now printed. Hereupon the said printer was dismissed at this time; and the earl of Essex and the bishop of Lincoln were sent, from the house, to the bishop of London, to understand, from his lordship, what authority he had for signifying his majesty's special command for the printing of Dr. Manwaring's Book.

June 13. Dr. Manwaring being this day brought to the bar before the lords, and admitted to speak for himself unto the Charge of the commons against him, answered in effect as followeth; “First, he shewed that he was under a great burthen of sorrow and weakness here to present himself unto their lordships: and then rendered them humble thanks, for giving him leave and time to recollect himself before he made his Answer: and craved a favourable interpretation of what he was now to speak. As touching his two sermons complained of by the commons, he said, ‘That he was induced to preach them by a public removal strance of the necessities of the state at that time: and that he printed them at his majesty's special command. That the grounds of his positions, in those two sermons, are in the holy scriptures, and in the interpreters of the scriptures, and are not complained of by the commons, but the inferences only, drawn from those grounds, are questioned by them. He craved leave to explain himself in two of those positions: The first where he says, 'That kings partake of omnipotence with God,' he said, that he meant no more by this than is meant by the holy scriptures, and by the laws of the land: for the Psalms say, Dii estis; and Mr. Calvin saith, 'Reges a Deo imperium habere, & divinam potestatem in regibus residere;' wherefore to offend against kings he thought it sacrilege; and, by the laws of the kingdom, a great image of God is in the king. The other position, which he desired to explain, was touching the king's justice; where he says, in his second sermon, p. 25. 'That justice intercedes not between God and man, nor between the prince, being a father, and the people, as children: he said, 'That he meant thereby, that as man cannot requite God, nor the child the father; so the king, being dispenser of God's power, cannot be requited: but his meaning was not, that the king should not have laws.—And touching those inferences, made by the commons out of his two sermons complained of, which they impute either to sedition or malice, or to the destroying of the municipal laws of the land, or slighting of parliaments, he protested, before God and his holy angels, that they were never in his thoughts. He only thought to persuade those honourable gentlemen, who refused to conform themselves, to yield a supply unto the present and imminent necessities of the state. And, in the conclusion of his speech, he expressed his great sorrow to be thus accused; and begged pardon and mercy of their lordships, and of the commons, even for God's sake; for the king's sake, whom they so much honoured; for religion's sake; and for his calling's sake; humbly beseeching them to accept of this submission."

This being spoken by Dr. Manwaring, and he willed to withdraw; the lord archbishop of Canterbury, (Dr. Geo. Abbot) called to him to stay; and having desired leave of the house that he might say somewhat unto him, which was granted; his grace then told him, 'That he might have made some better use of the great favour which they did him, in giving him time to recollect himself before his Answer: but he saw in him (as St. Bernard saith) 'That there are some men who are miser sed non miserendi! and that he was sorry to hear such an Answer to the accusation of the commons;' but, God be thanked, the king had now wiped away what was intended by his two sermons: which sermons, his grace said, he both misliked and abhorred, and was sorry that he came only to extenuate his fault. Touching the participation, which Dr. M. gave the king with God, his grace told him, 'That it was very blasphemy; and that those words in the psalms, Dii estis, do warrant no such matter: and touching his other assertion, that there is no justice but between equals, and not between God and man; the parent and his children; nor between the king and his people; his grace told him, 'It was impious and false; and that he had thereby drawn an infamy upon us and our religion; and had given an occasion to the Jesuits to traduce us:' and shewed him, 'That the scriptures do plainly declare and prove a justice from God to man, from a parent to his children, and from a king to his people:' and further, 'That, by the laws of God and man, there was ever a commutative justice between the king and his people, for matter of coins, and a distributive justice for government.' Then putting him in mind of Anasarchis the philosopher, whom the king of Cyprus caused to be brayed in a brazen mortar for his base flattery (as a just reward for all flatterers of princes) he blamed him much for citing of Suarez, and other Jesuits in his sermons: and willed him to read the Fathers, the antient interpreters of the scriptures."

The Archbishop having ended his grave admonition, Dr. Manwaring made a short reply touching his said two assertions: and said, 'That he denied not justice and law to be between king and people; but affirmed that the king's justice could not be required: and excused himself for citing of Suarez, for in those places he spake for the king.'

The prisoner being withdrawn, the lords considered of their censure against him; and their lordships thought him worthy of severe punishment, for attributing unto the king a participation of God's omnipotence, and an absolute power of government; for his scandalous assertions against parliaments; and for branding those gentlemen, who refused the late Loans, with damnation; but, for that he so deeply protested that he had no intention to seduce the king's conscience; nor to sow sedition between his maj. and his people; nor to incense his maj. against parliaments; nor to abrogate the municipal laws, as was objected by the commons; and in regard that the king himself had protested (as was affirmed by some lords of the privy-council) that he understood him not in that sense; and for that his maj.'s gracious Answer unto the Petition of Right exhibited this parliament, hath removed those jealousies, which otherwise the subjects might justly have feared, by the assertions in those sermons: and also for that he, the said Dr. M. had shewed himself very penitent and sorry for the same: their lordships agreed of a milder sentence against him than otherwise they would.—This sentence, being first argued by parts, was afterwards read and assented unto by the general and unanimous vote of the whole house.

Judgment pronounced against Dr. Manwaring.] June 14. A message was sent to the commons, 'That the lords were ready to proceed to judgment against Dr. Manwaring; if they, with their Speaker, will come to demand the same.' Ans. 'They will come presently.' The lords being in their robes, Dr. Manwaring was brought to the bar by the serjeant at arms; and the commons with their Speaker being come, Mr. Speaker said:—"My lords; the knights, citizens, and burgesses, of the commons house of parliament, have impeached before your lordships Roger Manwaring, clerk, doctor in divinity, of divers enormous crimes; for which your lordships have convened him before you, and examined the said offences: and now, the commons have commanded me, their Speaker, to demand Judgment against him for the same."—Then the lord-keeper pronounced the judgment against him in these words, viz.

"Whereas Roger Manwaring, doctor in divinity, hath been impeached by the house of commons for misdemeanours of a high nature, in preaching two sermons before his maj. in summer last; which are since published in print, in a book intituled, 'Religion and Allegiance'; and in a third sermon preached in the parish church of St. Giles in the Fields, the 4th of May last; and their lordships have considered of the said Dr. Manwaring's Answer thereunto, expressed with tears and grief for his offence, most humbly craving pardon therefore of the lords and commons: yet nevertheless, for that this can be no satisfaction for the great offences wherewith he is charged by the said declaration, which do evidently appear in the very words of the said two sermons, their lordships have proceeded to judgment against him; and therefore this high court doth adjudge,—

1. That Roger Manwaring, doctor in divinity, shall be imprisoned during the pleasure of the house. 2. That he shall be fined at 1000*l.* to the king. 3. That he shall make such submission and acknowledgment of his offences, as shall be set down by a committee in writing, both here at the bar, and in the house of commons. 4. That he shall be suspended for the term of 3 years, from the exercising of the ministry; and in the mean time a sufficient preaching minister shall be provided out of the profits of his living to serve the cure: this suspension, and this provision of a preaching minister, shall be done by the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. 5. That he shall be disabled for ever to preach at the court hereafter. 6. That he shall be for ever disabled to have any ecclesiastical dignity or secular office. 7. That the said book is worthy to be burnt: and that for the better effecting of this, his maj. may be moved to grant a proclamation to call in the said books, that they may be all burnt accordingly, in London, and in both the universities; and for the inhibiting the printing thereof, hereafter, upon a great penalty. And this is the judgment of the lords."

Then the commons departed, and Dr. Manwaring was sent prisoner to the Fleet.—After this the bishop of Lincoln (Dr. John Williams) reported the Answer of the bishop of London, unto the Message sent him by the house the 12th of June, to this effect, viz. That the bishop of London (Dr. Geo. Mountaigne) answered, 'That he received a letter from the bishop of Bath and Wells (Dr. W. Laud) the last summer, for the printing and publishing of Dr. Manwaring's two Sermons, by his majesty's command: and thereupon his lordship did give way for the printing thereof, without further examination: and caused these words, 'Published by his Majesty's Special Command,' to be put on the front of the said book; that it might appear to be printed by his majesty's authority, and not by his lordship's approbation.' Hereupon the said bishop of Bath and Wells, being present, said, 'He could give no sudden Answer unto this report; but acknowledged that he wrote the said letter unto the bishop of London, by his majesty's express commandment; that the said two Sermons should be printed: which letter, he said, he wrote last summer from Woodstock, when his maj. was there.' And the earl of Montgomery affirmed, upon his honour, 'That he was then present at Woodstock, and heard his maj. command the bishop of Bath and Wells to cause the said Book to be printed; and that the said bishop desired his maj. to think better of it, for there were many things therein which would be very distasteful to the people.'—The duke of Bucks, also, and the earls of Suffolk and Dorset, protested, on their honours, 'That they have since heard his maj. affirm as much.'

The Commons, at a Conference, complain of a Commission of Excise.] June 16th. The lord-keeper reported to the lords the effect of a conference, which had been desired by the commons, touching a Commission, dated the 20mo Februarii, last past, and granted to several lords and others, to advise the king how to raise money, by impositions, or other ways, in the nature of Excise. After a short preamble, his ldp. commanded the clerk to read the said commission, which being done, he shewed the many inconveniences which the commons observed therein. What they chiefly stood upon was, 'That to raise money by impositions without consent of parliament, is directly against the liberty of the subject, and trencheth upon the propriety of their goods; contrary to the judgment lately given this parliament, that is, to his majesty's gracious Answer to the Petition of Right. And that the commons did demand that this patent might be damned and cancelled, the enrolment of it vacated, and the warrant also for the great seal to be cancelled: likewise, the commons did further demand, that the projectors and procurers of this Commission might be discovered and proceeded against.—This report being ended, the lords fell into a long debate on the subject of it; and at last appointed a special committee to draw up a Message to the king, from their house, for cancelling the said Commission.

Rushworth informs us, That, after granting the Petition of Right, the commons ordered, that the grand committees for Religion, Trade, Grievances, and Courts of Justice, should sit on longer. But, at the same time, that house thought proper to proceed in consideration of Grievances of most moment. And first, they fell upon the Commission for Excise, and sent to the lord keeper for it: who returned Answer, 'That he received the warrant at the council table, for the sealing thereof, and when the Commission was sealed, he returned it back to the said table.' However, the Commission was sent and read in the house, in hæc verba:

"Charles, by the grace of God, &c. To Sir Tho. Coventry, knl. lord-keeper of the great seal of England; to James earl of Malburgh, lord high treasurer of England; Henry earl of Manchester, lord president of our council; Edw. earl of Worcester, lord-keeper of our privy-seal; George duke of Buckingham, lord high admiral of England; Wm. earl of Pembroke, lord-steward of our household; Philip, earl of Montgomery, lord-chamberlain of our household; &c. greeting. Whereas the present conjuncture of the general affairs of Christendom, and our own particular interest, in giving assistance unto our oppressed allies, and for providing for the defence and safety of our own dominions and people, do call upon us to neglect nothing that may conduce to those good ends: and because monies (the principal sinews of war, and one of the first and chiefest movers in all great preparations and actions) are necessary to be provided in the first place; and we are careful the same may be raised by such ways as may best stand with the state of our kingdoms and subjects; and yet may answer the pressing occasions of the present times: we, therefore, out of the experience we have had, and for the trust we repose in our wisdoms, fidelities, and dutiful care of our service; and for the experience you have of all great causes concerning us and our state, both as they have relation to foreign parts abroad; and as to our commonwealth, and people at home, (ye being persons called by us to be of our privy-council) have thought fit, amongst those great and important matters, which so much concern us, in the first and chiefest place, to recommend this to your special care and diligence. And we do hereby authorize and appoint, and strictly will and require you, that, speedily and seriously, you enter into consideration of all the best and speediest Ways and Means ye can, for raising of monies for the most important occasions aforesaid; which, without extremest hazard to us, or dominions, and people, and to our friends, or allies, can admit of no long delay: the same to be done by impositions, or otherwise, as in your wisdoms and best judgments ye shall find to be most convenient in a case of this inevitable necessity; wherein form and circumstance may be dispensed with, rather than the substance be lost, or hazarded. And herein, our will and pleasure is, that you, or as many of you, from time to time, as can be spared from attendance upon our person, or other our necessary services, do use all diligence by your frequent meetings, and serious consultations. And when ye have brought any thing to maturity, ye make report thereof unto us, and advertise us of those things ye shall either resolve upon, or think fit to represent unto us, for the advancement of this great service; which with the greatest affection we can, we recommend to your best care and judgment; whereof ye must not fail, as ye tender our honour, and the safety of our dominions and people: and for doing hereof, these presents shall be to you, and every of you, a sufficient warrant and discharge in that behalfe: in witness whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patent. witness ourself, at Westminster, the last day of Feb. in the 3rd year of our reign. Per ipsum Regem."

The Debate relating to the D. of Buckingham renewed. Rushworth tells us, that the house, having well nigh finished the several particulars of Grievances of most moment, resumed the former motion: to declare who was the Cause of all those evils, which, in a committee of the whole house, was mentioned before. This debate was as hot as ever, and the crimes so frequently objected against the duke, were brought in afresh, as if they had never been proposed in the house. One made a distinction that the duke was the cause of some, and a cause of other Grievances. For the 1st, he instanced in the disaster of the armies, the decay of ports, trade, ships, and mariners. For the 2nd, he instanced in religion. 1st, His mother was a recusant, and a fosterer of recusants. 2ndly, He honours papists by employments, and papist captains are placed by him. And as for Arminians, York House (then the duke's residence) is a place of consultation for Montague and others, from whence is like to follow innovation in government.—Another (in pursuit of the argument, that papists were employed by the duke) named Dalhier, as the man who betrayed our men at the Isle of Rhée; where all was carried by the advice of private men, and some ill-affected in religion; that in an assault before they came away, 500 men were lost; and in the retreat Dalhier was to make a bridge, which did so intangle them, as they could make no defence: and all contrary to the advice of the rest of the commanders.

Sir Rob. Philips was of opinion to have the declaration run thus, 'We conceive the greatness and power of the duke of Buckingham is the chief cause of all these evils.' We are not in a way of charge, but of a remonstrance.—Sir J. Elliot, sir E. Coke, and Mr. Selden were positive to name the duke as the Cause of our evils; for so, said they, 'He has been already declared in the last parliament; since when, the causes are multiplied, and he hath deserved nothing better of the commonwealth.'

Sir H. May put them again in mind of the king's desire, 'That all personal aspersions might be forbore; that his maj. will take it as an argument of their moderation and judgment, if they forbear in this.'

Sir Henry Martin advised, 'That the Remonstrance be so framed, as to make it passable to his majesty's judgment and affection: let him be persuaded that it comes from a public sense, and not from private ends.' And he vindicated the duke in point of religion. 'It is true (said he) his mother is a Recusant, but never any thing more grieved him, and never did a son use more means than he to convert her, and he hath no power over her; and for his own lady, whom he found not firm in his religion, he hath used means to convert her. As for Arminians, I have often heard him protest and vow against their opinions. It is true, many that have skill therein may have some credit with him, and make use of his noble nature for their own ends. One particular I know well, that some gentlemen and preachers of great esteem were questioned for a matter, wherein there was some error in the manner, of which they were presented; I told him of them and that they were questioned, and he answered me, He would do the best he could for to countenance them.'

Sir Benj. Rudyard gave his judgment, 'That if the matter be urged home, it will proclaim the man louder than we can in words. If we name excess of power, and abuse of power, it will reach to the duke, and all others in future times; and to a gentleman of honour, nothing is so dear as sense of honour. I am witness, and do know, that he did many great and good offices to this house. If the forfeiture of my life could breed an opinion, that ye should have no occasion to complain at your next meeting, I would pawn it to you. Nor let any man say, it is fear makes us desist, we have shewed already what we dare do.'

Sir Thomas Jermin, because the employment of Dalbier had given much offence, stood up in his defence, and said, 'He had given great evidence of his trust and fidelity. When the count Palatine retired himself, and the council agreed to send a party under count Mansfield to make a head; and the king sent word to the Palatine to be present in person, Dalbier went along with him, with one more; and being in a village in Germany, a troop of 50 horse met them, and Dalbier went to the captain and said, We are in a strait, I will give you so many crowns to conduct us,' which was done, and Dalbier went along with him.

June 13th. It was agreed, upon the question, 'That the excessive power of the duke of Buckingham, is the cause of the evils and dangers to the king and kingdom; and that this be added to the Remonstrance.' But this circumstance is not mentioned in the Journal of this day, though there is somewhat the next day to that purport.

The commons about this time voted, 'That Dr. Neile, bishop of Winchester,* and Dr.

Laud, bishop of Bath and Wells, be named to be those near about the king who are suspected to be Arminians, and that they are justly reputed to be unsound in their opinions that way.'

Remonstrance of the Commons against the Duke of Bucks, as being the Cause of all Grievances.] The house being tuned again into a committee concerning the Remonstrance, Mr. Sellden proposed, 'That to the excessive power of the duke of Bucks should be added, 'The abuse of that power;' and since that abuse is the cause of these evils, that it be presented to his maj. to consider whether it be safe for the king and commonwealth, that a man of his power should be so near his maj.' This was ordered accordingly; and all the parts of the Remonstrance being agreed unto, it was perfected to be presented to the king, as follows:

'Most dread Sovereign; As with all humble thankfulness we your dutiful commons, now assembled in parliament, do acknowledge the great comfort which we have in your maj.'s pious and gracious disposition; so we think it a meet and most necessary duty, being called by your maj. to consult and advise of the great and urgent affairs of this church and commonwealth, finding them at this time in apparent danger of ruin and destruction, faithfully and dutifully to inform your maj. thereof, and with bleeding hearts and bended knees, to crave such speedy redress therein, as to your own wisdom (unto which we most humbly submit ourselves and our desires) shall seem most meet and convenient. What the multitude and potency of your maj.'s enemies are abroad? What be their malicious and ambitious ends? And how vigilant and constantly industrious they are in pursuing the same, is well known to your majesty: together with the imminent dangers threatened thereby to your sacred person and your kingdoms, and the calamities which have already fallen, and do daily increase upon your friends and allies; of which, we are well assured, your maj. is most sensible, and will accordingly, in your great wisdom, and with the gravest and most mature council, according to the exigency of the times and occasions, provide by all good means to prevent and help the same.—To which end we most humbly intreat your maj. first and especially to cast your eyes upon the miserable condition of this your own kingdom; of late so strangely impoverished and dishonoured, that unless, through your maj.'s most gracious wisdom, goodness, and justice, it be speedily raised to a better condition, it is in no little danger to become a sudden prey to the enemies thereof; and from being the most happy and flourishing, to be the most miserable and contemptible nation in the world. In the discoveries of which dangers, mischiefs, and inconveniences lying upon us, we do freely protest that it is far from our thoughts to lay the least aspersion upon your sacred person, or the least scandal upon your government; for we do, in all sincerity of our hearts, not only for ourselves, but in the name of all the commons of the realm (whom we represent) ascribe as much honour, as a most loyal and affectionate people can do, unto the best king: for so you are, and so have been pleased abundantly to express yourself, this present parliament, by your majesty's clear and satisfactory Answer to our Petition of Right; for which both ourselves and our posterity shall bless God for you, and ever preserve a thankful memory of your great goodness and justice therein. And we do also verily believe that all, or most of these things, which we shall now present unto your majesty, are either unknown unto you, or else by some of your majesty's ministers offered under such specious pretences as may hide their own bad intentions, and ill consequences of them, from your majesty. But we assure ourselves, according to the good example of your majesty's predecessors, nothing can make your maj. (being a wise and judicious prince, and above all things desirous of the welfare of your people) more in love with parliaments than this, which is one of the principal ends of calling them: that therein your maj. may be truly informed of the state of all the several parts of your kingdom, and how your officers do behave themselves in discharge of be truly reposed in them by your maj. which is scarce possible to be made known to you, but in parliament; as was declared by your father, when he was pleased to put be commons in parliament assembled in mind, That it would be the greatest unfaithfulness, and breach of duty to his maj. and of the trust committed to them by the country that could be, if in setting forth the Grievances of the people, and the condition of all the parts of his kingdom from whence they come, they did not deal clearly with him, without sparing any, how near and dear soever they were unto him, if they were hurtful or dangerous to the common-wealth.—In confidence therefore of your majesty's gracious acceptance in a matter of so high importance, and in faithful discharge of our duties; we do, first of all, most humbly beseech your maj. to take notice that howsoever we know your maj. doth, with your soul labour, that any such thing should be imagined or attempted; yet there is a general fear in our people of some secret working and combination to introduce into your kingdom some innovation and change of our holy Religion, ever precious unto us than our lives and whatever this world can afford. And our fears and jealousies herein are not merely conjectural, arising out of such certain and visible effects, as may demonstrate a true and real cause; notwithstanding the many good and wholesome laws, and the provisions made to prevent the increase of Popery within this kingdom; and notwithstanding your majesty's most gracious and satisfactory Answer to the Petition of both houses in that behalf, presented to your majesty at Oxford; (see p. 21); we find there hath followed no good execution nor effect: but on the contrary (at which your

maj. out of the quick sense of your own religious heart cannot but be in the highest measure displeased) those of that religion do find extraordinary favours and respect at court, from persons of great quality and power there, whom they continually resort unto, and in particular to the countess of Buckingham; who, herself openly professing that religion, is a known favourer and supporter of them that do the same; which we well hoped, upon your majesty's Answer to the aforesaid Petition at Oxford, should not have been permitted; nor that any of your majesty's subjects of that religion, or justly to be suspected, should be entertained in the service of your maj. or your royal consort the queen. Some likewise of that religion have had honours, offices, and places of command and authority lately conferred upon them. But that which striketh the greatest terror into the hearts of your loyal subjects concerning this, is, that letters of stay of legal proceedings against them have been procured from your maj. by what indirect means we know not: and commissions under the great seal, granted and executed for composition to be made with popish recusants, with inhibitions and restraint both to the ecclesiastical and temporal courts and officers, to intermeddle with them; which is conceived to amount to no less than a toleration, odious to God, full of dishonour and extreme disprofit to your maj. of extreme scandal and grief to your good people, and of apparent danger to the present state of your maj. and of this kingdom; their numbers, power, and insolency daily increasing in all parts of your kingdom, and especially about London and the suburbs thereof; where exceeding many families do make their abode, publicly frequent mass at Drummond-house and other places, and by their often meetings and conferences have opportunities of combining their counsels and strength together, to the hazard of your majesty's safety and the state, and most especially in these doubtful and calamitous times.—And as our fear, concerning change or subversion of Religion, is grounded upon the daily increase of Papists, the open and professed enemies thereof, for the reasons formerly mentioned: so are the hearts of your good subjects no less perplexed, when with sorrow they behold a daily growth and spreading of the faction of the Arminians, that being, as your maj. well knows, but a cunning way to bring in popery; and the professors of those opinions, the common disturbers of the protestant churches, and incendiaries in those states wherein they have gotten any head, being protestants in shew, but jesuits in opinion and practice; which caused your royal father, with so much pious wisdom, and ardent zeal, to endeavour the suppressing of them, as well at home as in the neighbour countries. And your gracious maj. imitating his most worthy example, hath openly, and by your proclamation, declared your dislike of those persons, and of their opinions; who notwithstanding are much favoured and advanced, not wanting friends even of the clergy, near to your maj.; namely, Dr. Neillé bp. of Winchester, and Dr. Laud bp. of Bath and Wells, who are justly suspected to be unsound in their opinions that way. And, it being now generally held the way to preferment and promotion in the church, many scholars do bend the course of their studies to maintain those errors; their books and opinions are suffered to be printed and published; and on the other side, the imprinting of such as are written against them, and in defence of the orthodox religion, are hindered and prohibited; and (which is a boldness almost incredible) this restraint of orthodox books, is made under colour of your majesty's formerly mentioned proclamation, the intent and meaning whereof, we know, was quite contrary.—And further, to increase our fears concerning innovation of Religion, we find, that there hath been no small labouring to remove that which is the most powerful means to strengthen and increase our own religion, and to oppose the contrary, which is the diligent teaching and instruction of the people in the true knowledge and worship of Almighty God. And therefore means hath been sought out to depress and discountenance pious, painful, and orthodox preachers; and how conformable soever, and peaceable in their disposition and carriage they be, yet the preferment of such is opposed; and, instead of being encouraged, they are molested with vexatious courses and pursuits, and hardly permitted to lecture, even in those places where are no constant preaching ministers; whereby many of your good people (whose souls in this case we beseech your maj. to commiserate) are kept in ignorance, and are apt to be easily seduced to error and superstition.—It doth not a little also increase our dangers and fears this way, to understand the miserable condition of your kingdom of Ireland; where, without controul, the popish religion is openly professed and practised in every part thereof: popish jurisdictions being there generally exercised and avowed; monasteries, nunneries, and other superstitious houses newly erected, re-edified, and replenished with men and women of several orders, and in a plentiful manner maintained at Dublin, and most of the great towns and divers other places of the kingdom: which of what ill consequence it may prove, if not seasonably repressed, we leave to your majesty's wisdom to judge: but most humbly beseech you (as we assure ourselves you will) to lay the serious consideration thereof to your royal and pious heart, and that some speedy course may be taken for redress therein.—And if now, to all these, your maj. will be pleased to add the consideration of the circumstances of time, wherein these courses, tending to the destruction of true Religion, within these your kingdoms, have been taken here; even then when the same is, with open force and violence, prosecuted in other countries, and all the reformed churches in Christendom, either depressed, or miserably distressed: we do humbly appeal unto your majesty's princely judgment, whether there be not just ground of fear that there is some secret and strong co-operating bent with the enemies of our religion abroad, for the utter extirpation thereof: and whether, if those courses be not speedily redressed, and the profession of true religion more encouraged, we can expect any other but misery and ruin speedily to fall upon us; especially if, besides the visible and apparent dangers wherewith we are compassed about, you would be pleased to remember the displeasure of Almighty God, always bent against the neglect of his holy religion, the strokes of whose divine justice we have already felt, and do still feel, with smart and sorrow, in great measure.—And besides this fear of innovation in Religion, we do, in the faithful discharge of our duties, most humbly declare to your maj. that the hearts of your people are full of fear of innovation and change of government, and accordingly possessed with extreme grief and sorrow; yet, in this point, by your majesty's late Answer to our Petition of Right, touching our liberties, much comfort and raised again out of that sadness and discontent, which they generally had conceived throughout the whole kingdom, for unduly courses which were the last year taken for raising of monies by Loans; than which (whatsoever your maj. hath been informed to the contrary) there were never any monies demanded nor paid with greater grief, and general dislike of all your faithful subjects; though many, partly out of fear, and partly out of other respect, yet most unwillingly, were drawn to yield to what was required.—The Billeting of Soldiers did much augment both their fears and grief, wherein likewise they find much comfort in your gracious Answer to our Petition of Right, and to what we presented to your maj. concerning this particular. Yet we most humbly beseech your maj. that we may inform you, that the yet continuance, and late re-inforcing of those soldiers; the conditions of their persons, many of them not being natives of this kingdom, nor of the same but of an opposite religion; the placing them upon the sea-coast, where making head among themselves, they may unite with the popish party at home, if occasion serve, and join with an invading enemy to do extreme mischief; and that they are not yet dismissed; do both still minister cause of jealousy in your loving subjects; for that the soldiers cannot be continued without exceeding great danger of the peace and safety of your kingdom.—The report of the strange and dangerous purpose of bringing in German bands and riders, would have turned our doubts into despair, and our fears into a certainty of confusion, had not your majesty's gracious Message (for which we humbly give you thanks) comforted us, by the assurance of your royal word, that they neither are, nor were intended by your maj. for any service in England: but that they were designed for other foreign employment: yet the sight of

privy-seal, by which, it seemeth, they were to be levied; the great sum of money, which upon examinations, we found to be paid for that purpose, gave us just cause of fear: and, much about the same time, there was a commission under the great seal granted unto the lords and others of the privy council, to consider of other ways for raising moneys, so particularly by impositions; which gave us just cause to suspect, that whatsoever was your majesty's gracious intentions, yet there wanted not those, that, under some colourable pretence, might secretly by this, as by other ways, contrive to change the frame both of religion and government, and thereby undermine the safety of your maj. and your kingdoms.—These men could not be ignorant, that the 'bringing in of strangers for aid hath been pernicious to most states, where they have been admitted, but to England fatal. We do bless God that hath given your maj. a wise understanding heart to discern of those courses, and that such power produceth nothing but weakness and calamity. And we beseech your maj. to pardon the vehemency of our expression, if, in the loyal and zealous affections we bear to your maj. and your service, we are bold to declare to your maj. and the whole world, That we hold it far beneath the heart of any free Englishman to think, that this victorious nation should now stand in need of German soldiers to defend their own king and the kingdom.—But when we consider the course formerly mentioned, and these things tending to an apparent change of government; the often breaches of parliament, whereby your maj. hath been deprived of the faithful counsel, and free aids of your people; the taking of Tonnage and Poundage, without grant thereof by act of parliament, ever since the beginning of your majesty's reign to this present; the standing commission, granted to the duke of Buckingham, to be general of an army in the land, in the time of peace; the discharging of faithful and sufficient officers and ministers, some from judicial places, and others from the offices and authorities, which they formerly held in the commonwealth: we cannot but, at the sight of such an apparent desolation as must necessarily follow these courses, out of the depth of sorrow, lift up our cries to heaven for help; and next, under God, apply ourselves unto your sacred maj.; who, if you could hear so many thousands speaking together, do jointly implore speedy help and reformation.—And if your maj. would be pleased to take a further view of the present state of your realm, we do humbly pray you to consider, whether the miserable disasters, and ill success that hath accompanied all your late designs and actions, particularly those of Cadiz, and the Isle of Rhee, and the last expedition to Rochel, have not extremely wasted that stock of honour that was left unto this kingdom, sometimes terrible to all other nations, and now declining into contempt beneath the meanest.—Together with our honour, we there lost those (and that not a few) who, had they lived, we might have had some better hope of recovering it again; our valiant and expert colonels, captains and commanders; and many thousand common soldiers and mariners: though we have some cause to think, that your maj. is not as yet rightly informed thereof; and that of 6 or 7000 of your subjects lost at the Isle of Rhee, your maj. received information but of a few hundreds. And this dishonour and loss hath been purchased with the consumption of above a million of treasure.—Many of the forts are exceeding weak and decayed, and want both men and munition. And here we cannot but with grief consider and complain of a strange providence (we think your maj. will rather call it treachery) that your store of powder, which, by order of your privy council, dated the 10th Dec. 1626, should be constantly 300 lasts, besides a continual supply of 20 lasts a month for ordinary expences, and were now fit (as we conceive) to be double the proportion, is at this time in the Tower (the present warrants being served) but 9 lasts and 48 pounds in all; which we tremble to think of. And that notwithstanding this extreme scarcity of powder, great quantities have been permitted to be sold out of your majesty's store, to particular persons, for private gain; whereof we have seen a certificate of 6 lasts sold since the 14th of Jun. last, and your majesty's store yet unfurnished of powder; which, by a contract made with Mr. Evelyn, by advice of your lords in parliament, ought to be supplied monthly with 20 lasts, at the rate of 3*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.* a barrel; yet your maj. hath been forced to pay above 7*l.* a barrel for powder, to be brought in from beyond seas; for which purpose, 12,400*l.* was impressed to Mr. Barlemaqui the last year; and that powder not so good as what by contract your maj. should have, by one third part: all which are most fearful and dangerous abuses.—But what the poverty, weakness, and misery of our kingdom is now grown unto by decay of trade, and destruction and loss of ships and mariners, within these 3 years, we are almost afraid to declare: and could we, by any other means, have been sure, that your maj. should any other way have had a true information thereof, we should have been doubtful to have made our weakness, and extremity of misfortune in this kind to appear: but the importunate and most pitiful complaints from all parts of the kingdom adjutting to the sea, in this kind, would rend, as we think, the stonyest heart in the world with sorrow; and the sense we have of the miserable condition your kingdom is in by reason thereof, especially, for that we see no possible means (being now shortly to end this session) how to help the same, adds such a weight of grief unto our sad thoughts, as we have not words to express it: but for your majesty's more exact information therein, we beseech you be pleased to peruse the calendar of particulars, which, with the remonstrance, we most humbly present unto your maj.—One reason amongst many of this decay of trade, and loss of ships and mar-

ners, is, The not guarding of the narrow seas; the regality whereof your maj. hath now in a manner wholly lost, being that wherein a principal part of the honour and safety of this kingdom heretofore consisted, and now having absolutely neglected it, the town of Dunkirk doth so continually rob and spoil your subjects, that we can assure your maj. if some present and effectual remedy be not forthwith provided, the whole trade of this kingdom, the shipping, mariners, and all belonging thereunto, will be utterly lost and consumed. The principal cause of which evils and dangers we conceive to be the excessive power of the duke of Buckingham, and the abuse of that power: and we humbly submit unto your majesty's excellent wisdom, whether it be safe for yourself or your kingdoms, that so great power as rests in him by sea and land, should be in the hands of any one subject whatsoever.—And as it is not safe, so sure we are, it cannot be for your service; it being impossible for one man to manage so many and weighty affairs of the kingdom as he hath undertaken, besides the ordinary duties of those offices which he holds; some of which, well-performed, would require the time and industry of the ablest men both in counsel and action, that your whole kingdom will afford, especially in these times of common danger.—And our humble desire is further, That your most excellent maj. will be pleased to take into your most princely consideration, Whether, in respect the said duke hath so abused his power, it be safe for your maj. and your kingdom, to continue him either in his great offices, or in his place of nearness and counsel about your sacred person.—And thus, in all humility, aiming at nothing but the honour of Almighty God, and the maintenance of his true religion, the safety and happiness of your most excellent maj. and the preservation and prosperity of this church and commonwealth, we have endeavoured, with faithful hearts and intentions, and in discharge of the duty we owe to your maj. and our country, to give your maj. a true representation of our present danger and pressing calamities; which we humbly beseech your maj. graciously to accept, and to take the same to heart; accounting the safety and prosperity of your people, your greatest happiness, and their love your richest treasure. A rueful and lamentable spectacle, we confess, it must needs be, to behold those ruins in so fair an house; so many diseases, and almost every one of them deadly, in so strong and well-tempered a body as this kingdom lately was: but yet we will not doubt, but that God hath reserved this honour for your maj. to restore the safety and happiness thereof, as a work worthy so excellent a prince; for whose long life and true felicity we daily pray, and that your fame and never-dying glory may be continued to all succeeding generations.”

Then a Message was sent to his maj. desiring access to his person with this Remonstrance, and the Speaker was appointed to deliver it; who much desired to be excused, but the house would not give way thereunto. Soon after the king sends a message by sir H. May, that he means to end this session on the 26th of June: whereupon the commons resolved to proceed immediately with the bill of Tonnage and Poundage.—We now return back to the lords.

The Duke of Buckingham complains of an Aspersion cast upon him. June 16. The duke of Buckingham signified to the lords, that he was informed a member of the commons had affirmed his grace did speak these words at his own table, viz. ‘Tush, it makes no matter what the commons or parliament doth; for, what out my leave and authority, they shall not be able to touch the hair of a dog.’—The duke desired leave of the lords, That he might make his protestation in the house of commons concerning that Speech, and to move that he who spoke it of him might be commanded to justify it, and his grace heard to clear himself. The lords, considering of this complaint, ordered, ‘That the duke should be left to himself to do therein as he thought proper.’ His grace gave them thanks; and protested, upon his honour, That he never had these words so much as in his thoughts: which Protestation the lords ordered to be entered in their Journal, that the duke might make use of them as he should be.

The Lords beseech the King to cancel the Commission of Excise, &c. June 16, p. m. The committee of lords, appointed to consider of the Commission of Excise, brought in a draught of a Message to be sent to the king about vacating it; which was read as follows:

“May it please your most excellent maj. Whereas there was transmitted unto us, by the house of commons, a certain patent, under the great seal, bearing date the last February, authorizing 33 of your majesty's counsellors, to consult and advise your maj. of some ways to raise money, by imposition or otherwise. And although we have received satisfaction, from some of your majesty's council, that this was no more than a commission or warrant to advise only; yet, to remove your subjects of all jealousies, and because this way of requiring advice, under the great seal, does seem unusual, we do humbly beseech your maj. to cancel the said commission, and, if it be enrolled, to vacate the same also, with the warrant; and to give the lord keeper orders to effect this with all convenient speed.”

The same committee delivered in another Message, drawn by them, to the king, signed Dr. Manwaring's Books; desiring his maj. to put out his Proclamation to call in the books, that they might be all burnt in London and Westminster, and at both the universities. Also to inhibit the reprinting of them under severe penalties, &c. Both these Messages were approved of by the lords, and ordered to be delivered to his maj. by the lord keeper, in the name of the whole house.

The Lords Exceptions to the Form of the

Subsidy Bill.] June 17. The commons had now sent up their bill of Subsidies to the lords, who had read it twice; but finding some exception, for naming the commons only in the grant, they agreed to have a conference with them about it. Accordingly a message was sent to the lower house, to desire a conference in certain matters, tending to the preservation of the good correspondency between both houses. Answered, 'They would attend presently.'—It was then agreed, 'That the lord-keeper should signify to the commons, at this conference, the great care the lords have had, in this parliament, to continue a right understanding between both houses; which was best one when nothing is intrenched upon by either house. To shew them that, in the front of the bill of Subsidies, which they lately sent up, only the commons are named; whereas in any precedents, even in the last parliament, we your maj.'s most humble and loyal subjects, in your high court of parliament, &c.' After naming the lords nor yet the commons. 'But the lords conceive this might happen, either by some slip, than done of set purpose. To move them, that the word 'commons' may be struck out; for as the commons give their subsidies for themselves, and for the representative body of the kingdom, so likewise the lords have the disposition of their own.'—This being delivered to the commons, at the conference, their committee said, 'They must make known this proposition of the lords to their noble house; and hoped speedily to return to them an Answer.' But, on their coming back, they only said, 'That there was nothing more desired than good correspondency between the lords and them; which they esteemed an earthly paradise: that they had seen their lordships proposition, for altering the bill, into consideration, and they find it a matter of more moment than to be suddenly moved on: but the next morning they would consider farther of it, and return an Answer at all convenient speed.'

June 18. A Message was brought by sir W. Coke and others, 'That the commons considered of their lordships proposal, about the Subsidy Bill; and as they had already endeavoured to keep up a good correspondency between the two houses; knowing well that it is the very heartstring of the commonwealth; so they should be ever as zealous of their lordships privileges as of their own rights.' This ambiguous answer was all the commons said; but yet the lords were content with it, and expressed great joy and comfort, as it is related in the message. There was also another conference held the same day, concerning a paper title to be given to their Petition of Right, and the enrolling and printing of the same.

This day the lord keeper reported the king's answer to the two Messages, concerning the annulling the commission of Excise, and about Dr. Manwaring's Book, "That their lordships reason to be satisfied with what was truly and rightly told them by the lords of the council, that this commission was no more than a warrant of advice, which his maj. knew would be agreeable to that time, and to the manifold occasions then in hand: but now, having a supply from the love of his people, he esteems that commission useless; and therefore, though he knows no cause why any jealousies should have risen thereby, yet, at their desires, he is content that it be cancelled; and hath commanded to bring both the commission and warrant to him, to be cancelled in his presence." As to Dr. Manwaring, his maj. said, "That he was well pleased with their request, and would order the attorney-general to prepare a proclamation accordingly."

June 19. The lord president of the council acquainted the lords, 'That his majesty had caused the Commission so much complained of by the commons, with the warrant for putting the seal to the same, to be cancelled in his presence.' His lordship openly shewed them so cancelled to the house; on which a Message was sent to the commons, along with those instruments; but with orders to bring them back again, when shewn to that house.

June 20. The Title to the Petition of Right was agreed on by the lords and commons, and approved by the king: it run in these words, 'The Petition exhibited to his majesty, by the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, concerning divers Rights and Liberties of the Subjects; with the king's most royal Answer thereunto, in full parliament.' Agreed also, 'That the king's Answer, in French, should be printed in English, for the better satisfaction of the vulgar.'

Dr. Manwaring's Submission.] June 21. Dr. Manwaring was brought to the bar, in order to read and subscribe the following Submission, which a committee of lords had drawn up for that purpose: viz.

"May it please this honourable house, I do here, in all sorrow of heart and true repentance, acknowledge the many errors and indiscretions which I have committed; in preaching and publishing those two Sermons of mine, which I called 'Religion and Allegiance,' and my great fault in falling upon this theme again, and handling the same rashly and unadvisedly, in my own parish church of St. Giles in the Fields, the 4th of May last past. I do fully acknowledge those 3 Sermons of mine, to have been full of many dangerous passages, inferences, and scandalous aspersions in most parts of the same: and I do humbly acknowledge the justice of this honourable house, in that Judgment and Sentence passed upon me for my great offence: and I do, from the bottom of my heart, crave pardon of God, the king, and this honourable house, the church, and this commonwealth in general, and those worthy persons adjudged to be rectified upon by me in particular, for these great errors and offences.—ROGER MANWARING."

After this, the doctor was led into the house of commons by the warden of the Fleet prison, where he made the same submission, on his knees, at their bar.

Debate in the Commons on the Bill for Tunnage and Poundage.] The commons had now resumed their debate on the bill for Tunnage and Poundage; in which Mr. Selden's arguments chiefly turned on these points: 'That whereas the king's counsel objected, that 1 Eliz. saith, it was granted time out of mind to the king; he feared his majesty is told so, and some body doth ascertain him so: but we may clear that; for not only 1 Eliz. but also in the statute of 1 Jac. the words 'time out of mind' is, That whereas king Hen. 7. and other his majesty's progenitors, have had some Subsidy for the guarding of the seas; and there was never a king but had some Subsidy; in that sense it is, indeed, 'time out of mind;' yet is it a matter of free gift: for public bills, the king saith, 'Le Roy le veult;' for Petitions of Right, 'Soit droit fait comme il est desiré.' For the bill of Subsidies, it is thus, 'the king heartily thanketh the subjects for their good will;' in all the bills of Tunnage and Poundage is the very same answer, save one, which was 1 Eliz. and but for that only mistake of the clerk, it hath ever the same assent as the bill of Subsidy.'

Remonstrance of the Commons to the King on that Subject.] Upon this debate it was ordered, "That a committee be appointed to draw up a Remonstrance to his majesty of the People's Rights, and of the undue taking of Tunnage and Poundage, and Impositions, without act of parliament; and to shew the reasons why the house cannot, in so short a time, prepare that bill."—The Remonstrance was as followeth:—

"Most gracious sovereign; Your majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the commons in this present parliament assembled, being in nothing more careful, than of the honour and prosperity of your majesty and the kingdom; which they know do much depend upon that happy union and relation betwixt your majesty and your people; do with much sorrow apprehend, that (by reason of the uncertainty of their continuance together, the unexpected interruptions which have been cast upon them, and the shortness of time in which your majesty hath determined to end this session) they cannot bring to maturity and perfection, divers businesses of weight, which they have taken into their consideration and resolution, as most important for the common good: amongst other things, they have taken into especial care the preparing of a bill, for the granting of your majesty such a Subsidy of Tunnage and Poundage, as might uphold your profit and revenue in as ample a manner, as their just care and respect of trade (wherein not only the prosperity, but even the life of the kingdom do consist) would permit: but being a work which will require much time and preparation, by conference with your majesty's officers, and with the merchants, not only of London, but

of other remote parts, they find it not possible to be accomplished at this time: whereas, considering it will be much more prejudicial to the right of the subject, if your maj. should continue to receive the same, without authority of law, after the determination of a session, than if there had been a recess by adjournment only; in which case, that intended grant would have related to the first day of the parliament: and assuring themselves, that your maj. is resolved to observe your royal Answer, which you have lately made to the Petition of Right of both houses of parliament; yet doubting lest your majesty may be misinformed concerning this particular case, as if you might continue to take those subsidies of tonnage and poundage, and other impositions upon merchants, without breaking that Answer; they are forced, by that duty which they owe to your maj. and to those whom they represent, to declare, 'That there ought not any imposition to be laid upon the goods of merchants, exported or imported, without common consent by act of parliament; which is the right and inheritance of your subjects, founded not only upon the most antient and original constitutions of this kingdom, but often confirmed and declared in divers statute laws.'—And for the better manifestation thereof, may it please your majesty to understand, That though your royal predecessors, the kings of this realm, have often had such subsidies and impositions granted unto them, upon divers occasions, especially for the guarding of the seas, and safeguard of merchants: yet the subjects have been ever careful to use such restrictions and limitations in those grants, as might prevent any claim to be made, as if such subsidies did proceed from duty, and not from the free gift of the subjects. And that they have heretofore used to limit a time in such grants, and for the most part but short, as for a year or two; and if it were continued longer, they have sometimes directed a certain space of cessation or intermission, that so the right of the subject might be more evident. At other times it hath been granted upon occasion of war, for a certain number of years, with proviso, That if the war was ended in the mean time, then the grant should cease: and of course it hath been sequestered into the hands of some subjects, to be employed for the guarding of the sea coasts.—It is well known by the ordinary answers of your majesty's predecessors, in their assent to the bills of Tonnage and Poundage, that it is of the nature of other subsidies, proceeding from the good-will of the subject: very many of your predecessors had it for life, and king Hen. 7. who was so far from claiming he had any right thereunto, that he granted commissions for collecting duties and customs due by law, yet he granted no commissions for receiving the subsidies of Tonnage and Poundage, until the same were granted unto him in parliament. Since that time, all the kings and queens of this realm have had the like grants for life, by the free love and good-will of the subject. And whenever the people have been grieved, by laying any impositions or other charges upon their goods and merchandizes, without authority of law (which hath been very seldom); yet, upon complaint in parliament, they have been forthwith relieved; saving in the time of your royal father, who having, through ill counsel, raised the rates and charges upon merchandizes to that height at which they now are; yet he was pleased so far forth to yield to the complaint of his people, as to offer, That if the value of those impositions, which he had set, might be made good unto him, he would bind himself and his heirs, by act of parliament, never to lay any other: which offer the commons at that time, in regard of the great burden, did not think fit to yield unto. Nevertheless, your loyal commons in this parliament, out of their especial zeal to your service, and especial regard of your pressing occasions, have taken into their consideration, so to frame a grant of Subsidy of Tonnage and Poundage to your maj. that your maj. might be the better enabled for the defence of your realm; and your subjects, by being secure from all undue charges, be the more encouraged cheerfully to proceed in their course of trade; by the increase whereof, your majesty's profit, and likewise the strength of the kingdom, would be very much augmented.—But not being now able to accomplish this their desire, there is no course left unto them, without manifest breach of their duty, both to your maj. and their country, save only to make this humble Declaration, That the receiving of Tonnage and Poundage, and other Impositions, not granted by parliament, is a breach of the fundamental liberties of this kingdom, and contrary to your majesty's royal Answer to our late Petition of Right: and therefore they do most humbly beseech your maj. to forbear any further receiving of the same; and not to take it in all part from those of your majesty's loving subjects, who shall refuse to make payment of any such charges, without warrant of law demanded. And as by this forbearance, your most excellent maj. shall manifest unto the world your royal justice, in the observation of your laws; so they doubt not but hereafter at the time appointed for their coming together again, they shall have occasion to express their great desire to advance your majesty's honour and profit."

The King prorogues the Parliament in disgust. The king being informed of these proceedings, thought proper to put a stop to them. Accordingly on the 26th of June, the day appointed for the prorogation, the Speaker was sent for to court in the morning; so that, as Rushworth says, he came not into the house till about nine o'clock. And, after prayers, whilst their new Remonstrance, concerning Tonnage and Poundage, being engrossed, was reading, the king sent for the Speaker and the whole house to attend him in the house of peers. His majesty had come unexpectedly into that house, (for the afternoon had been appointed) and neither the king nor the lords were in their robes: however, the commons, with their Speaker, being come up, his majesty, from the throne, made the following Speech to both houses.

"My lords and gentlemen; It may seem strange that I come so suddenly to end this session; therefore, before I give my assent to the bills, I will tell you the cause; though, I must avow, that I owe an account of my actions to God alone. It is known to every one, that, a while ago; the house of commons gave me a Remonstrance; how acceptable every man may judge; and for the merit of it, I will not call that in question, for I am sure no wise man can justify it.—Now, since I am well informed, that a second Remonstrance is preparing for me, to take away my profit of Tonnage and Poundage, (one of the chief maintenances of the crown) by alledging, That I have given away my right thereof by my Answer to your Petition: this is so prejudicial unto me, that I am forced to end this session some few hours before I meant it; being not willing to receive any more Remonstrances, to which I must give a harsh Answer. And, since I see, that the house of commons begin already to make false constructions of what I granted in your Petition; lest it be worse interpreted in the country, I will now make a Declaration concerning the true intent thereof.—The profession of both houses, in the time of hammering this Petition, was no ways to trench upon my prerogative; saying, 'They had neither intention or power to hurt it: therefore it must needs be conceived, that I have granted no new, but only confirmed the ancient liberties of my subjects. Yet, to shew the clearness of my intentions, that I neither repent, nor mean to recede from any thing I have promised you, I do here declare myself, That those things which have been done, whereby many have had some cause to suspect the liberties of the subjects to be trencched upon, (which indeed was the first and true ground of the Petition) shall not hereafter be drawn into example to your prejudice; and, in time to come, on the word of a king, ye shall not have the like cause to complain. But as for Tonnage and Poundage, it is a thing I cannot want; and was never intended by you to ask; never meant I am sure by me to grant.—To conclude; I command you all that are here to take notice of what I have spoken at this time, to be the true intent and meaning of what I granted you in your Petition; but especially you, my lords, the Judges, for to you only, under me, belongs the interpretation of the laws; for none of the houses of parliament, joint or separate, (what new doctrine soever may be raised) have any power either to make, or declare, a law without my consent."

After this speech was ended, which, by his majesty's special command, was ordered to be entered in the Journals of the commons, the bill of Subsidy was presented by the Speaker, standing at the bar, who made a short speech, and shewed, 'That it was the greatest gift that ever was given in so short a time.' And so craving pardon for the errors of the house, and his own, he prayed the king to give his royal assent. Then were read the titles of other bills, which were all assented to; after which the lord-keeper, by the king's command, prorogued this parliament to the 20th of October next.

The most remarkable occurrences, which happened in the interval between these two sessions of this parliament, were, that the king first set about answering the desires of his subjects, in suppressing by proclamation all Dr. Manwaring's Sermons. By another proclamation, directions were given to commissioners to compound with Popish Recusants for two parts in three of their estates upon very easy terms. Another commanded that all priests, jesuits, and others, who had taken orders, by authority of the see of Rome, should be diligently sought for, apprehended, and committed to the gaol of that county where they should be found, &c.—About this time sir R. Weston, chancellor of the exchequer, was made a peer of the realm, and lord high treasurer of England: Dr. Laud was translated from St. David's to the bishoprick of London: and sir Tho. Wentworth created baron Wentworth; all three persons greatly concerned in the sequel of these enquiries. Dr. Montagu and Dr. Manwaring, both of whom had been censured by parliament, were pardoned by the king; the former was also preferred to the bishoprick of Chichester, and the latter presented to the rectory of Stanford Rivers in Essex, and had a dispensation to hold it with his rectory of St. Giles's in the Fields.—It was about this time, also, that another expedition was designed to relieve Rochelle, then straitly besieged by the French; and a fleet being prepared for that purpose to go under the conduct of the duke of Buckingham, that nobleman was stabbed suddenly to the heart by Felton. The circumstances of this murder are too well known to need any repetition here: the actor of it is averred to have said, * That it was the parliament's late Remonstrance against the duke that made him resolve to take him off, as a public enemy of his country.

The Parliament meet again.] Oct. 1. A Proclamation came out to prorogue the parliament, from the 20th of that month, to the 20th of January following, upon which day both houses met. The first thing the commons did, was to order a revival of all committees, on public affairs. A call of the house was, likewise, ordered, on the 27th.

The Commons' Inquiry relating to the Petition of Right.] January 21. The commons proceeded to take into consideration what things the Liberty of the Subject had been invaded in, against their Petition of Right, since the end of the last session of parliament. It was further ordered, that Mr. Selden, and others, should see, if the Petition of Right and his majesty's Answer thereunto, were enrolled in the parliament rolls and courts at Westminster, as his majesty sent them word, the last session, they should be (see p. 410); and also in what manner they were entered: which was done accordingly. And, soon after, Mr. Selden reported to the house, That his majesty's speech, made the last day of the last session in the upper house, was entered, along with the Petition and Answer, by his majesty's command.

Mr. Pym moved, 'That the debate heretofore should be deferred till Tuesday next, by reason of the fewness of the house, many being not then come up.

Sir John Elliot. Since this matter is now raised, it concerns the honour of the house, and the liberties of the kingdom: It is true, it deserves to be deferred till a fuller house; but it is good to prepare things, for I find this to be a point of great consequence. I desire therefore that a select committee may both enter into consideration of this, and also how other liberties of this kingdom are invaded. I find, in the country, the Petition of Right printed indeed, but with an Answer that never gave any satisfaction. I desire a committee may consider thereof, and present it to the house: and that the printer may be sent for to be examined about it, and to declare by what warrant it was printed:' which was so ordered.

Mr. Selden. 'For this Petition of Right, it is known how lately it hath been violated since our last meeting. Our liberties for life, person, and freehold, how have they been invaded? Have not some been committed contrary to that Petition? Now we know this invasion, we must take notice of it. For liberties in estate, we know of an order made in the exchequer, That a sheriff was commanded not to execute a replevin: and men's goods are taken away, and must not be restored. And also, no man ought to lose life or limb, but by the law: and hath not one lately lost his ears? [Meaning he that was censured in the Star-Chamber by an arbitrary judgment and sentence.] Next they will take away our arms, and then our legs, and so our lives. Let all see we are sensible of this; customs creep on us: let us make a just representation thereof to his majesty.'

The king's printer being sent for, to know by what authority he suppressed the first impression of the Petition of Right, and printed another with an Addition, he answered, He was sure he had a warrant for it; but remembered not, whether it came immediately from the king, or from the lords. Upon which Mr. Selden, and 4 other members, were ordered to go home with the printer, and inform themselves of the warrant; to take a copy of it, and report the same to the house the next morning.—Accordingly, next day, Mr. Selden reported, 'That they had examined Mr. Norton and Mr. Bill, the king's printers, and found that the clerk of the house of lords had sent to them the original Petition of Right, with the king's second Answer to it (p. 409). That, during the sitting of parliament, they had printed about 1500, of which few were divulged. That the day after the session was ended, Mr. Attorney sent for Mr. Bill to his chambers, and told him, as by his majesty's own command, that these should not be published; and that the lord privy-seal (the earl of Worcester) told him as much. That soon after he was sent for to court, where Mr. Attorney told him, He must print the Petition of Right with the first Answer (p. 377) to it and his majesty's last Speech. These were given in several papers, strangely fastened together, and upon the last a warrant.

Then a question arising, Whether these papers should be sent for? it was carried in the affirmative; and that the printers should bring them along with the warrant the next morning. But this affair was put off the next day, to another time, and from thence we hear no more of it.

Complaint of Mr. Rolles.] Another but severer scrutiny was made by the commons, on the Complaint of Mr. Rolles, a merchant and a member of that house, That his goods were seized by the officers of the customs, for refusing to pay the rates by them demanded; although he told them, what was adjudged to be due by law he would pay them.—The editors of the 'Parliamentary or Constitutional History of England' inform us, "that the further proceedings on this affair, and other matters which happened in this short session of parliament, were published in the year 1707, from an account taken and collected by sir Tho. Crew, knt. father to John lord Crew. This gentleman had been Speaker of the last parliament of king James, and the first of king Charles, was a serjeant at law, and a person very eminent in his profession. His account, being much fuller than is represented in Rushworth, or any other writer, we shall chiefly follow; comparing it with the Journals of the Commons, the Historical Collections, and what are still more curious, two Manuscripts of an equal date with these times.—In the preface to sir Tho. Crew's Collection, it is said to be offered to the perusal of the public 'without any diminution, addition, remarks or application, (marginal references excepted) by his grandson John Parkhurst, esq.' but upon comparing it with the above mentioned Manuscripts, it appears that several speeches and material passages are omitted: such are properly distinguished in their order. From all these authorities we shall be able to give an exact and authentic account of this session, more remarkable than any which hath yet happened in the whole course of these enquiries."—But before we go on to this, it will be necessary to look a little into the proceedings of the lords during this period. Appeals from chancery, and some branches of privilege employed their time most part of this session. In the latter affair, the most remarkable was this:

The Lords resent the conferring of Scots and Irish Honours upon English Gentlemen.] Feb. 9. A motion was made in the house of lords, that 'Whereas divers Englishmen having obtained degrees of honour, as of earls, viscounts, and barons, within the kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland, and thereby do pretend to have place and precedence, in all commissions and meetings, above the peers of this realm; the house was to consider how this wrong might be redressed, either by an act of parliament to be passed by both houses, or by an humble Petition from them to the king; or by a joint protestation of the house against it.' A committee being appointed to take this affair immediately into consideration, they agreed on the following Proposition:—'We conceive that no foreign nobility have any right of precedence, within the realm of England, before any peer of this kingdom: yet, notwithstanding, by courtesy, precedence hath been allowed to noblemen of foreign kingdoms, according to their ranks, which it is no way our intention to alter. But in regard that, of late, many Englishmen, both by birth, estate, and abode, and the more considerable because of their great number, have had several honours in the kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland, conceived to be very disserviceable to his majesty, and prejudicial to the peers: that which the committee do, in humility, offer unto the house, is to consider what course is the fittest to be taken for applying to his maj. for remedying and redressing of this inconveniency.' Agreed unto by the whole house. Accordingly the following Petition was presented to the king for that purpose:

"A Petition by the Lords concerning the Precedency of the late created Barons, Viscounts, and Earls of Scotland and Ireland.

"To the king's most excellent majesty; In all humility, shew unto your most excellent maj. your ever loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal now in parliament assembled, That whereas the peers and nobility of this your realm of England, have heretofore used in courtesy, to afford precedence, according to the several ranks and degrees, to such of the nobility of Scotland and Ireland, as being in titles of honour above them, have, upon occasion, resorted hither, or remained here in your majesty's service; which we are most willing should be still observed, as a civility tending to the great honour of our nation:—Now, divers of the natural-born subjects of this kingdom, who, both themselves and their families, do reside and have their chief estates and possessions amongst us, having of late been created, some barons, some viscounts, and some earls, within these your kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland, do, by reason thereof, claim, as of right, to take place, and to have precedence of the peers and nobility of England, and their children, within this realm; which we conceive doth not belong unto them by any grant from your maj.; and tends both to the disservice and prejudice of your maj. and your realms, and to the great disparagement of your English nobility, as by the reasons hereto annexed may appear.—We therefore beseech your maj. of whose tender care to preserve the antient honour and dignity of your nobility we are thoroughly persuaded; that, your majesty's wisdom and goodness being so extraordinary, you will be pleased, according to the example of the best of princes and times, upon the consideration of the manifold inconveniences, which practice and observation of circumstances have brought to light, being represented unto your maj. by the nearest body of honour unto you, and nearest concerned in this, and offered with as much faith and humility as they can devise; for the avoiding of all debate and contention, which, upon this occasion, may arise either for the present or future, that some course and order may be timely settled therein by your princely wisdom, as that thereby the inconvenience of your majesty's service may be prevented; and that the prejudice and disparagement of the peers and nobility of this kingdom may be redressed."

"The Reasons alledged by the Lords.

1. "We hold it to be new, and not warranted by any ancient precedents, that subjects of this kingdom, whose habitations, estates, and possessions are principally within this your majesty's realm, should have titles of honour in other kingdoms, where they have small or no estates, and do not abide. 2. That it may be cause of great discontentment to your majesty's subjects in Ireland, that so great a number of those, who have no estates to oblige them to the defence of that kingdom, should give voices in parliament, there to make laws. As also it may be great danger to that country, if times of hazard should come. Which weighty considerations have wrought so far with your majesty's royal predecessors and the whole estate, that an act of parliament was passed, which took away great estates of land in Ireland from some of the noblest families in this kingdom, only in contemplation that their want of resi-ence there upon their lands might endanger that kingdom. 3. That it is a great disservice to your maj. and this country, that those who live amongst us, should, by foreign titles, exempt themselves from those services of trust and charge, which others of as good birth and estate here undergo daily; whereby it happeneth often, that either persons of good quality are more frequently burdened, or the charge falls upon them of meaner condition and less ability; not without prejudice to the service, and discontentment to the persons that undergo it, as also of loss to your maj. and grief to your subjects in those places where the honours are given. That although they draw to your maj. creation-money, yet they do not help nor assist there to any necessary charge or contribution. 4. That it is conceived to be contrary to the fundamental laws of these kingdoms, that any should be invested with an hereditary honour, where he hath not an estate both to oblige him and his to the care and defence of that kingdom; and make himself by that responsible to the justice of that place where his person is privileged; and of great grief to your faithful nobility of this realm. (who have yielded, out of civility and courtesy, to strangers) that they should be disturbed in those ranks and degrees, which the grace of princes, grounded upon merits, long time have settled them in, by others of their own nation of meaner quality; in whom no other cause appears but ambition to precede others, without ground of merits or estate to warrant it in these places, where they have sought tide: it being a great diminution to your nobility and their children, and the antient gentry of this kingdom. 5. That honour, both in the nature of itself, and practice of former times, being achieved, principally, by virtue and desert; and it being one of the chiefest marks by which the best of princes made impression thereof to descend, hereditarily, in the most deserving families, which was, by generous spirits, esteemed above all other rewards: we leave it unto your majesty's prudent consideration of how great inconveniencey it is to alter or lessen the value of that reward; which was of so much honour, and no charge unto your maj. and of so great contentment and ease unto your people: which may be demonstrated in many particulars too long now to rehearse.—Further, we hold it in no small degree derogatory to the very foundation of nobility itself, which is the stop and circle that compasseth the royal throne, that those who bear a title, and claim its precedency before many of us, should fall so low in the people's eyes and esteem, as to be daily subject to arrests of their persons, and all other circumstances of disrespect, which the meanest subjects undergo, being in the eye of the law but commoners.—To conclude: this our cause of grief, being, in our opinion, as to the practice of it, new and unusual; in the consequence not without danger and discontentment to your realm, and subjects of all degrees; in the nature of it contrary to the foundation of the grounds of honour laid in this kingdom; and the whole course of it breeding ill effects to the service of your majesty and the public; disvalue and contempt to nobility itself, which is the degree interposed immediately betwixt your maj. and your people: we can no where so justly appeal as to your maj. the fountain of honour, for a timely remedy against this great and growing inconvenience for the present and future. And as your majesty's honour is equally concerned in this with the interest of your kingdoms and subjects; so we doubt not, but it shall appear to the world, that your maj.'s gracious care is to reduce and maintain your nobility in their antient lustre; which shall equally tend to your majesty's service and happiness, and to our own contentment."

Feb. 19. The lord-keeper reported the king's Answer to the above Petition, to this effect: "That the matter was of weighty consequence; and as their lordships had sat some days to prepare the same, so he would take some time to consider of an Answer to it. That the form, of the Petition and manner of delivering of it was such, as he could not but interpret well of their lordships proceedings; yet he must say that it is easier to prevent an inconvenience, than redress it when it has happened."—It is probable that the disagreement then arising between the king and the house of commons, which occasioned the sudden dissolution of this parliament, was also the reason why no further answer was given to this Petition; for we meet with no more about it. And nothing else of any consequence happening in the upper house this session, we shall pass on to the transactions of the commons.

Complaint of seizing the Goods of a Member refusing to pay Tonnage. Feb. 10. The aforementioned Complaint respecting the seizing of Mr. Rolles's goods, having been made to the house, Sir Robert Philips got up and said, "By his information you see the misfortunes of these times, and how full time it was for this assembly to meet to serve his maj. and preserve ourselves; and I am confident we came hither to do both; and may all we shall do conduce to an happy end and conclusion, to the king's honour and our own safety! Great and weighty things stand deep; cast your eyes which way you please, you may see violations upon all sides: look on the liberty of the subject; look on the privilege of this house; let any say, if ever he met or saw the like violations by inferior ministers that overdo their commands. They bew the party was a parliament-man: nay, my said, if all the parliament was in him, as they would do and justify, meaning the trial of the replevin. If we suffer the liberty of the house to wither, out of fear or complacent, we shall give a wound to the happiness of this kingdom. Here the course of justice is interrupted: order was made in the exchequer for the stay of the goods; and since there a seizure, upon the approach of parliament, goods amounting unto 5000*l.* for pretended fines of 200*l.* In the 1st of king James, by reason of the sickness, that then was, the parliament was prorogued; and then there was the boldness to take Tonnage and Poundage; and, after, we questioned the men that demanded it, for there was no right to demand it. It was proceeded with perseverance in our duty to make up breaches: let a committee be appointed to consider of these duties."

Mr. Littleton. "We have had good admonitions, and we have followed them. We have a moderation preached to us in parliament, and we follow it. I would others did the like of parliament. Let the parties be sent to that violated the liberties of parliament, as they may have their doom." [This speech was occasioned by Secretary Cooke, who had used moderation might be used.]

Sir John Elliot. "I see by this relation what cause we have to be tender of the liberty of the kingdom, [and of this house] * and yet withal to retain that moderation, as to give satisfaction to the world that our hearts are fixed to serve his maj. and to free us from all jealousy. Three things are involved in this complaint. 1. The right of the particular gentleman. 2. The right of the subject. 3. The right and privilege of the house. Let the committee consider of the two former; and for the violation of the liberties of this house, let us not do less than our forefathers. Was ever the information of a member committed to a committee? Let us send for the parties: is there not here a flat denial of the restitution of the goods? Was it not also said, 'That if all the parliament were contained in him, they would do as they did? Let them be sent for.'—It was heretofore ordered that the officers of the custom-house be sent for."

Then Mr. Selden reported from the committee concerning the printing of the Petition of Right, "That there were 1500 copies printed without any Addition at all, which were published in the time of the last parliament; other copies have been printed since with additions, the former suppressed and made waste paper; which the printer did, as he said, by the command of Mr. Attorney, which he received from his maj. And the printer further said, That Mr. Attorney was with the lord privy-seal at Whitehall, and there the said lord delivered to the printer papers with divers hands to them; and on the backside were indorsed these words, 'We will and command you that these copies be printed.'"

The King's Speech on that Occasion. Jan. 23. A Message was brought by Secretary Cooke from the king to the lower house: viz. "Whereas there hath been debate in this house concerning the seizure of Merchants Goods by his maj.'s officers and ministers: his maj. willeth that any further debate or proceedings, in that case, may be forborn till to-morrow at 2 of the clock in the afternoon; when his maj. is resolved to speak with both houses in the Banqueting house at Whitehall; and hereof we are to take notice."—The king's Speech was as follows:

"My lords and gentlemen; The care I have to remove all obstacles that may hinder the good correspondency, or cause a misunderstanding betwixt me and this parliament, made me call you hither at this time, the particular occasion being a Complaint lately moved in the lower house.—For you, my lords, I am glad to take this and all other occasions, whereby you may clearly understand both my words and actions; for as you are nearest in degree, so you are the fittest witnesses for kings.—The complaint I speak of, is for staying Men's Goods that deny

* The passages in crotchets [] are supplied from the MSS. before mentioned. There are also several corrections passim, too minute to be particularized.

Tonnage and Poundage. This may have an easy and short conclusion, if my words and actions be rightly understood: for, by passing the bill as my ancestors have had it, my by-past actions will be concluded, and my future proceedings authorized: which certainly would not have been struck upon, if men had not imagined, that I had taken those duties as pertaining unto my hereditary prerogative, in which they are much deceived; for it ever was, and still is my meaning, by the gift of my people to enjoy it; and my intention in my speech at the end of the last session, was not to challenge Tonnage and Poundage as of Right, but to shew you the necessity, not the right, by which I was to take it, until you had granted it unto me: assuring myself, according to your general professions, that you wanted time and not goodwill to give it me.—Wherefore, having now opportunity, I expect that, without loss of time, you make good your former professions; and so, by passing the bill, to put an end to all questions arising from this subject; especially since I have removed the only scruple that can trouble you in this business.—To conclude: let us not be jealous one of the other's actions; for, if I had been easily moved at every occasion, the order made in the lower house, on Wednesday night last, might have made me startle: there being some shew to suspect, that you had given yourselves the liberty to be the inquisitors after complaints, the words of your order being somewhat too largely penned: but, looking into your actions, I find you only hear complainants, not seek complaints; for I am certain you neither pretend nor desire to be inquisitors of men's actions before particular complaint be made.—This I have spoken to shew you how slow I am to believe harshly of your proceedings; likewise to assure you, that the house's Resolutions, not particular men's speeches, shall make me judge well or ill; not doubting but, according to my example, you will be deaf to all ill reports or rumours concerning me, until my words and actions speak for themselves: that so this session beginning with a confidence one towards another, it may end in a perfect and good correspondence between us, which God grant."

Jan. 26. Mr. Waller informed the house of divers ships laden with Corn for Spain and other enemies countries: whereupon a committee was appointed about the trading into Spain and other Enemies Countries, and concerning the transporting Corn and Munition thither. It was thereupon ordered, that some of the privy-council should move the king about the stay of the said ships.

Debate on Grievances in Religion.] Mr. Secretary Cooke moved, 'That the bill of Tonnage and Poundage might be read: but, after some debate, it was diverted; and then the house fell upon point of Religion.'

Mr. Sherland said, 'We have a religion that is worth the loving with all our hearts. It was sealed with the blood of martyrs and kept by miracles; and now to have our noses wiped of this would grieve any heart; much more to see our religion quite taken away; designs daily made on it; and Arminianism still to increase as it doth, it maketh me not a little to admire. I am persuaded that the greater part of the nobility, clergy, and gentry are him; but it is the desires of some few that labour to bring in a new faction of their own; and as they drop into ears of his majesty, that those that oppose them, oppose his maj. putting him upon designs that stand not with public liberty; and tell him, that he may command what he listeth, and do as he pleaseth with our goods, lives and religion; whereby they have involved all good true-hearted Englishmen and Christians under the name of Puritan, and make their quarrels to be his majesty's; which is treason in the highest degree and quality.'

Mr. Rouse. 'We have of late entered into consideration of the Petition of Right, and the violation of it, and upon good reasons; for it concerns our goods, liberties and lives; but there is a right of an higher nature that preserves us far greater things, even the Eternal life, our souls, yea our God himself; a right of religion derived to us from the King of Kings, confirmed to us by the kings of this kingdom, and enacted by laws in this place, streaming down to us in the blood of the martyrs, and witnessed from heaven by miracles, even miraculous deliverances: and this right, in the name of this nation, I this day claim and desire that there may be a deep and serious consideration of the violations of it. I desire, first, it may be considered what new paintings are laid on the old face of the Whore of Babylon, to make her more lovely, and to draw more suitors to her. I desire that it may be considered how the see of Rome doth eat into our religion, and fret into the banks and walls of it, I mean the laws and statutes of this realm; especially since those laws have been made, in a manner by themselves, even by their own treasours and bloody designs; and since their popery is a confused mass of errors; casting down kings before popes; the precepts of God before men's traditions: and living and reasonable men before dead and senseless stocks and stones.—I desire that we may consider the increase of Arminianism, an error that maketh the grace of God lackey it after the will of man; that maketh sheep to keep the shepherd, and makes mortal seed of an immortal God. I desire that we may look into the very belly and bowels of the Trojan Horse, to see if there be not in it many ready to open the gates to Romish tyranny and Spanish monarchy: for an Arminian is the spawn of a Papist; and if there come the warmth of court-favour upon him, you shall see him turned into one of those frogs that spring out of the bottomless pit.—And if ye mark it well, you shall see an Arminian reaching out his hand to a Papist; a Papist to a Jesuit; a Jesuit gives one hand to the Pope, and the other hand to the king of Spain : and these men having kindled fire in our neighbours country, have now brought over some of it hither to set on flame this kingdom also.—Yet let us further search and consider the men that broke in upon the goods and liberties of this kingdom ; for by this means they make way for the taking away of our religion.—It was an old trick of the Devil, when he meant to take away Job's religion ; he begins at his goods, ' lay thy hand on all he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face.' Either they think hereby to set a distaste between prince and people, or to find some other way of Supply to avoid or break off parliaments, that so they may break in upon our religion, and bring in their own errors.—But let us do as Job did ; he held fast his religion, and then his goods were restored to him with advantage : and if we hold fast our religion, these things shall be added unto us. Let us consider the time past, how we flourished in honours and abundance, when religion flourished amongst us ; but as religion decayed, so the honour and strength of our nation decayed : when the soul of the common-wealth is dead, the body cannot long over-live it.—If a man meet a dog alone, the dog is fearful, though never so fierce by nature : but if the dog have his master with him, he will set upon that man, from whom he led before. This shews that lower natures, being backed by higher, increase in courage and strength ; and certainly man, being backed with Omnipotency, is a kind of omnipotent creature. All things are possible to him that lieth ; and where all things are possible, here is a kind of omnipotency. Wherefore, let be now the unanimous consent and resolution of us all, to make a vow and covenant, from henceforth to hold fast our God and our religion ; and then shall we from henceforth certainly expect prosperity in this kingdom and nation ; and to this covenant let every one say, Amen.

Mr. Kirton. 'This business that we have in and concerning our Religion is of dangerous consequence, if it be not strictly looked into. I think no man that sits here but is sensible in what danger it now stands, if this honourable house doth not find some present remedy for it. It is apparent to every man, that new opinions are brought in by some of our churchmen, to disturb the peace that our church was formerly ; the meaning of it can be no other than to bring in the Romish religion amongst us : for hath been ever a Jesuitical policy, first to work a disturbance, then afterwards a change. We must seek the cause ; I shall freely speak my opinion ; That this proceeds from the ambition of some of the clergy that are nigh his majesty ; for it is well known, that the church of Rome at first, and that which we now profess, were all one ; and when the ambition of the clergy begot and brought in all these differences at are now amongst us. The highest dignity at they can attain unto here in England is an archbishop ; but a cardinal's cap is not here to be had. I believe some of them affect that too well, and in some we see the effects ; how they change their opinions for advancement, and they will turn white into black, and black into white.—This being so, our endeavours must be to take away the root, and then the branches will decay of themselves. It is not the calling in of the " Appeals to Cæsar " that will do it,* for if they can get bishopricks by writing such books we shall have many more that will write books in that kind. It behoves us all, every man, according to his best ability, to employ himself for the search of these things, that we may find out the matter and the men ; that we may present them and the dangers that this kingdom stands, in by them, to his majesty ; and for my part, I, as God shall enable me, will do my best herein.

Jan. 27. The debate was resumed, when Mr. Pym spoke as follows : ' The hindrances of religion are to be enquired after, and redress to be therein taken. There are two diseases, the one old, the other new. The old, Popery. The new, Arminianism. There are 3 things to be enquired after concerning Popery. 1. Of the cessation of the execution of the laws against Popery. 2. How the Papists have been employed and countenanced. 3. The late bringing in of superstitious rites and ceremonies amongst us. For Arminianism, be advised, 1. That a way may be opened for the Truth. 2. That by the articles set forth in 1552 ; and by the catechism set forth in Edw. 6.'s days ; and by the writings of Peter Martyr, Martin Bucer, Wickcliffe, and others ; and by the constant profession sealed by the blood of so many martyrs, as Cranmer, Ridley, and others ; and by the 39 Articles set forth in queen Elizabeth's time ; and by the Articles set forth at Lambeth, as the doctrine of the church of England ; which king James sent to Dort and to Ireland, as the truth professed here. Lastly, By his majesty's Declaration and Proclamation to maintain unity in the settled religion, as appears by his proclamation, and other courses tending that way ; which are perverted and abused to the ruin and subversion of religion, which breed a fear of innovation : as also by the preferments which such have received since the last parliament, who have heretofore taught contrary to the truth. Then consider again for, what overt act those men have been countenanced and advanced, what pardons they have had for false doctrines, what manner of preaching hath been lately before the king, what suppression of books that have been written against their doctrines, and what permitting of such books as have been written for them.—The ways propounded for remedy, it is the duty of the parliament in general, and of each Christian in particular, to follow : and howsoever it is alleged, that the parliament are not judges in matters of faith, yet ought they

to know the established and fundamental truths, and the contrary to them; for parliaments have confirmed acts of general councils, which have not been received until they have been so authorized; and parliaments have enacted laws for trial of heretics by juries. The parliament punished the earl of Essex for countenancing of heretics, and there is no court can meet with these mischiefs, but the court of parliament. The convocation cannot; because it is but a provincial synod, only of the jurisdiction of Canterbury; and the power thereof is not adequate to the whole kingdom; and the convocation of York may, perhaps, not agree with that of Canterbury. The high commission cannot; for it hath its authority derived from parliament, and the derivative cannot prejudice the original; the judgment of the parliament being the judgment of the king and of the three estates of the kingdom.'

Sir F. Seymour. 'If Religion be not a rule to all our actions, what policy can we have? If God fight not for us and in our battles, the help of man is in vain. The cause of our defeats is our defects in religion, and the sins of idolatry and popery. Papists increase more now than ever, neither do they want their priests and nusses: nay, his majesty's name is used to stop proceedings against papists, and that since the last parliament; contrary to his majesty's goodness and public professions, nay, to his own proclamations and instructions to the judges; and whatsoever is done in the country is undone above.'

Sir R. Philips. 'I hold myself much bound to those gentlemen that first set this on foot; if any man be so zealously transported in this, it is for his religion, let that excuse him. Two sects are damnablely crept in to undermine king and kingdom, if not now prevented; the one antient, Popery; the other new, Arminianism. What misery befel the Jews when they broke their peace with God? What hath blasted our designs since these heresies crept in? Have we not still turned the back upon our enemies? I am afraid that God sitteth in the council of our enemies against us. Doth not God plague us with enemies abroad and destruction at home? We are become the most contemptible nation in the world: are not our miseries and our crosses daily increased? With grief do I express that fatal perishing of the late hopeful prince of Bohemia; let us bumble ourselves before God, by fasting and prayer, that we may bring him again into England to go before our armies, and that God may crown our actions and bless our counsels.'

The same day a Petition was exhibited against one Lewis, that, about the 25th of Dec. last, he said, 'The Devil take the parliament;' which was avowed by two witnesses: and though it was spoken out of parliament, yet it was resolved to be an offence unto the parliament, and it was ordered he should be sent for.

The Petition of both Houses for a Fast.] Sir N. Rich tendered a Petition concerning the Fast; whereupon it was ordered, That a conference should be desired with the lords about the Petition for a Fast, who desired to join with the lower house; and thereupon it was referred to the king accordingly, by the abp. of York, in the name of both houses; viz.

"Most gracious sovereign; It is the hearty and earnest desire of us your most dutiful subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in this present parliament assembled, that this our meeting may be abundantly blessed with all happy success in the great affairs of church and state, upon which we are to consult; and that by a clear understanding both of your majesty's goodness to us, and our faithful and loyal hearts to your person and service (all jealousies and distractions, which are apparent signs of God's displeasure and ensuing mischief, being laid aside and removed) there may, in this session, and for ever, be a perfect and most happy union and agreement between your maj. and all the estates of the your realm; but humbly acknowledging, that neither this nor any other blessing can be expected without the special favour of Almighty God; and having (upon the observation of the continued and increasing miseries of the reformed Churches abroad, whose cases will bleeding hearts we do commiserate; as likewise of the punishments already inflicted, and which are likely in great measure to fall upon ourselves) just cause to conceive, that the Divine Majesty is, for our sins, exceedingly offended with us. We do in this, and other pious respects, most dear sovereign, humbly beseech your most excellent maj. that by your royal command, not only ourselves, but all the people of this your kingdom may be specially enjoined, upon some certain day, or days, to your maj. to be prefixed, by public fasting and prayer, to seek reconciliation at the merciful hands of Almighty God; so as the prayers of your whole kingdom, joined with your majesty's princely care, and the faithful and hearty endeavours of this great council now assembled, may procure glory to Almighty God in the preservation of his true religion, much honour to your majesty, prosperity to your people, and comfort to all your maj.'s friends and allies."

The King's Answer.] To this the king gave the following Answer: "My lords and gentlemen; the chiefest motive of your Fast being the deplorable estate of the reformed churches abroad, is but too true; and my duty, so much as in us lieth, is to give them the possible help: yet certainly fighting with them more good than fasting. Though I do not wholly disallow the latter, yet I must say to you, that the custom of fasting every year, but lately begun; and I confess I am not yet satisfied with the necessity of it at this time, yet to show you how unsmoothly I do my business to go on eschewing as much as I can questions or jealousies, I do willingly grant the requests herein; but with this note, That I expect that this shall not hereafter be brought into a precedent for frequent fasts, except upon great occasions; and, for the form and time."

will advise with my lords the bishops, and then send a particular answer to both houses."

Mr. Pym came from the committee for religion, and made a motion about the Remonstrance of last session, concerning that part which toucheth Religion. And the clerk of the house answered, That, by command from the king, he delivered it to the lord privy-seal, And so the committee proceeded no further, therein.

The King's Message to hasten the Bill of Tonnage.] Mr. Secretary Cooke delivered a Message from the king, "That his majesty, understanding that the Remonstrance was called for, to take away all questions, commanded him to deliver it to the house: but hopeth you will proceed with Tonnage and Poundage, and give precedence to that business, to give an end to further dispute between him and some of his subjects; or else he shall think his speech, that was with good applause accepted, had not that good effect he expected." Here

The Commons proceed with religious Grievances.] Sir Walter Earle made a speech upon the occasion of Mr. Secretary Cooke's declaring, "That his majesty expected that the house should give his business the precedence," as followeth:—"I am of the number of those, that, at our last meeting; thought the time best spent in vindicating those rights and liberties of the subject, which had formerly been impeached and were then in most imminent danger; and in that respect thought it not amiss to postpone, for a while, the business of Religion, as a thing that rather concerned the well-being, than the being itself of this kingdom and commonwealth; religion without the commonwealth, being as an accident without a subject, or a soul without a body. Now give me leave to tell you, that religion offers itself to your first consideration at this time, challenging to herself the right of precedence, and the employment of our best endeavours; that as it was then, 'ubi dolor ibi digitus,' it may be now, 'ubi amor ibi oculus.' But let no man mistake me, as if I were less sensible of the violations of the subjects liberties (even since the last session) than any man else that sits here, whosoever he be. No, I know full well, that the cause of justice is God's cause, as well as the cause of religion: but what good will those rights and liberties do me, or any man else, that resolves to live and die a protestant? Nay, what good will they do any man, of what religion soever he be, that resolves to live and die a freeman, and not a slave; if Popery and Arminianism, joining hand in hand as they do, be a means, together with the Romish hierarchy, to bring in a Spanish tyranny amongst us; under which those laws and liberties must of necessity cease?—In the point of Religion, you see what hath been done since the last session; what declarations have been made; what persons advanced; what truths established; nay, laws confirmed by synods, national and provincial, have been called in question, and that in such a manner, as the like before hath scarce been heard of. Well, how others stand affected, I know not; but, for my own part, that which for an undoubted truth I have from the church of England heretofore received, that will I stand to; and forego my estate, my liberty, yea, my life itself, rather than forego it.—As for passing of bills, settling revenues, and the like, without settling Religion, I must confess I have no heart to it: take away my Religion, you take away my life; and not only mine, but the life of the whole state and kingdom. For I dare boldly say, never was there, in the point of substance, a more near conjunction between matter of religion and matter of state, in any kingdom in the world, than there is in this kingdom at this day. Therefore let this that I say sink a little into your consideration? and let me put you in mind of a saying worthy to be considered, that 'humana consilia castigantur, ubi cœlestibus se præferunt,' when human counsels thrust themselves in before divine, a thousand to one but they are severely punished. But, if we hold ourselves to this method by we now proposed unto you, doubtless that God which, beyond our expectations, brought as through those main difficulties the last session, will not be wanting to us in this particular, that so much concerns his own glory: however, let us do our endeavours, and leave the success to him. The sum of all that I have said unto you is this; of all the businesses that are now before you, whatsoever they be, let Religion have the precedence.'

Mr. Coriton. 'Let us not do God's business negligently: we receive his maj.'s message with all duty; for our proceedings, let us so proceed, as may soonest conduce unto his maj.'s desires. Religion concerneth the king as well as us. The unity of this house is sweet, especially in God's cause. Let us try, and try again for this: let us be resolved into a committee, and presently debate thereof.'

Sir John Elliot. 'Sir, I have always observed in the proceedings of this house, our best advantage is in order; and I was glad when that noble gentleman, my countryman, gave occasion to stay our proceedings; for I feared it would have carried us into a sea of confusion and disorder. And now having occasion to present my thoughts to you in this great and weighty business of Religion, I shall be bold to give a short expression of my own affection; and in that order, that, I hope, will conduce best to the effecting of that work, and direct our labour to an end. To enter, sir, into a particular disquisition of the writings and opinions of divines, I fear it will involve us in a labyrinth that we shall hardly get out of; and perchance hinder that way, and darken that path in which we must tread. Before we know what other men have declared, it is necessary that we should presently lay down what is truth. And, as I presume, we came not hither to dispute of Religion, far be that from the thoughts of that church that hath so long time confessed it, now to dispute it. Shall posterity think we have enjoyed our religion fourscore years almost, and are we now doubtful of the defence? God forbid. It may be, sir, and out of some things lately delivered I have not unnecessarily collected, that there is a jealousy conceived, as if we meant so to deal with matters of faith, that did not perhaps belong unto us, as to dispute of matters of faith. It is our profession; this is not to be disputed, neither will that truth be receded from this long time held; nor is that truth decayed; it is confirmed by parliament, because it was truth. And this, sir, before I come to deliver myself more particularly, give me leave, that have not yet spoken in this great cause, to give some apprehension I have of fear; for it is not in the parliament to make a new religion, neither, I hope, shall it be in any to alter the body of that truth which we now profess. I must confess, sir, amongst all those fears we have contracted, there ariseth to me not one of the least dangers in the Declaration, which is made and published in his majesty's name; and yet, sir, this conclusion, exclusively let me say, that I may not be mistaken, whatever in this, or other things, shall appear to make mention of his majesty, we have not the least suspicion of jealousy of him. We have that comfort in his piety and goodness, as if there be any misprision or error, I hope it is by those ministers about him: which not only he, but all princes are subject unto.—And to clear this, that princes are subject to misinformation, and many actions may be justified in their names, when there is no suspicion of it to be done by themselves; give me leave to look back into precedents of other times, and what I find written in those stories may be useful in this. Antiochus, of Asia, sent his letters missive to his provinces, &c.: that if they received any dispatches in his name not agreeable to justice, Ignoto se literas esse scriptas, idcirco eis non parent, as I find by Plutarch of the Great Antiochus of Asia, who saith, That princes are obnoxious to abuses of ministers, and it could not at all times be prevented; and therefore he sent messengers and letters to all his provinces, that if there were any letters or dispatches sent out in his name, that came to them, that were not warrantable by law, and agreeable to justice, it should not be conceived to be done by him; and therefore they should not give way to it. Sir, I find it in another book, and I beseech you let it be rightly apprehended, for I hope I shall be clear from misprisions; Gratian did not only note and confess the same, but added the reasons also; which the masters of the civil law can testify from their books, wherein it is thus expressed, 'Quid, inverecunda potentium instigatione, principes sæpe trahuntur ut non concedenda concedant.' 'Because that many times, with the importunity of ministers and those about them, princes are drawn to grant things not fit to be granted by them.' As it was in that, so it may be in this. I speak it to this end, to draw it to this conclusion, That if there be any thing that carrieth the title of his maj. it may be the fault of his ministers; far be it from me to have suspicion of him. And now to that particular, in that Declaration; wherein, I confess, with me, is an apprehension of more fear than I have of all the rest; for in the last particulars we heard what is said of Popery and Arminianism. It is true our faith and religion is in danger; but it is by degree. Here, sir, like an inundation, it doth break in at once, that we are in danger to be ruined and overwhelmed; for, I beseech you mark, the ground of our religion is contained in these Articles. If there be any difference of opinions, concerning the sense and interpretation of them, the bishops and clergy, in convocation, have a power admitted to them to do any thing which shall concern the continuance and maintenance of the truth professed; which truth being contained in these Articles, and these Articles being different in the sense, if there be any dispute about that, it is in them to order which way they please: and for ought I know, Popery and Arminianism may be a sense introduced by them, and then it must be received. Is this a slight thing, that the power of Religion must be drawn to the persons of those men? I honour their profession and honour their persons; but give me leave to say, the truth we profess is not men's, but God's; and God forbid that men should be made to judge of that truth. Look upon the conclusion they have made, and from thence I draw their argument. I remember a character I have seen in a diary of Edw. 6. that young prince of famous memory, wherein he doth express the condition of the bishops and clergy in his time, and saith, under his own hand-writing, 'That some for sloth, some for ignorance, some for luxury, and some for popery, are unfit for discipline and government.' Sir, I hope, it is not so with us: nay, give me leave to vindicate the honour of those men, that openly shew their hearts to the truth. There are amongst our bishops such as are fit to be made examples to all ages, who shine in virtue, like those two faithful witnesses in Heaven, of whom we may use that eulogy which Seneca did of Caius; that to their memories and merits, 'Nec hoc quidem obstat quod nostris temporibus natisint,' and to whose memory and merit I may use the saying, That the other faults are no prejudice to their virtues; who are so industrious in their works, that I hope posterity shall know there are men that up firm for the truth. But, sir, that all now are not so free, sound and orthodox in religion as they should be, witness the men complained of; and you know what power they have: witness those men nominated lately, Mr. Montague, &c. I reverence the order, I honour not the man: others may be named as well. I apprehend such fear, that should it be in their power, we may be in danger to have our whole religion overthrown. But I give this for testimony, and thus far do express myself against all the power and opposition of these men; or whosoever any opposition shall be, I trust we shall maintain the religion we profess, for in that we have been born and bred; nay, sir, if cause be, in that I hope to die. Some of these, sir, you know are masters of ceremonies, and they labour to introduce new ceremonies in the church. Some ceremonies are useful: give me leave to join in one that I hold necessary and commendable, That at the repetition of the Creed we should stand up to testify the Resolution of our hearts, that we would defend that Religion we profess; and in some churches it is added, that they did not only stand upright with their bodies, but with their swords drawn; and if cause were, I hope, to defend our prince, country, and religion, we should draw our swords against all opposers.—This I speak out of the care I have to maintain the honour of our king against those, who, I fear, by these innovations of religion, may have sought to undermine it. But, to come to the manner and method of our proceedings, having made this excursion, I desire, to the end we may avoid confusion and distractions, that we may go presently to the ground of our religion, and lay that down as a rule on which all may rest: that when that is done, it will be time to take into our consideration the breakers and offenders against this rule. But before we have laid down that, our work will be in vain: therefore, first, let us lay down the proposition, wherein we differ from the Arminians, and in that I shall be ready to deliver my opinion; and this is my humble motion.

“His majesty upon an occasion of dispute in this honourable house, about Tonnage and Poundage, was pleased to make a gracious Declaration, wherein he commended unto us the speedy finishing thereof and to give a precedence thereto. And his maj. expects rather banks than a remonstrance; yet his maj. doth not interrupt you, so that you trench not in that which belongs not to you. But his maj. still commands me to tell you, that he expects precedence of Tonnage and Poundage; assuring himself, that he hath given no occasion to put it back, and so hopeth you will not at it off.”

Mr. Long. ‘I cannot but with much sorrow speak, seeing that we are still pressed to this point. I hoped those near the chair could have truly informed his maj. of our good intentions: but we see how unhappy we are, or some about his maj. make him diffident of us.’

Sir Tho. Edmunds (treasurer of the household). ‘I am sorry this house hath given occasion of so many messages about Tonnage and Poundage, after his maj. hath given us so much satisfaction; you may perceive his maj. sensible of the neglect of his business: we at know this, should not discharge our duties, did we not persuade you to that course which should procure his majesty's good opinion of you. Yourselves are witnesses how in-lustrious his maj. was to procure you gracious laws in his father's days; and since that what enlargement he hath made of our liberties; and still we give him cause to repent him of the good he hath done. Consider how dangerous it is to alien his majesty's heart from parliaments.’

Mr. Coriton. ‘When men speak here of neglect of duty towards his maj. let them know we know no such thing, nor what they mean. I see not how we neglect the same. I see it is all our hearts desire to expedite the bill of Tonnage and Poundage in due time; our business is still put back by their messages, and the business in hand is God's; and his majesty's things are certainly amiss, and every one sees it; but woe be unto us if we present not the same to his majesty.’

Sir John Elliot spoke to the same effect.—Wherefore it was ordered, “That a committee should be appointed to pen an Answer unto his majesty's Messages, and it is their resolution to give him all expedition in his service; and that they held it not only fit to give him thanks, but farther to shew what peril we are in; and that Tonnage is their own gift, and that is to arise from themselves, and that they intend not to enter into any thing that belongs not to them.”

Jan. 29. The former part of this day was spent in debating of transporting of Corn and Victuals into Spain; and it was ordered, that a Message should be sent unto his majesty, That it is now evident, that divers ships are bound for Spain, and to desire a stay of them. His maj. answered, “That touching the said Ships he would consider of it, and send them an Answer in due time.”

After a long debate at the committee for Religion, it was resolved by the whole house, to declare their Resolution in these words following, viz.

“We the commons, now in parliament assembled, do claim, profess, and avow for truth the sense of the Articles of Religion, which were established in parliament in the reign of our late queen Elizabeth, which by public act of the church of England, and by the general and concurrent exposition of the writers of our church, have been delivered to us; and we do reject the sense of the Jesuits and Arminians, wherein they differ from us.”

Commons' Apology about Tonnage and Poundage.] Feb. 2. The Commons presented the following Apology to the king: viz.

“The Commons Apology for not passing their Bill of Tonnage and Poundage, and their Desire to proceed with Religion.

“Most gracious Sovereign; We have within these three days received from your maj. two Messages, putting us in mind of our present entering upon the consideration of a grant of Tonnage and Poundage; but the manner of possessing the house therewith being disagreeable to our orders and privileges, so that we could not proceed therein; and finding ourselves, in your majesty's name, pressed in that business, and that we should give precedency thereunto; we cannot but express some sense of sorrow, fearing lest the most hearty and forward affections, wherewith we desire to serve your maj. are not clearly represented unto you. Besides, such is the solicitous care we have of preserving ourselves in your majesty's most gracious and good opinion, that it cannot but breed much trouble in us, whenever we find ourselves (as now we are) enforced to spend that time in making our humble Apologies (from whence usually do arise long debates) which we conceive might be very profitably employed in the greater services of your maj. and the commonwealth, which we did with all diligence apply ourselves unto; and finding the extreme dangers wherewith our Religion is threatened, clearly presenting themselves to our thoughts and considerations, we thought and do think, we cannot without impiety to God, disloyalty to your maj. and unfaithfulness to those for whom we are put in trust, retard our proceedings, until something be done to secure us in this main point, which we prefer even above our lives, and all earthly things whatsoever.—And here we do with all humble thankfulness acknowledge your majesty's most pious care and princely intentions to suppress both Popery and Arminianism; the professors of the one being open enemies, and the maintainers of the other the subtle and more dangerous underminers, of the true religion of Almighty God, established within your realms and dominions; the truth of which our holy Religion, or any part thereof, as being sufficiently known, and generally received of all the members of our church (except of some schismatical persons, who have of late years taken the boldness to broach their contrary and corrupt opinions) we desire should not be called into doubt or question. But howsoever it hath pleased your maj. (to our exceeding great comfort) by many testimonies, to declare your own constant resolution to maintain the said religion; yet how your gracious purposes are therein crossed, and to what a miserable condition your whole kingdom is likely by that means to be reduced, we shall earnestly endeavour (as that which doth most nearly concern the safety and prosperity of your maj. and people) in such sort to discover, that the ruin thereby threatened unto both, may by God's blessing be prevented; being most heartily sorry, that those occasions are offered which do thus hinder our proceedings: and therefore as well for the dignity and necessity of the matter, as for that we conceive it to be the most speedy and effectual way, by uniting of all our hearts and endeavours, to dispatch all other businesses of importance (particularly those which seem more immediately to respect your majesty's profit;) we pray that our Resolutions of preferring this business before all others may be acceptable to your maj. to whom in both the matter and manner of our proceedings we desire to give all possible satisfaction."

The King's Answer.] Feb. 3. Mr. Secretary Cooke reported, 'That himself, and the rest of the committee, attended his majesty yesterday; and he said, For my part I have used all diligence to do all the commands of my master and of this house, and yet I find some exceptions have been taken at some words by me used, when I delivered the bill of Tunnage and Poundage. Indeed I used many arguments in speaking of his maj.: I said it much concerned him, and that his maj. much desires it; but this was mistaken, as if his maj. had commanded it, and I required it in his name, which I did not intend but to avoid dispute; and I said not, this was an ordinary revenue, but that this Tunnage was the means to enable his maj. to set a fleet to sea.'—After he had made his own apology, he read his majesty's Answer to the Apology of the commons in these words, viz,

"Gentlemen, This Apology being somewhat long, may by reason thereof require some time to reply unto it, since (as most of you cannot but judge) that this giveth me no satisfaction; therefore I shall give you some short notes upon it. I cannot think, that, where as you alledge that the bill of Tunnage and Poundage was brought in against the privileges of your house, that you will offer to take so much privilege from every one of your members, not to allow them the liberty to bring in any bill whatsoever, though it be in your power, when it is brought in, to do with it what you think good. And I cannot imagine your coming together, only by my power, and to treat of things that I propound unto you, can deny me that prerogative to recommend or offer any bill unto you; though, in this particular, I must profess, that this bill was not to have been offered unto you in my name, as that member of your house can bear me witness.—As for the cause of delay of my business, being Religion, there is none of you shall have a greater care for the true preservation of it than myself; which since it is confessed by your Answer, you must either think I want power (which cannot be) or that I am very ill counselled, if it be in so much danger as you affirm. Though I may say much of this point, I will say no more, that for all this I shall not stop my ears to you upon this subject, so that in form and matter you transgress not your limits. As for Tunnage and Poundage, I do not so much as desire it of greediness of the thing, being persuaded that you will make no great stop in it, when you once take it in hand, as out of a desire to put an end to those questions that do daily arise between me and some of my subjects; thinking it a strange thing, if you should give ear to those complaints, and not to take the sure and speedy way to decide them. Besides, I must think it strange, that this business of Religion should be only a hindrance of my affairs; whereas I am certainly informed, that all other things go according to their ordinary course. Therefore I must still be instant with you, that you proceed with this business of Tunnage and Poundage with diligence, not looking to be denied in so just a desire; and you must not think it strange that if I find you slack, I give you such further quickening as I shall find cause."

Sir John Elliot. 'Mr. Speaker, I confess, this hath given great satisfaction for present desires and future hopes; and howsoever I find the misinterpretation of some, and the danger of religion; yet I find his majesty's ears open, and if these things be thus as we see, that then he is not rightly counselled. I am confident we shall render his maj. an account of what he expecteth; but, sir, I apprehended a difference between his majesty's expression, and those of his ministers. First, sir, that bill was here tendered in his majesty's name, and now we find his maj. disavows it, that he did it not. What wrong is this done to his maj. and to this house, to press things in his sovereign's name, to the prejudice and distraction of us all? I think him not worthy to sit in this house.'

Mr. Speaker. 'This honourable person did explain himself, that he did not press it in his majesty's name, but only did commend it to your considerations.'

Secretary Cooke. 'I said, that in regard of the difference between his maj. and his subjects, my desire was to accommodate it.'

Sir H. May. 'If ye be too quick to except against the ministers of his maj. that serve his maj. and this house, it will discourage and stop our mouths, whose service ye daily commend.'

Mr. Kirton. 'The too great bishops named [Mountague and Laud,] are the main and great roots of all those evils, which are come upon us and our religion; let us inquire what men they have preferred of the clergy, and how.'

Mr. Coriton. 'The declaration now read came from his majesty, but it is by the advice of the clergy; and sure they have not advised him the right way, that there must be no dispute of preaching, one way or other; this is to suppress the truth: and yet the contrary professors are preferred in the church, to the grief of all good men.'

Sir Walter Earle. 'Mountague is a principal disturber of the church: he was a bachelor of divinity, I desire to know how he came to be a bishop. Two men are named in the last Remonstrance that are privy counsellors, and it is very probable, that those ecclesiastical officers did give that advice to the king.'

Sir H. May. 'I will tell you what I am privy unto in this point: true it is, these two men were named in the said Remonstrance, and this point was before the king and his council, and the king did utterly dislike such novelties; and then these two bishops being present, with tears in their eyes, protested they hated the opinions and questions, and upon their confession, on their knees, they renounced them.'

Sir James Perrott. 'It is said that these two bishops were before the council on their knees, and, with tears did disclaim the opinions: but we see their facts, Dr. Laud, bishop of London, entertained for his household chaplain one that did dispute the Arminian points, who said, What the Arminians hold and write, he would maintain and believe.' And this sir James offered to justify upon oath.

It was ordered, that the Complaint against Mountague should be taken into consideration, and that a committee should make search after Pardons granted to the clergy.

A Sub-Committee about Pardons appointed.] Feb. 4. A petition was, at the first sitting, preferred against Dr. Cosins. Mr. Sherland made report from the committee about the search for Pardons, that they had found 4 pardons sealed: 1st to Mountague, the 2nd to Dr. Cosins, the 3rd to Dr. Sibthorpe, and the 4th to Dr. Manwaring.

Sir R. Phillips. 'If ever there came here a business of the like consequence, I have lost my memory: if ever king of England was abused in his mercy, it is our king. What persons are pardoned? even the greatest enemies to the church and state, that were standing under the judgment of the parliament, and they are pardoned between parliaments: If every man be not warned to search this into the bottom, I would they were; if we neglect this, we regard nothing. You see offenders complained of, and instead of punishment, grace; the goodness of our king is thus abused. Let a select committee consider of it, and let the attorney certify what is done herein, and by whom, and I hope we shall find those original instruments which have misled his majesty.'

It was ordered that a sub-committee shall have power to send for the records and privy seal, and other incidents belonging to the Pardons, and to send to the Parties and to Mr. Attorney about his knowledge herein, and by whose instigation the Pardons were obtained; which was done accordingly.—Sir R. Phillips made report, That he went to Mr. Attorney, and found him in the Star-chamber, and acquainted him with the Message. Who answered, That he received a command from his maj. in the last long vacation, presently after the end of the last sessions, to draw a Pardon; which he delaying till Michaelmas term following, he met with the bishop of Chichester, who intimated unto him his majesty's pleasure, and required him to draw up the pardon. And Mr. Attorney desired him to advise, whether it would be any advantage to him or no. And afterwards Mr. Attorney told him, he met with a great lord, a privy counsellor (the earl of Dorset) who asked him if the Pardon for the bishop of Chichester were drawn, and desired him to dispatch it. After this Mr. Attorney said, The lord Charlton sent unto him a warrant, under the king's hand, to command him to draw the Pardon, which he did; and after it was drawn, the bishop of Winchester sent to see it, and interlined it: and whereas Mr. Attorney had drawn the Pardon but for one, Montague put four in it, viz. himself, Cosins, Sibthorpe, and Manwaring.

Feb. 5. Mr. Secretary Cooke reported; That it was his majesty's pleasure, that the Fast be kept by both houses of parliament on the 18th of this instant February, and for the whole kingdom the 20th of March next.

Information against Witherington, for aspersing the Protestant Religion.] Feb. 6. The house being informed by petition against one Witherington, who had formerly been examined before the lords of the council for depraving of our religion, and had since called the protestants, hereticks, wishing a hundred of their throats cut; and to one that had been a papist, and was lately turned to our religion, he said, he would be hanged, and otherwise disgraced him.—Whereupon it was ordered he should be sent for.

Sir R. Philips reports Mr. Attorney's Answer concerning Cosins.] The house was likewise informed, that Dr. Cosins, (a little before he had obtained his pardon) was accused to Mr. Attorney by two witnesses for speaking words against the king: whereupon it was ordered, that Mr. Attorney should be sent to about it; which was done accordingly.

Sir R. Philips returned Mr. Attorney's Answer, as followeth: 'My part is to give you an account about the affidavits against Cosins. Mr. Attorney saith, that one Mr. Heath of Grays-Inn came to him about Michaelmas term last, and affirmed, that Cosins in a public meeting said, 'That the king had nothing to do to be head of the church, and that he had no more power for to excommunicate any, than his servants that rubbed his horses heels.' The Attorney acquainted his maj. herewith, which his maj. was very unwilling to believe, that he or any man durst say so much; but conceived that the said complaint did arise from malice: yet he charged the Attorney to make a careful inquisition thereof, and if it were strongly probable, then he should repair to his majesty. After this Mr. Attorney did diligently enquire about the same, and told Mr. Heath, that the matter was found very improbable, and there was certainly some mistake in it. Whereupon there were two affidavits made, which did swear it point blank. Nevertheless Mr. Attorney sent his letters to Mr. Deane and others that were present when the words were spoken, to require them to certify, whether such words were spoken or no. Upon their certificate he found variance about these words, and thereby the business was lessened. And being demanded, if he had any directions to desist from the suit intended in the Star-chamber against Cosins; he answered, no: but said, that he casually meeting with the bishop of Winchester, told him of the said business. To which the bishop answered, it will be nothing; for King, one of them that made the affidavit, is a baggage-fellow.'

Sir John Elliot. 'It is our honour and duty not to pass over these things too slightly. I find the king's honour and right too is in question, that right which we are sworn to maintain; if I mistake not it is high-treason, and this was given upon oath, presented by the attorney to his maj. who gave him command to examine it, and then to certify his maj. of it. In ordinary felonies the law doth not allow an oath contrary to the proceedings of the king; but here against two affidavits a letter must dash them all. The attorney acquaints the bishop of Winchester with it, who takes it to be but a matter of malice. I desire the persons that made the affidavits may be sent for, and examined, and that Mr. Attorney may answer the matter why he passed it over so slightly, considering the person of the man in question, who was not only suspected, but charged as criminal, and one that is so obnoxious.'

Whereupon it was ordered, that the witness should be sent for. But for Mr. Attorney it was made questionable, whether they could send for him or no, because he did attend by writ in the upper house. Whereupon it was ordered, that intimation should be given to Mr. Attorney to be there on Monday next, to give satisfaction to the house for his not proceeding against Cosins, having so good ground for it.

Feb. 7. Sir D. Norton informed the house, that one Dr. Moore attending the bishop of Winchester upon an occasion, the bishop told him, that he had oftentimes preached before king James against popery, which was well liked of then, but now you must not do so. Whereupon the doctor answered, if occasion served, he would not spare to do the like still. To which the bishop replied, that the times were not the same, and therefore you must not do so now.

Sir R. Philips said, 'By this you may see that this bishop had a hand in setting up these ceremonies in Durham, and that he still bears good will towards them, labouring to make Durham and Winchester synonymous. This reflects upon his maj. as if his maj. should dislike that ministers, in their preaching, should reuel and repel popery.'

Sir J. Elliot replied, 'In this Laud is contracted all the danger we fear; for he that procured those pardons may be the author of those new opinions: and I doubt not but that his maj. being informed hereof, will leave him to the justice of this house; and I hope that exhalations will not raise any jealousy between his maj. and us. Let the doctor be sent for to justify it; which was done accordingly.'

Report from the Committee relating to the Sheriff of London.] Feb. 9. Sir J. Elliot reported from the committee for examination of the Merchants Business, how they had found sheriff Acton in variation and contradiction in his examination; which being conceived to contempt to the house he desired he should be sent for, to answer the same at the bar.—Mr. Goodwin said, The sheriff acknowledgeth it.

error, and humbly desired that he might once again be recalled before the committee; and if he did not then give them full contentment by his answer, he would refer himself to the wisdom and justice of the house.—This motion was strongly seconded; but in regard his abuse appeared to be so gross, and that he had so many times liberty given him to recollect his memory, and he being so great an officer in so great a city, he had all the favour that could be, and yet rejected the same, and carried himself in a very scornful manner. Wherefore it was ordered that he should be sent for as a delinquent, to answer at the bar the next morning.

Dr. Montague's Confirmation argued.] Jones the printer and his counsel were called in, to argue the business of Montague's Episcopal Confirmation. The questions were two: 1. Whether the exceptions be legal? 2. Whether the Confirmation be good? The last of these is the point touching which the house enjoined the counsel to speak. The counsel proposed a third question, What would be the fruit and effect thereof, if in law the Confirmation should prove avoid? In which the counsel said it would not extend to make him no bishop upon the point of election, but upon the point of Confirmation only, which makes him punishable, if he execute any thing concerning the bishoprick.

Sir H. Martin said, 'That the exception making void the Confirmation, doth in law work also upon the election, and likewise make that void.'

Dr. Steward said, 'The point of setting to the advocate's hand is but matter of form of court but no matter of law.'

Sir H. Martin said, 'That he would endeavour to give the house full satisfaction; and will speak with relation to the king's right and laws of the realm. The proclamation at common law should not be at Bow-Church, but the Cathedral Church of the diocese where the bishop is to be elected, and the dean and chapter and clergy of the diocese are to except, and not every one that will. The arguments that might fall thereupon are endless, and to alter a course so long settled needless; and I conceive it is plain, that the king and the law have power to deprive him of his bishoprick, if he deserve the same: therefore it were good to decline this dispute for the present, and to seek to remove him.' Which was allowed of.

Complaint relating to Tonnage.] Feb. 10. Mr. Rolls complained, 'That since the last complaint of the breach of the liberties of this house, his warehouse was locked up by one Massey a pursuivant. And that yesterday he was called forth from the committee in the Exchequer Chamber, and served with a subpoena to appear in the Star-chamber. And since he received a letter from Mr. Attorney that it was a mistake; the subpoena was read, but the letter was not suffered to be read.'

Sir R. Philips said, 'You see we are made the subject of scorn and contempt. I conceive this to be a bone thrown in by them that seek to draw a cloud over our religion, to divert or interrupt us in the preservation of it. I desire the messenger may be sent for, and examined by whose procurement this subpoena was taken forth: if those that throw these scorius upon us may go unquestioned, it is in vain to sit here.'

Sir H. May. 'This proceeds from some great error, for I will assure you this never proceeded from king or council. I therefore desire it may be searched to the bottom, for be it considered that neither king nor council have cast in this as abovesaid.'

Mr. Selden 'This is not to be reckoned as an error; for questionless this is purposely to affront us, and our own lenity is the cause of this.'

An order, that Shrimpton, the messenger that served the subpoena, be presently sent for, to the house; a committee of six are appointed to see the Information in the Star-chamber, and to examine the same and by whom the same was put in; and they shall have power to send for persons or records that may inform them.—A general Order was also agreed on, That all the committees that have power to send for parties, shall have power to command any of them as they shall think fit, to attend the house at such times as they think fit.—The privilege of the merchants that are planters here, may be taken into consideration by this committee, concerning the Information in Star-chamber.

The Sheriff of London committed to the Tower.] Mr. Sheriff Acton being called to the bar, upon his knees, saith, 'If he hath erred, it is through want of memory and ignorance; for he intended not the least dislike or distaste to any member of the house.'

Mr. Long moved he might be sent to the Tower.

Sir F. Seymour. 'That he may now be referred back to the committee to be re-examined; if then he deal not clearly, this house may proceed to further punishment.'

Mr. Selden. 'I cannot remember when we did commit a sheriff of London, but I remember when this house committed both the sheriffs of London to the Tower, for an abuse of less nature; only for countenancing of a serjeant in an arrest on a member of parliament, though they did acknowledge their faults at the bar, which this man hath not yet done. The serjeant was sent to Little-Ease; the party, at whose suit he was arrested, was committed to the Fleet, and both the sheriffs to the Tower.'

Mr. Kirtton. 'I came into this house with as good a heart to this man as any man; for I was spoken to stand for him as I came in. I promised to do what favour I could; but if he were my brother, he should go to the Tower.'

Mr. Littleton. You see the affronts, by books, by preaching, by rumours, by being daily served with process that are put upon us.

that we are become but a mere scarecrow: the neglect of our duty is the cause of this: it is high time to remedy this, or it is in vain to sit here.'—The sheriff was again called to the bar, and was, on his knees, ordered to the Tower.

Mr. Selden's Report relating to Tonnage.] Feb. 11. Mr. Selden reported concerning the process of the merchants, that Mr. Attorney gave order for the process, and that Mr. Attorney's man took forth the same for the bill; it is for these things, which depend in parliament, complained of here by the merchants. The copy of the bill brought in and read, That the merchants did plot, practise, and combine against the peace of the kingdom.—This being a business incident to Tonnage and Poundage, is ordered to be deferred until the morrow morning. Also, that report be made then of the examination of the complaints of the merchants: and that the information in the Exchequer-chamber may also be brought, which was likewise ordered, that in respect the term ends to-morrow, and the assizes to follow, and divers members, that are lawyers, of this house may be gone; it is ordered that none shall go forth of town, without the leave of the house.—Ordered also, that the Speaker's letter shall be sent for sir Edw. Coke.

Proceedings of the Committee for Religion.] Mr. Waller, at the committee for Religion, delivered a petition of the booksellers and printers written against Popery and Arminianism, and the contrary allowed of by the means of the Bishop of London; and that divers of them had been perswaded for printing orthodox books; and that licensing of books, is now only restrained to the bishop of London and his chaplains.—One of the printers said, he rendered divers books; one called, 'The Golden Spur to the Celestial Race;' and that Turner, one of the bishop of London's chaplains, said, That if ye would put out the point, that a man may be certain of his salvation, he would license the same; and notwithstanding he put out that point, yet he could not get the same licensed; whereupon.

Mr. Selden took notice, 'That the refusing of licensing books is no crime, but the licensing of bad books is a crime; or the refusing to license books, because they are written against Popery or Arminianism is a crime. There is no law to prevent the printing of any book in England, only a decree in the Star-chamber: therefore that a man shall be fined and imprisoned, and his goods taken from him, is a great invasion on the liberty of the subject.'—Thereupon he moved a law may be made in this: this is referred to a select committee to be examined.

Sir B. Rudyard. 'There be divers recantations, submissions, and sentences remaining on record, in both universities, against Arminianism, which may conduce to our end: That the Speaker's letter may be sent to the chancellor for those records,' which was ordered.

Debate concerning Pardons granted.] Mr. Sherland reported concerning the Pardons, that they have examined Dr. Sibthorp's and Cosins's Pardons; Sibthorpe solicited his own pardon, and said he would give it to the bishop of Winchester to get the king's hand to it. It is evident that the bishop of Winchester got the king's hand to Sibthorp's and Cosins's pardons, and also Montague's pardon was promised by him: that Dr. Manwaring solicited his own pardon, and the bishop of Winchester got the king's hand to his pardon. It is likewise said that the pardons were all drawn by Mr. Attorney, before there was any warrant.

Mr. Oliver Cromwell* said, 'That he heard by relation from one Dr. Beard, that Dr. Alabaster had preached flat Popery at St. Paul's Cross; and that the bishop of Winchester (Dr. Neile) commanded him, as he was his diocesan, he should preach nothing to the contrary. He said, that Manwaring, so justly censured for his sermons in this house, was, by this bishop's means, preferred to a rich living. If these are steps to church preferences, what may we not expect?'

* This is the first time this extraordinary person makes his appearance upon our stage of action. The following extract from sir Philip Warwick's Memoirs, p. 247, is very curious:—'The first time that ever I took notice of Cromwell, was in the very beginning of the parliament held in November, 1640, when I vainly thought myself a courtly young gentleman; (for we courtiers valued ourselves much upon our good cloaths) I came one morning into the house well clad, and perceived a gentleman speaking (whom I knew not) very ordinarily apparelled, for it was a plain cloth suit, which seemed to have been made by an ill country taylor; his linen was plain, and not very clean; and I remember a speck or two of blood upon his little band, which was not much larger than his collar; his hat was without a hat-band; his stature was of a good size, his sword stuck close to his side, his countenance swollen and reddish, his voice sharp and untunable, and his eloquence full of fervor. Yet I lived to see this very gentleman, by multiplied, and good successes, and by real (but usurpt, power, (having had a better taylor, and more converse among good company) in my own eye appear of a great and majestic deportment, and comely presence.'—And in Bulstrode's Memoirs, p. 192.—'This conference puts me in mind of what Mr. Hampden said to the lord Digby, in the beginning of the war. As they were going down the parliament stairs, Cromwell going just before them, the lord Digby (who was then a great man in the house of commons) asked Hampden, who that man was? for I see (saith the lord Digby) he is of our side, by his speaking so warmly this day. Upon which Mr. Hampden replied, That slovenly fellow which you see before us, if we should ever come to have a breach with the king (which God forbid) I say that sloven, in

Sir R. Philips said, 'One Dr. Marshal will relate as much said to him by the bishop of Winchester, as the bishop said to Dr. Alabaster.'

'Mr. Kirton. 'That Dr. Marshal and Dr. Beard may be sent for.' And further said, 'This bishop, though he hath leaped through many bishopricks, yet he hath left popery behind him. That Cosins frequenting the printing-house, hath caused the books of Common Prayer to be newly printed, and hath changed the word 'Minister' into the word 'Priest,' and hath put out in another place the word 'Elect.' Thus Cosins and his lord go hand in hand.'

Sir Miles Fleetwood. 'We are to give Montague his charge, and, by his book, charge him with, 1. Schism in error of doctrine. 2. Faction in point of state. 3. Matter of aggravation.'

Sir Walter Earle said, 'Qui color albus erat nunc est contrarius albo.' Dr. White hath sold his orthodox books, and bought Jesuits books, therefore let White go arm in arm with Montague.'

Sir John Elliot made report from the committee, in the examination of the complaint of the merchants; and delivered in the orders and injunctions in the exchequer; and said, 'That the merchants are not only kept from their goods by the customers, but by pretended justice in a court of justice, the exchequer. I conceive, if the judges of that court had their understanding enlightened of their error by such case, will be one of the greatest men of England—which was a prophetic speech. But Hampden knew him well, and was intimately acquainted with him.'—Some years after this, about December, 1641, Charles I. sent for archbishop Williams to Oxford, to take his opinion upon the situation of his affairs at that time; in the course of their conversation, speaking of Cromwell, the archbishop said, "That Cromwell, taken into the rebels army by his cousin Hampden, is the most dangerous enemy your majesty has; for though he is, at this time, of mean rank and use amongst them, yet he will climb higher. I knew him at Bugden, but never knew his religion. He was then a common spokesman for sectaries; and maintained their post with stubbornness. He never discoursed, as if he were pleased with your majesty and your great officers; and indeed he loves none, that are more than his equals.—Your majesty did him but justice, in repulsing a petition put up by him, against sir Thomas Steward of the Isle of Ely; but he takes all those for his enemies that would not let him undo his best friend; and above all that live, I think he is the most mindful of an injury.—His fortunes are broken, that it is impossible for him to subsist, much less to be what he aspires to, but by your majesty's bounty, or by the ruin of us all, and a common confusion. In short, every beast hath some evil properties; but Cromwell hath the

this house, they would reform the same, and the merchants thereby suddenly come by their goods.—Ordered, a select committee to be named to digest these things that have been already agitated, concerning innovation of religion, the cause of the innovation, and the remedy.

Debate on a Complaint concerning Tonnage and Poundage.] Feb. 12. At a grand committee for Tonnage and Poundage, Mr. Waller delivered a petition from Chambers, Foulkes, and Gilbourne, in complaint of an information against them in the Star-chamber about Tonnage and Poundage; and that, by the restraint of their goods, they are likely to be undone.

Mr. Coriton. 'I conceive it fit the merchants should have their goods, before we can think of the bill. Kings ought not, by the law of God, thus to oppress their subjects. I know we have a good king, and this is the advice of his wicked ministers; but there is nothing can be more dishonourable unto him.'

Sir H. May (chancellor of the Duchy). 'I shall speak my opinion, because I know not whether I shall have liberty to speak, or you to hear any more. All the proceedings of the king and his ministers was to keep the question safe, until this house should meet, and you shall find the proceeding of the Exchequer very legal; and thus much, not knowing whether I shall attain liberty to speak here again.'

Sir Tho. Edmunds (treasurer of the household). 'There is none here but would think it a hard thing that a possession should be properties of all evil beasts. My humble motion to your majesty therefore is, that either you would win him to you by promises of fair treatment, or catch him by some stratagem; and then cut him short." All which the king received with a smile, and said nothing.—Philips's Life of Abp. Williams, p. 290.

The following description of Cromwell by John Maidstone, who was a member of one of his parliaments, is also curious:—"Before I pass further, pardon me in troubling you with the character of his person; which, by reason of my nearness to him, I had opportunity well to observe. His body was well compact and strong; his stature under six foot (I believe about two inches); his head so shaped, as you might see it a storehouse, and shop both, of a vast treasury of natural parts. His temper exceedingly fiery, as I have known; but the flame of it kept down for the most part, or soon allayed with those moral endowments he had. He was naturally compassionate towards objects in distress, even to an effeminate measure; though God had made him a heart, wherein was left little room for any fear, but what was due to himself, of which there was a large proportion; yet did he exceed in tenderness towards sufferers. A larger soul, I think, hath seldom dwelt in a house of clay, than his was."—Letter in the Appendix to the 1st Volume Thurloe's State Papers, p. 763.

taken from us, without any order for sequestration; that therefore it was not to be suffered, that these few men should so unjustly disturb the government of the state: desires that there may be no interruption, but we may proceed to settle the Tunnage.'

Mr. Coriton. 'I hope we may speak here, as we may speak in heaven, and do our duties, and let not fear divert us.'

Mr. Waller. 'It is not so few as 500 merchants are threatened in this.'

Sir R. Philips moveth, 'That we may go to the king, and satisfy him of these interruptions.'

Mr. Noy. 'We cannot safely give, unless we be in possession; and the proceeding in the exchequer nullified, also the informations in the Star-chamber, and the annexations to the Petition of Right. I will not give my voice, neither will I give, unless these interruptions be declared in the bill, 'That the king hath no right, but our free gift.' If it will not be accepted, as it is fit for us to give it, we cannot help it: if it be the king's already, as by their new records it seemeth to be, we need not give it.'

Mr. Selden seconds the motion of sending a message to the exchequer; declareth a precedent of a message sent into the chancery, for stay of proceedings in a cause; and it was obeyed. And what answer soever the judges return, it cannot prejudice us: the law speaks by the records, and if these records remain, it will, to posterity, explain the law.'

Mr. Littleton. 'For the point of right, there is no lawyer so ignorant to conceive it, nor judge of the land to affirm it; is against giving to the king, or going on with the bill. In this case, by the law, a man cannot be put to a petition of right, but shall recover without petition.'

Ordered, a Message shall be sent to the court of exchequer, 'That whereas certain goods of the merchants have been stayed by injunction from that court, by a false affidavit; and that, upon examination, the customers that made the affidavit have confessed, that the goods were only stayed for duties contained in the book of rates; that therefore that court would make void the orders and affidavits in this business.'

Feb. 13. Dr. Moore called in, saith, 'That he was referred to the bishop of Winchester, to be censured for a Sermon preached by him. The bishop said, 'That he had heard him deliver many pretty passages against the papists, which pleased king James well, but he must not do so now: that he had a brother that preached against bowing at the name of Jesus, and bowing at the high altar, which he liked not; and that the communion table stood as in an ale-house, but he would have them to be set as high altars. Dr. Moore is to deliver these things, in writing, to-morrow.'

Proceedings of the Committee for religion. At the Committee for Religion, Mr. Pym in the chair,

Sir Walter Earle said, 'If we speak not now, we may for ever hold our peace; when, besides the queen's mass, there are two other masses daily in the queen's court; so that it is grown common with the out-facing Jesuits, and common in discourse, 'Will you go to mass, or have you been at mass at Somerset-house? there coming 500 at a time from mass. Desires it may be known by what warrant the Jesuits lately in Newgate were released.'

Mr. Coriton said, 'He doubts not but his majesty's intention was good, in the Declaration lately published; but he conceiveth it will be made use of only to our disadvantage. He desireth therefore the declaration may be taken into serious consideration.'

Sir Rd. Grosvenor reports the proceedings of this house against Popery the last session, and what fruits have followed thereof since, as follows:—'In this great business concerning Religion, and the stay of execution of the laws against Recusants, it will much conduce to purpose, and forward our resolutions, to call back our eyes to what was done the last session. You may remember that, amongst other businesses of weight, we then took to heart the decay of Religion; we sought after the preservation thereof, and how to maintain it in its own purity. We find that, of late years, it had been much wounded by heartening of papists, by conferring offices upon recusants. We summoned our judgments, and employed our best cares and pains for stopping the current of popery; which by such means, like a deluge, came flowing in upon us. And well did it befit the piety of this house to be so zealous for the prosperity of that, which ought to be so precious to every good man's soul, and so dear in their eyes. This we attempted by these and the like steps. 1. By that religious Petition, wherein it pleased the lords so readily to join with us. 2. By framing a bill against Recusants, which passed both houses; whereby his maj. had been much enriched, being enabled to compass his dues from them, and to avoid their deceits in defrauding him thereof. 3. By informing him of the numbers and particulars; and by petitioning him to remove all papists and popishly-affected people from the court, from places of trust, and from places of power. 4. By examining the dangers and inconveniences of these late Commissions and Instructions granted forth, for the compounding with Recusants for their estates and forfeitures. 5. By framing a Charge to usher up Mr. Montague to the lords; not to his seat amongst the reverend society of bishops, but to the bar, as an offender against that house, this house, and the whole church of God. But what good hath our zeal brought to religion, what profit to the church? We all know, and with thankfulness acknowledge, that his maj. gave a most pious and gracious Answer to our Petition, and to some particulars, as fully as we could desire; which raised our hopes to the expectation of much good, and some hath followed. For it is true that the promised Proclamation to command judges, and other nisters of justice, to put the laws in execution against Recusants, their priests and jesuits, is now extant; which yet seems to me to have been long kept by some back-friends to religion; and I am induced to think thus for these reasons, viz. My 1st reason I draw from common fame: It being generally reported, that instead of life and motion to the laws in force against Recusants, the judges had in charge, before the last circuit, to deal sparingly with them. My 2nd reason I draw from the time when this Proclamation came forth; which was five weeks after the end of the session, when some of the circuits were ended, or so near a conclusion, that the judges could take little or no notice thereof. And, 3dly, from consideration of a former Proclamation, dated the 7th of July, which though it passed not the seal, yet it did the press; and, in my poor opinion, would never have gone so far (knowing the resolution of council to be more certain) had not some men hoped to prevent the latter by procurement of the former as satisfaction; which falls short of his majesty's pious intentions, expressed in that his religious Answer: And, if with reverence, I may speak my humble thoughts, they do both of them, in the conclusion, too much encourage the worst of subjects to hope for his majesty's best favour; too fairly inviting them to compound for their forfeitures; which course this house was bold to stile little less than a Toleration.—' Again, Is the concourse of Recusants as yet restrained from the court? nay, do they not since our recess frequent it with more confidence and greater alacrity? Do not their hopes daily increase, and themselves grow more insolent? Their fears are ended with the session. 4thly, Is the promised watch as yet appointed to keep them from ambassadors houses? Had the Judges in charge to inform themselves in their last circuits, and, after their return, to certify his maj. of all such papists and popishly affected persons as they should find to be in authority? I have not heard it, and to me those are all the known effects of that religious petition. 5thly, Next take we notice of the abortion of that necessary bill against Recusants, which, when we hoped it would have received life and perfection by the royal assent, perished in embryo, suddenly vanished, as being too cruel and too unmerciful. Lastly, Considering what fruit we have reaped from that Petition and Information, whereby we let his maj. know the particulars of such papists and popishly affected, as were in each county in commission of the peace, of lieutenantancy, &c. Are any of them since removed? No, it is well if their numbers be not increased.—Oh! Mr. Pym, this breaks the hearts of all; for if God be God, let us follow him; and if Baal be God, let us follow him; and no longer halt between two opinions: for whilst we are thus careless in standing for God, that we dare scarce acknowledge our own religion, is it any marvel that God estrangeth himself from us, and will not own us, as by too woeful experience we have cause to suspect? Since, we find, he goeth not forth with our armies, since so ill success attends all our actions, and we have not yet made our peace with him.—And to these griefs and discouragements, I find an addition of that nature, that threatens the very ruin and desolation of us, if not dissolution of religion in this land, if God himself take not his own cause into his hand: and that is the countenancing and preferring of a plotting, undermining, and dangerous sect of upstart divines; when Arminians shall be graced and preferred before honest men; when such desperate divines, as have tired a part of Christendom, almost ruined our neighbours, kindled their fires, brands, and cast their dangerous sparks abroad in our church, shall be encouraged to go on in planting their damnable doctrines and propositions; which, already, have taken deep rooting in our universities, and many other parts of this land.—You remember, sir, what care and pains this house took (as a matter of great consequence) to frame a Charge against Montague; which was ready, with the first opportunity, to have transmitted him to the lords; but these many interruptions we have had, have given backing to that, as well as to many other businesses of weight: yet was this man, shortly after the ending of the session, dignified with the sacred title of a bishop; and bishop of that see, wherein his predecessor (a grave and orthodox prelate) had laboured both by his pen and doctrine to strangle those errors, and to confute Mr. Montague; as if the very ready way to obtain a bishopric now, were to undermine religion, and to set the church in combustion. Another also of his own profession, little better than himself, I mean time-pleasing Manwaring, hath also tasted extraordinary favour. This man attempted to make his holy function a means to seduce the king's conscience, to misguide his judgment, to disjoin his affection from his people, to avert his mind from calling of parliaments; the particulars of his damned doctrines are yet fresh in our memory. What could a man have done worse? For thereby he did, as much as in him lay, violently to break in pieces that cord, to wrest in sunder that chain, which links, ties, and unites the hearts and affections of the prince and people together. Verily, they that shall go about thus to seduce or corrupt a prince, deserve to be hated of all men; as much as those that attempt to poison a public spring or fountain whereof all drink. For which offence of his, he received a just, but moderate censure. One particular was, that he should be disabled for ever holding any ecclesiastical dignity in the church: and although it be confessed, that the doctor justly brought upon himself the censure of parliament, yet was this man also, immediately after our rising, released from his imprisonment, reported to have the honour to kiss the king's hand; obtained his pardon in folio; was preferred to a rich living; and, (if some say true) cherisheth assured hopes of dignity in the church.—If these be steps to church preferments, God be merciful to those churches, which shall fall under the government and feeding of such a clergy.—Thus, Mr. Pym, you see the issue of our good endeavours vanish into smোক: what should be the reasons, I know not; but I may well guess it comes by the like practices that were used in king James's time; for then we had the like gracious Answers to Petitions of Religion, the like Proclamations, the like declarations, the like command to put laws in execution against Recusants, and yet little done; being prevented by the secret directions and commands of some eminent ministers of state, which I am able to justify by a letter under their hands, which I have now about me; and I wish that all such as have notice of any such private letters as have been sent for the stay of execution of those laws, would give this house notice thereof."

Sir Rob. Philips. 'If ever there were a necessity of dealing plainly and freely, now is the time: there is an admission of papists and Jesuits, as if it were in Spain and France. This increase of papists is by connivance of persons that be in authority; 940 persons in houses of religion being papists, of English, Scots, and Irish in the Netherlands, maintained by the papists of England: and of this I shall deliver the particulars, that we may frame a Remonstrance to the king, that unless there be some better performance of his maj.'s so many Answers to our Petitions, our religion will be past recovery.'

Mr. Coriton. 'That these papists, by laws or acts of state, may be removed from their offices, which we have just cause to suspect.'

Mr. Selden moveth, 'That these things may be debated in order; and first, for releasing the Jesuits that were arraigned at Newgate, whereof one was condemned: they were ten in number, which were priests, who had a college here in London about Clerkenwell: and those men could not attempt these acts of boldness, but that they have great countenance.'

Mr. Secretary Cooke replied, 'That a minister of state had notice of those ten, and this college intended to be kept at Clerkenwell; that it is plain there was a place appointed for this college, and orders and relics prepared. The minister made the king acquainted with it; and I should not do my duty, if I did not declare how much his maj. was affected with it. His maj. referred it to the special care of the lords of the council; who examining the same, sent those ten persons to Newgate, and gave order to Mr. Attorney to prosecute the laws against them: That this college was first at Edmonton, removed thence to Camberwell, and from thence to Clerkenwell.'—Ordered, That all the knights and burgesses of this house should to-morrow morning, declare their knowledge, what lets or hindrances have been to stay the proceedings against Recusants.

Complaint against lord Lambert.] Feb. 14.

A complaint was made against the lord Lambert, a baron of Ireland, and a member of this house; who being a colonel of soldiers in Middlesex, hath imposed 4d. upon every soldier towards his officers charges; and the petitioner refusing to pay, was first set in the stocks, and after by the lord Lambert, committed to a public prison.—Ordered, that the lord Lambert shall be sent for, to answer this.

Debate on a Commoner's appearing to answer before the Lords.] Sir John Eppesley desired leave to answer a complaint against him in the higher house.

Mr. Selden hereupon, 'That the use was, and citeth precedents, That no commoner should be called to the higher house, but it will trench upon, and disadvantage the privilege of this house; and until the 18th of k. James, there was never a precedent to the contrary; that this therefore may be considered of by a select committee.'—Ordered, that sir John Eppesley should not have leave to answer to the lords house.

Mr. Secretary Cooke said, 'I am as careful to maintain a good correspondence with the lords as any man; but connivance in this kind may overthrow the fundamental rights and liberties of this house: let it, therefore, be seriously considered of, for this not only concerneth the right of this house, but the liberty of the whole commonwealth.'—Ordered, that a special select committee shall be appointed to confer of this.

The Answer of the Barons, &c. of the Exchequer, concerning Tonnage and Poundage.] Mr. Chancellor of the duchy delivereth an Answer, in writing, from the lord treasurer, chancellor, and barons of the exchequer, to the Message sent them by the house of commons: viz.

"Whereas the honourable house of commons, by order of the 12th of this instant February, have appointed that notice should be given to the lord treasurer, chancellor, and barons of the exchequer, of a Declaration made by sir John Wolstenholme, Abraham Dawes, and Rtd. Carmarthen, in the said house, of the Goods that the Merchants brought into the king's storehouse, and laid up there for his majesty's use, were detained, as they conceive, only for the duty of Tonnage and Poundage, and other sums comprised in the book of rates; which notice was given, to the end the said court of exchequer might further proceed therein, as to justice should appertain:—Now, the lord treasurer, chancellor, and barons, out of their due respect to that honourable house, and for their satisfaction, do signify, that by the orders and injunctions of the said court of exchequer, they did not determine, nor any ways trench upon the right of Tonnage and Poundage; and so they declared openly, in the court at the making of those orders: neither did they, by the said orders and injunctions, bar the owners of these goods to sue for the same in a lawful course. But whereas the said owners endeavoured to take those goods out of the king's actual possession, by writs or plaints of replevin, which was no lawful action or course in the king's cause, nor agreeable to his prerogative: Therefore, the said court of exchequer, being the court for ordering of the king's revenue, did by these orders and injunctions stay those suits: and did fully declare, by the said orders, That the owners, if they conceived themselves wronged, might take such remedy as the law alloweth. Signed, RICH. WESTON Treasurer, LO. NEWBURGH Chancellor, JO. WALTER Chief Baron, JOHN DENHAM, THO. TREVOR, GEO. VERNON, Barons.

This being read, Mr. Kirton said, 'We looked for satisfaction, but now we see a justification of their actions. I therefore desire we may proceed to consider of their proceedings, and whether ever the court of exchequer held this course before for staying of replevins, and whether this hath been done by the regal prerogative of the king, or the court of exchequer.'—Ordered, That a select committee of the lawyers, exchequer-men, shall take this into their consideration.—Mr. Selken said, 'We have delayed the proceedings with the Customers, expecting some good success from the exchequer; but finding it otherwise, I desire the Customers may be called to the bar on Monday next; which was ordered.'

Sir T. Hobby's Report relating to Popish Priests. Sir Tho. Hobby reported, 'That he and the rest that were appointed for the service concerning the Priests, had examined the keeper of Newgate, who confessed, the 1st of Dec. he received ten prisoners, suspected to be priests, and said, That at the sessions the 3rd of Dec. last, 3 of them were indicted for priests; and one of them condemned, that was afterwards reprieved: and the night before the execution Mr. Recorder sent a warrant to stay execution, which was seconded by a warrant from the lord chief justice Hyde: all the rest did refuse the oath of allegiance, and it was ordered, that they should be kept till the next sessions. The earl of Dorset sent word to the keeper, 'That his majesty's pleasure was, they should be delivered;' and a warrant came from Mr. Attorney, to bring the priests before him, who took sureties of them to appear 20 days after notice at the council-board; and so they were discharged.—Hereupon.

Sir N. Rich said, 'I am confident the grace of the king hath been abused in this; that therefore the privy counsellors of the house must know, whether it was by his majesty's directions, or not.' And it was moved, That Secretary Cooke may, first, declare his knowledge in this.

Mr. Secretary Cooke, thereupon, made a long declaration to the house concerning those Priests, and the discovery of them; and produced the papers that were found in the house amongst them upon search; and he said, that it did appear that they were Jesuits and priests, by the inventory of their goods: they had their chapel and library replenished, a common kitchen, buttery, and cellar, their household-stuff is all marked with J + S. there is a monthly book of their daily expences, and a contracted annual account in Latin, under the rector's hand. It appeareth that they had purchased 200l. lands per ann. and 60l. in money did remain over and above their expences. There were also divers letters, directions and orders from a popish father from Rome, and all parts beyond the seas. They had appointed a time of meeting which was st. Joseph's day, and then they should have said mass. All their papers were delivered to Mr. Attorney who recommended them to Mr. Long.'

Sir John Elliot said, 'In all this I see his majesty's goodness is clear, and we shall still retain the comfort of it. You see here is a ground laid for a new religion, and a foundation for the undermining of the state; and, when they should be brought to trial, then I see the over-officiousness of ministers of state to interpose themselves to preserve these men, to all our ruins: these men were in subjection to a foreign power, and disclaim our sovereign. What could be their purpose that laboured to find out a way to free them, but to seek our ruin? For I fear the drawing of their indictment was maliciously done for that purpose. The person that I look at first is the Attorney, whom we still find faulty in this matter of religion; when he saw the importance of the cause, and had directions from the king and council; and yet, in a cause that so much concerns the king, the people, religion and all, he must take his own hand away, and put it to another; this negligence repders him inexcusable.' The next is that great lord, the earl of Dorset; I find him to interpose himself herein. Let us fix it upon his person, and know by what warrant he did that which was done. I observe another person faulty also; I heard the priest was condemned, and Mr. Recorder made a reprieve: no man could vent his malice more to this kingdom, than in the preservation of these men.'

Sir F. Seymour, with vehemency, 'taxed both Mr. Attorney's affection and judgment herein; and declared that continual letters were sent, from Mr. Attorney, in stay of proceedings against recusants. You see how slightly Mr. Attorney hath put over a business of this weight to Mr. Long.'

Mr. Cross, the pursuivant, being examined, said, 'That there were 11 men in the New Prison; and the keeper of the prison saith, they were delivered by warrant from the council-board.'—It was ordered, That Mr. Recorder shall be rather sent unto to be examined, than to be sent for as a delinquent; in regard he hath, formerly, had the honour to sit in the chair here.

Mr. Secretary Cooke said, 'That herein we shall find, that the king being merciful in case of blood, gave directions for the reprieving of the condemned priests.'

Sir J. Elliot 'I doubt not but when we shall declare the depth of this to his maj. he will render them to judgment that gave him such advice.

Sir N. Rich. 'These jesuits are bound by surties to answer further at the council-board. I wish their bonds were produced, that by examination of them, we might find out the whole pack of their benefactors and maintainers.

Mr. Long being called, said, 'That he offering, at the sessions, the evidence against them, by order from Mr. Attorney; the lord chief justice Richardson interrupted him, and told him, 'He must speak to the point in issue, whether priests or no priests; and thereupon the judges consulted amongst themselves, and so arose.

Mr. Selden declared, 'That he was present at the sessions, and plain treason was proved, and nothing done in it.'—The further examination of this was referred to a select committee.

Feb. 16. At the committee for Religion, Mr. Stroud moved, 'That the lord chief justice may be called to give an account of his stay of justice, in the execution of the condemned Priests; which he ought not have done, though his maj. signified his pleasure to the contrary.'

The Chancellor of the Duchy said, 'That this was a thing ordinary for a chief justice to do, in queen Elizabeth's and k. James's times; as also a declaration in the Star-chamber, that all condemned Priests should be sent to the castle of Wisbich; and from hence (though the king had given no order for the reprieve) he might have taken warrant for his proceedings.'

Mr. Selden made a report from the committee, for the further examination of Mr. Long, concerning the proceedings at Newgate against the Jesuits; whereby it plainly appeared, 'That the evidence, tendered in the court at Newgate, did clearly testify these men to be Priests; yet the lord chief justice, Richardson, did reject the same, against the sense of the rest of the judges and justices present; whereby it is plain he dealt underhand with some of the Jesuits.—Ordered that two members shall be sent to each judge, that were present at the sessions at Newgate; who were said to be the lord chief justice of the King's bench, and the lord chief justice of the Common Pleas, Justices Whitlock, Jones, and Crooke.

Sir Henry Martin made report, 'That he, with others, went to the recorder of London, to know by what warrant he made stay of execution of the Priest. He denied that he gave any order or direction for the stay. Whereupon James, the clerk of Newgate, being there present, came to him, and said, He was sorry that he had named Mr. Recorder, for Mr. Recorder gave no directions; but the warrant came from the lord chief justice Hyde.—Whereupon Sir H. Martin, with the rest of the committee, went to the said lord chief justice Hyde, who told them, 'That he gave his said warrant by command from his majesty.'

Sir F. Seymour made report to the house, 'That he and others came to Mr. Attorney's chamber; but not finding him there, they went to Mr. Long, who shewed them a letter from Mr. Attorney directed to him the said Mr. Long, which was all the instructions he had to prosecute the Priests, and none else; but, for the other men, he was to take them into a private room, and offer them the oath of allegiance; which if they refused, then to proceed to praemunire. After this we went to Mr. Attorney, and desired him to give us an answer to every particular question. Whereupon he set down the answer with his own hands, but seemed oftentimes loth to deliver it unto us; yet at last he did deliver it, which was as followeth: 'I received order from the council, to proceed against the priests; and I did, accordingly, proceed against them, and I gave directions to have them brought before me; and took their examinations and the informations; and I sent for Mr. Long, and desired him to take special order therein. I know not, nor ever heard, of any land conveyed to the college, but only in general; and I gave directions to intitle the king to the goods. I understood an indictment was preferred against 3 of them for treason, and the rest of praemunire; and I receiving command from his maj. for their bailment, supposed them bailable. Hereupon it was ordered, 'That such Priests as are not convicted and condemned, should be proceeded against.'

Report of the Judges Answers concerning stay of Execution of Popish Priests. Feb. 16. Mr. Selden reported, 'That he, and some others, examined Mr. Long, who said, That Mr. Cross the pursuivant coming from Mr. Attorney with direction, desired a warrant in writing, and so Mr. Attorney sent him a letter before-mentioned; and so he indicted them as Priests. And the same day they were tried, he told the lord chief justice Hyde, that he had divers papers that did conduce to prove them priests or jesuits, and he said he was ready to read them; and thereupon the lord Richardson said, 'We are upon a point, whether priests or no priests, and they must have read done them.' Another Judge said, 'We cannot do right to all.' And the lord Richardson asked him, If he had any other evidence. He said, He had no other but those papers, which he thought would give clear satisfaction. The lord Richardson said, 'All that was but the course: he said, 'What say you to the poor priests or no priests?' To which Mr. Long answered, 'I saw not these men made priests; but he said, In the house where they were taken, were found copes and vestments for priests: and that he said to the lord Richardson, 'I am ready to open all this, if you please, or to answer any questions, which you shall ask concerning such things as I have read in the papers.' The papers contained divers examinations, and yet none were suffered to be read but one; and that not being conceived a full proof, the rest were refused.'

Sir R. Philips. 'Never was the like example or precedent: if the judges give us not better satisfaction, they themselves will be parties.'

Sir T. Hobby reported from the lord chief justice Hyde, 'That he doth not remember any papers tendered by Mr. Long were rejected; or that he affirmed they were dangerous persons, and a college of Jesuits; but howsoever, Mr. Long tendered nothing to prove them so, but that he held divers papers in his hand.'

Mr. Wandesford reported from the lord chief justice Richardson, who said, 'Mr. Long did discourse of the place and house, but did not press the reading of the papers; neither knew he what was in the papers, nor doth he know of any thing to prove the persons Priests.'

Sir T. Barrington told the answer of justice Jones, who saith, 'That some papers were offered by Mr. Long, but he knew not the contents thereof, nor the reason why they were refused; but he came late for want of his health, and the second day was not there at all.'

Sir Miles Fleetwood delivered the answer of justice Whitlock, who said, 'He came late, and therefore understood not the business, and the second day was not there at all.'

Sir W. Constable delivered the like answer from justice Croke.

Sir T. Barrington saith, 'That although Mr. Justice Jones did not write the name of my lord Richardson, yet in discourse he named him to be the man that did say, the point in proof is, whether priests or no priests.'

Sir N. Rich. 'Here is a charge of an high nature on the judges by Mr. Long; that now Mr. Long make good his charge, or suffer for it; for there were witnesses enough in the court.'—Ordered Mr. Long to be here on Thursday: also, That the justices, about the town, shall be required to deliver in all the names of the recusants remaining about the town, their conditions and of what country they be: also, That the gentlemen of the Inns of court and chancery, shall give in their knowledge what recusants are there.

On Wednesday the 18th of February, a public fast was kept by the house at Westminster, where were three sermons.

Debate on the Seizing of a Member's Goods for Tonnage. Feb. 19. Mr. Dawes, one of the Customers, being called in to answer the point of privilege in taking Mr. Rolles's Goods, being a member of the house, saith, 'He took Mr. Rolles's goods by virtue of a commission under the great seal, and other warrants remaining in the hands of sir John Elliot: that he knew Mr. Rolles to be a parliament-man, and that Mr. Rolles demanded his privilege; but he did understand that this privilege extended only to his person, and not to his goods.' 'That he took those goods for such duties as were due in king James's time; and that the king sent for him on Sunday last, and commanded him to make no further answer.'

Mr. Carmarthen, another customer, called in, saith, 'That he knew Mr. Rolles to be a parliament-man, and that he told him he did not find any parliament-man exempted in their said commission; and if all the body of this house were in him, he would not deliver the goods; if he said he would not, it was because he could not.'

Mr. Wandesford moved, 'That the delinquency of these men may be declined for the present; and that we may, first, go to the king by way of Remonstrance, considering the matter from whence this doth arise; if there were a single privilege, it were easily determined.'

Mr. Selden 'If there be any near the king that misinterpret our actions, let the curse light on them, and not on us: I believe it is high time to right ourselves; and until we vindicate ourselves in this, it will be in vain for us to sit here.'

Sir N. Rich moveth, 'Not to proceed in this, until it be, by a select committee, considered of; in respect the king himself gave order to stay those goods, though the goods of a parliament-man.'

Sir J. Elliot. 'The heart-blood of the commonwealth receiveth life from the privilege of this house.'—It was resolved that this shall be presently taken into consideration; and being conceived a business of great consequence, it is ordered, that the house shall be resolved into a committee for the more freedom of debate.

Feb. 20. Sir J. Wolstenholme, another of the Customers, called in, saith, 'That he was commanded, from the king, to say, that the goods were taken for duties and no more; that he sought not to farm the customs, and told the king, being sent for to his maj. that he was not willing to deal therein, until the parliament had granted the same.'—Hereupon the Warrant, from the king to the Customers, was read in hæc verba:

"Carolus, Dei Gratia, &c. To the lord treasurer, chancery, and barons of our exchequer, and to the Customers of our ports.

"Whereas the lords of our council, taking into consideration our revenue, and finding that Tonnage and Poundage is a principal revenue of our crown, and hath been continued many ages; have therefore ordered, that all those duties of subsidies, customs and imposts, as they were in the 21st year of king James our late royal father, and as they shall be appointed by us under our seal, be levied: know ye, That we, by the advice of the lords of our council, do declare our will hereby, That all those duties be levied and collected as they were in the time of our said father, and in such manner as we shall appoint. And if any person refuse to pay, then our will is, that the lords of the council and the treasurer shall commit to prison such so refusing, until they conform themselves. And we give full power to all our officers, to receive, levy, and collect : and we command our barons and officers, from time to time, to give all assistance to the farmers of the same, as fully as when they were collected by authority of parliament."

Sir H. May. 'The king and council took notice, that this gentleman was a parliament-man; and it is the first time that, for the king's revenue and for duties, parliament-privileges ever held.'

Sir P. Heyman, 'Our mouths are stopped, if this be the king's revenue.'

Mr. Selden saith, 'That he conceiveth the case of the 3 customers, to differ in the degrees of their offences. 1. For sir J. Wolstenholme, whatever he saith here, he hath often confessed the goods were taken for Tunnage and Poundage; so that, as he broke the privilege in taking the goods, so likewise in his swearing one thing, and the contrary plainly appearing upon proof and his own confession, he plainly deserves punishment. 2. Mr. Dawes's case differeth only, in that sir J. Wolstenholme is a patentee, and Mr. Dawes only a sharer. 3. Mr. Carmarthen's case differeth in saying, 'If all the parliament were in him, he would not deliver the goods.'—Hereupon it was ordered, That Wolstenholme's case shall be first decided; and the point is, Whether by the lease, sir J. Wolstenholme having seized the goods, hath interest or not.'

Mr. Glanville. 'Here is a sum of money advanced, a lease granted for certain years, and certain rent reserved; and though there be a covenant to those men, that if there be loss, it shall be abated, yet that cannot take away their interest.' The substance of the affidavit made by the customers in the exchequer, is, That the goods of the merchants seized by them, and remaining in the king's storehouse, were seized only for duties to the king, mentioned in a commission under the king's signet; and that themselves, the customers, had no interest, nor pretence of interest therein.

Feb. 21. Mr. Littleton, at the committee on the Complaint of the Merchants, argued, 'Whether a member of the house hath his goods privileged upon a prerogation, being seized for the king? All privileges are allowed for the benefit of the common-wealth; the parliament's privilege is above any other, and the parliament only can decide privilege of parliament, not any other judge or court. That a man may not distrain for rent in parliament time, but for all arrearsages after the parliament he may distrain: he is not to be impleaded in any action personal, or his goods seized in the exchequer. Both by record and act of parliament, he is in the king's royal protection; that it might be high-treason to kill a parliament man; and the king answered it accordingly, which made it a law. For the judges to determine privilege of parliament, were to supersede and make void the law: and as to the Proclamation, the privilege stands good until the day of prerogation. The king is never so high in point of state, as in the parliament; cited in the case of sir R. Howard, in the high commission. And all privilege is good, unless in cases of high-treason, felony, or breach of the peace.'

Sir R. Philips. 'Thus you see how fast the prerogative of the king doth intrench on the liberty of the subject, and how hardly it is recovered. He then cited many precedents, wherein the goods of a member of parliament were privileged from seizure, in the exchequer. In 12 Eliz. it was resolved in parliament, That 20 days before, and 20 days after, was the time of privileges.'

Sir H. May desired, 'That, in this debate, we may tie ourselves to point of law and authority, and not to point of reason; and conceive that no privilege lieth against the king, in point of his duties and customs.'

Sir F. Scymour. 'I desire it may be the first debate, whether this case doth concern the king or not; for I conceive these customers have not made good that there is any right: here is art used only to intitle the king. I conceive it is an high offence, for any man to lay the scandal of every project upon the king.'

Mr. Glanville. 'Here is a cunning affidavit in the exchequer, to intitle the king; a mere cunning project, and an offence of high nature, to shelter their projects under the command of the crown.'

Mr. Secretary Cooke. 'The point in question is, not the right of the subjects, but the right of the parliament's privilege, and that in the case of Mr. Rolles; and this is only now in question.'

Sir J. Strangersays. 'I know no reason, why we should draw a question upon ourselves, which we need not, especially between the king and us. I conceive it, plainly, that these customers took these goods in their own right, not in the king's; in this the privilege is plainly broken, which is easily determined.'

Mr. Banks. 'In this case there is no interposing of the king's right; and the king, by his proclamation, hath declared so much.—That the courts at Westminster do grant 12 days privilege to any man, to inform his counsel; much more the courts of parliament are to have their privilege. The king's command cannot authorize any man to break the privilege; no more than it will warrant an entry upon a man's land, without process of law.'

Mr. Solicitor. 'If he have no right, how can he make a lease? then this pretended right of the customers must needs be void: and therefore the goods must be taken, not in their own, but in the right of the king.'

Mr. Selden. 'If there were any right, the pretended right is in the subject. 1. Whether privilege in goods? 2. Whether the right were in the customers only? 3. Whether privilege against the king? 4. If the lords have no privilege in parliament for their goods, they have then no privilege at all; for they are privileged in their persons out of parliament.—For the point of interest, it is plain, no kind of covenant can alter the interest; and, questionless, had the case in the exchequer appeared to the barons, as it doth to us, they would never have proceeded as they did. If our goods may be seized into the exchequer, be it right or wrong, we had as good have none.'

Sir N. Rich said, 'It was recorded, the last session in the lords house; and he cited other precedents in this house, that the servant of a member of parliament ought to have privilege in his goods: the question being thus decided, certainly a parliament-man ought to have privilege in his goods.'

Mr. Noy saith, 'That these customers had neither commission nor command to seize; therefore, without doubt, we may proceed safely to the other question, that the privilege is broken by the customers, without relation to any commission or command of the king.'

Mr. Secretary Cooke saith, 'That it is in the commission to seize.'—But the commission being read, it was not found to be there.

Sir H. May saith, 'Mr. Daws mentioned that he seized these goods by virtue of a commission and other warrants, remaining in the hands of sir J. Elliot; that therefore the warrants may be seen, whether there be command to seize these goods or not.'

Sir N. Rich. 'This day's debate much rejoiceth me, especially the motion made by Mr. Noy; whereby it is plain we have a way open to go to this question, without relation to the king's commission or command; and I desire, in respect there appeareth nothing before us that doth incumber us, we may go to the question.'

Sir H. May again desireth these warrants may be looked into before we go to the question.

Mr. Kirton moved, 'That in respect this business gent. pressed this so far, the warrants may be read, that it may appear with what judgment this house hath proceeded.'

Mr. Glanville. 'I consent these warrants be sent for and read; but withal, if any thing arise that may produce any thing of ill consequence, let it be considered from whom it doth come. The privy-counsellors here are content with this motion.—The Warrants being sent for and read, no commission to seize appeared therein.'

Mr. Kirton said, 'If there be any thing of doubt, I desire these honourable persons may make their objections.'

Sir H. May. 'I rejoice when I can go to court able to justify your proceedings: I confess I see nothing now but that we may proceed safely to the question.'

Secretary Cooke said as much.

Mr. Hackwell argued against privilege in the time of prorogation.

Mr. Noy saith, 'He made no doubt but privilege was in force in time of prorogation, until he heard this argument; and saith, he hath heard nothing from him yet that doth alter his opinion; and cited a case, where the lords house hath this very prorogation adjudged to be the privilege thereof.'

Vol. II.

Mr. Hackwell answered, 'He is glad to hear it is so, and he is now of the same opinion.'—Then it was resolved, that Mr. Rolls ought to have privilege of parliament, for his goods seized 30 October, 5 Jan. last, and all since.

Feb. 23. Sir H. May said, 'I will never cease to give you the best advice I can. We all agree a wound is given. We have wine and oil before us: if we go to punish delinquency, there is vinegar in the wound; therefore think on some course to have restitution.'

Sir John Elliot. 'The question is, whether we shall first go to the restitution or to the point of delinquency; but some now raise up difficulties, in opposition to the point of delinquency; and talk of breach of parliaments; and other fears I meet with, both in this and elsewhere. Take heed you fall not on a rock: I am confident this would be somewhat difficult, were it not for the goodness and justice of the king. Let us do that which is just, and his goodness will be so clear, that we need not mistrust.—Let those terrors, that are threatened us, light on them that make them; why should we fear the justice of a king, when we do that which is just? let there be no more memory or fear of breaches, and let us now go to the delinquency of these men; and that is the only way to procure satisfaction.'

Mr. Secretary Cooke answered, 'That we laboured, the last day, to bring to our end; now we fall to this issue, to proceed to the delinquency of these men; our ground is, because they had no command from his majesty. I must speak plain; his maj. took notice of our labour, and that we endeavoured to sever the act of the Customers from his maj.'s command.—His maj. commanded me to tell you, that it concerns him in high degree of justice and honour, that truth be not concealed; which is, that what they did was by his own direct orders and command, or by order of the council-board, his maj. himself being present; and, therefore, would not have it divided from his act.'

Report concerning Privilege.] Report was made from the grand committee, that they took into their consideration the violation of the liberties of the house by the Customers; and at last they resolved, That a member of the house ought to have privilege of person and goods; and that the command of his maj. is so great, that they leave it to the house.

Mr. Secretary Cooke saith, 'That howsoever this house labours to sever the king's interest, his maj. thinks this distinction will not clear his honour: he is the fountain of honour, and he will not be drawn to do that which may touch him, though others may make distinctions.'

Sir R. Philips. 'I had rather pray to God to direct us than give any direction. The king's honour, justice, and government are now presented unto us, and also the essential liberty of this house; and we are now fit for debate or counsel, in the greatest concerns; our best thoughts and wits are summoned what to do?

Hereupon the house was adjourned to the 25th; and upon that day the following Heads of Articles for Religion being presented to the house, were read: viz.

“HEADS OF ARTICLES to be insisted on, and agreed upon, at a Sub-Committee for RELIGION.

“I. That we call to mind, how that, in the last session of this parliament, we presented to his maj. an humble Declaration of the great danger threatened to this church and state, by divers courses and practices tending to the change and innovation of religion. II. That what we then feared, we do now sensibly feel; and therefore have just cause to renew our former complaints herein.—III. That, yet nevertheless, we do, with all thankfulness, acknowledge the great blessing we have received from Almighty God, in setting a king over us, of whose constancy in the profession and practice of the true religion here established, we rest full assured; as likewise of his most pious zeal and careful endeavour for the maintenance and propagation thereof; being so far from having the least doubt of his majesty's remissness therein, that we, next under God, ascribe unto his own princely-wisdom and goodness, that our holy religion hath yet any countenance at all amongst us.—IV. And for that the pious intention and endeavours, even of the best and wisest princes, are often frustrated through the unfaithfulness and carelessness of their ministers; and that we find a great unhappiness to have befallen his majesty this way; we think, that being now assembled in parliament to advise of the weighty and important affairs concerning church and state; we cannot do a work more acceptable, than, in the first place, according to the dignity of the matter, and necessity of the present occasions, faithfully and freely to make known, what we conceive may conduce to the preservation of God's religion, in great peril now to be lost; and, therewithal, the safety and tranquillity of his majesty and his kingdoms now threatened with certain Dangers. For the clearer proceedings therein, we shall declare, 1. What those Dangers and Inconveniences are. 2. Whence they arise. 3. In some sort, how they may be redressed.—The Dangers may appear partly from the consideration of the state of Religion abroad: and partly from the condition thereof within his majesty's own dominions, and especially within this kingdom of England. From abroad we make these observations: 1. By the mighty and prevalent party, by which true religion is actually opposed, and the contrary maintained. 2. Their combined counsels, forces, attempts, and practices, together with a most diligent pursuit of their designs, aiming at the subversion of all the Protestant churches in Christendom. 3. The weak resistance that is made against them. 4. Their victorious and successful enterprises, whereby the churches of Germany, France, and other places, are in a great part already ruined, and the rest in the most weak and miserable condition.—In his majesty's own dominions, these: 1. In Scotland, the sins lately raised and insolencies committed by the Popish party, have already not a little disquieted that famous church; of which, with comfort we take notice, his majesty hath expressed himself exceeding sensible; and hath accordingly given most royal and prudent directions therein. 2. Ireland is now almost wholly overspread with Popery, swarming with friars, priests, and jesuits, and other superstitious persons of all sorts; whose practice is daily to seduce his majesty's subjects from their allegiance, and to cause them to adhere to his enemies. That even in the city of Dublin, in the view of the state, where not many years since, as we have been credibly informed, there were few or none that refused to come to church, there are lately restored and erected for friars, jesuits, and idolatrous monks, 13 houses, being more in number than the parish churches within that city; besides many more likewise erected in the best part of the kingdom; and the people, almost wholly revolted from our religion, to the open exercise of Popish superstition. The Danger from hence is further increased, by reason of the intercourse which the subjects, of all sorts, in the kingdom, have into Spain, and the Arch-Duchess's country; and that, of late, divers principal persons being Papists are trusted with the command of soldiers; and great numbers of the Irish are acquainted with the exercise of arms and martial discipline; which heretofore, hath not been permitted, even in times of greatest security. Lastly, Here in England we observe an extraordinary growth of Popery, inasmuch that in some counties where in queen Elizabeth's time there were few or none known Recusants, now there are above 2000, and all the rest generally apt to revolt. A bold and open allowance of the religion, by frequent and public resort to mass in multitudes, without controul, and that even to the queen's court; to the great scandal of his majesty's government. Their extraordinary insolence; for instance, the late erecting of college of jesuits in Clerkenwell, and the strange proceedings thereupon used in favour of them. The subtle and pernicious spreading of the Arminian faction; whereby they have kindled such a fire of division in the very bowels of the state, as if not speedily extinguished, it is of itself sufficient to ruin our religion; by dividing us from the Reformed Churches abroad, and separating ourselves at home, by casting doubts on the religion professed and established; which if faulty or questionable in three or four particulars, will be rendered suspicious to the people's minds, in all the rest; and incline them to Popery, to which those agents, in their own nature, do prepare the way: so that if our ligion be suppressed and destroyed abroad, disturbed in Scotland, lost in Ireland, undermined and almost outdared in England, it is manifest that our Danger is very great and imminent.—The Causes of which Danger here, amongst divers others, we conceive to be chiefly those instanced in. 1. The suspension or negligence in execution of the laws against Popery. 2. The late proceedings against the colleges of Jesuits. 3. Divers letters sent by Mr Rob. Heath, his majesty's attorney, into the country, for stay of proceedings against recusants. 4. The publishing and defending points of Popery in sermons and books, without punishment; instance bishop Montague's 3 books, viz. 'The Gagg,' 'Invocation of Saints,' and his 'Appeal'; also Dr. Cosin's Harary, and the bishop of Gloucester's Sermons. 5. The bold and unwarranted introducing, practicing, and defending of sundry new ceremonies, and laying of injunctions upon men by governors of the church and others, without authority, in conformity to the church of Rome; as for example, in some places erecting of altars, in others changing the usual and prescribed manner of placing the communion-table, and setting it at the upper end of the chancel, north and south, in imitation of the high Altar; by which they, also, call it, and adorn it with candlesticks, which, by the injunctions, 10 Eliz. were to be taken away; and do also make obeisance by bowing thereunto, commanding men to stand up at Gloria Patria; bringing men to question and trouble for not obeying that command for which there is no authority; injoining that no woman be married without a veil; setting up of pictures, statues and images in churches; praying towards the East, crossing ad omnia motum & gestum. 6. The false and counterfeit conformity of Papists, whereby they do not only evade the law, but obtain places of trust and authority; instance Mr. Browne of Oxford, and his treatise written to that purpose; the bishop of Gloucester; and the now bishop of Durham. 7. The suppressing and restraint of the orthodox doctrine, contained in the Articles of Religion, confirmed in parliament, 13 Eliz. according to the sense which hath been received publicly, and taught as the doctrine of the church of England in those points, wherein the Arminians differ from us, and other the Reformed Churches; wherein the essence of our Articles, in those controverted points, is known and proved. 8. The publishing of books, and preaching of sermons, contrary to the former orthodox doctrine, and suppressing books written in defence thereof: instance bishop Montague's Gagg and Appeal, Mr. Jackson's Book of the Essence and Attributes of God, Dr. White's two sermons preached at court, one upon the 5th of Nov. the other on Christmas Day last; and for orthodox books suppressed, instance in all that have been written against bishop Montague and Cosins, yea even bishop Ogleton's Book. 9. That these persons who have published and maintained such Papiſtical,

Arminian, and superstitious opinions and practices, who are known to be unsound in religion are countenanced, favoured and preferred: instance Mr. Montague made bishop of Chichester; also the late bishop of Carlisle, since his last Arminian Sermon preached at court, advanced to the bishoprick of Norwich; a known Arminian made bishop of Ely; the bishop of Oxford, a long-suspected Papist, advanced to the bishoprick of Durham; Mr. Cosins, advanced to dignity and a great living; Dr. Wren, made dean of Windsor, and one of the high commission court. 10. That some prelates near the king having gotten the chief administration of ecclesiastical affairs under his majesty, discountenance and hinder the preferment of those that are orthodox, and favour such as are contrary; instance, the bishops of Winchester and London, in divers particulars.—The points wherein the Arminians differ from us, and other the Reformed Churches, in the sense of the Articles confirmed in parliament, 13 Eliz. may be known and proved in these controverted points, viz. 1. By the Common-Prayer, established in parliament. 2. By the book of Homilies, confirmed by the acts of religion. 3. By the Catechism concerning the points printed in the Bible, and read in churches, and divers other impressions published by authority. 4. Bishop Jewel's works, commanded to be kept in all churches, that every parish may have one of them. 5. The publick determination of divinity-professors, published by authority. 6. The publick determination of Divines in both the Universities. 7. The Resolution of the abp. of Canterbury, and other rev. bishops and divines assembled at Lambeth, for this very purpose, to declare their opinions concerning those points, Anno 1595, unto which the abp. of York and all his province did likewise agree. 8. The Articles of Ireland, tho' framed by the convocation there, yet allowed by the clergy and state here. 9. The suffrage of the British divines, sent by king James, to the synod of Dort. 10. The uniform consent of our writers published by authority. 11. The censures, recantations, punishments and submissions, made, enjoined, and inflicted upon those that taught contrary thereunto, as Barrow and Barrett in Cambridge, and Bridges in Oxford.—The remedy of which Abuses we conceive may be these. 1. Due execution of laws against Papists. 2. Exemplary punishments to be inflicted upon teachers, publishers, and maintainers of Popish opinions, and practising of superstitious ceremonies, and some stricter laws in that case to be provided. 3. The orthodox doctrine of our church, in these now controverted points by the Arminian sect, may be established and freely taught; according as it hath been hitherto generally received, without any alteration or innovation; and severe punishment, by the same laws to be provided against such as shall, either by word or writing, publish any thing contrary thereunto. 4. That the said books of B. Montague and Cosins may be burned. 5. That such as have been authors, or abettors, of those Popish and Arminian innovations in doctrine, may be condignly punished. 6. That some good order may be taken for licensing books hereafter. 7. That his maj. would be graciously pleased to confer bishopricks, and other ecclesiastical preferments, with advice of his privy council, upon learned, pious, and orthodox men. 8. That bishops and clergymen being well chosen, may reside upon their charge, and with diligence and fidelity perform their several duties, and that accordingly they may be countenanced and preferred. 9. That some course may, in this parliament, be considered of, for providing competent means to maintain a godly, able, minister in every parish-church of this kingdom. 10. That his maj. would be graciously pleased to make a special choice of such persons, for the execution of his ecclesiastical commissions, as are approved for integrity of life and soundness of doctrine."

Sir J. Elliot's Speech against the Lord Treasurer.] Immediately after the reading the above Articles, the king sent to command both houses to adjourn to Monday the 2d of March: On which day,

Sir John Elliot, after prayers were ended, and the house set, stood up and said, 'God knows I speak now with all duty to the king. It is true, the misfortunes we suffer are many; we know what discoveries have been made here in these Articles, and how Arminianism creeps in and undermines us, and how Popery comes in upon us. They mask not in strange disguises, but expose themselves to the view of the world. In the search of these, we have fixed our eyes, not on the actors, the Jesuits and Priests, but upon their masters, those that are in authority; thence it cometh we suffer; the fear of them makes those interruptions. You have some prelates that are their abettors: the great bishop of Winchester, we know what he hath done to favour them. This fear extends to some others, that contract a fear of being discovered; that is, the Lord Treasurer (Weston) in whose person all evil is contracted, both for the innovation of religion, and invasion of our liberties; he being the great enemy of the common-wealth. I have traced him in all his actions, and I find him building on those grounds laid by his master the Great Duke; he, secretly, is moving for this interruption; and from this fear they go about to break parliaments, lest parliaments should break them. I find him the head of all that party, the Papists; and all the Jesuits and Priests derive from him their shelter and protection. And I protest, as I am a gentleman, if my fortune be ever again to meet in this honourable assembly, where I now leave, I will begin again.'

The Speaker delivers the King's Message for a further Adjournment; which is not regarded by the House.] The Speaker, being set in the chair, delivered a Message from the king, commanding him, 'To adjourn the House until Tuesday come sevensnight following.' To this several members objected, 'That it was not the office of the Speaker to deliver any such command unto them; for the adjournment of the house did properly belong unto themselves; and after they had settled some things they thought convenient to be spoken of, they would satisfy the king.'

Sir John Elliot offers a Remonstrance concerning Tunnage and Poundage.] Sir John Elliot said, 'That in the great business of Tunnage and Poundage, the instruments thereof were moved at the Lord Treasurer's command: who dismayed the merchants, invited strangers to come in to drive out our trade, and all to serve his own turn;' and thereupon offered a Remonstrance, which, being refused to be read both by the Speaker and Clerk, was restored to him again; and, by him, read in these words following:

"Most gracious sovereign; Your most loyal and dutiful subjects, the commons in this present parliament assembled, being in nothing more careful than of the honour and prosperity of your maj. and the kingdom; which depend upon that happy union and relation betwix your maj. and your people, do with much sorrow apprehend, that by reason of the uncertainty of their continuance together, the unexpected interruptions which have been cast upon them, and the shortness of time in which your maj. hath determined to end this session, they cannot bring to maturity and perfection divers businesses of weight, which they have taken into their consideration and resolution, as most important for the common good. Amongst other things they have taken into their especial care the preparing a bill for the granting to your maj. such a subsidy of Tunnage and Poundage, as might uphold your profit and revenue, in as ample manner, as their just care and respect for trade (wherein not only the prosperity, but even the life of the kingdom doth consist) would permit; but being a work, which will require much time and preparation by conference with your majesty's officers, and with the merchants not only of London, but of other remote parts, they find it not possible to be accomplished at this time. Wherefore, considering it will be much more prejudicial to the rights of the subjects, if your maj. should continue to receive the same without authority of law, after the determination of a session, than if there had been a recess by adjournment only; (in which case that intended grant would have related to the first day of the parliament) and assuring themselves, that your maj. is ready to observe that your royal Answer, which you lately made to the petition of both houses of parliament: yet doubting lest your maj. may be misinformed concerning this particular case, as if you might continue to take the subsidies of Tunnage and Poundage, and other impositions upon merchants, without breaking that Answer; they are forced, by that duty which they owe to your maj. and to those whom they represent, to declare, "That there shall be not any imposition to be laid upon the Subjects of

Merchants exported or imported, without common consent by act of parliament: which is the right and inheritance of your subjects, grounded not only upon the most antient and original constitution of this kingdom, but often confirmed and declared in divers statutes and laws." And for the better manifestation thereof, may it please your maj. to understand, That although your royal predecessors, the kings of this realm, have often had such subsidies and impositions granted unto them upon divers occasions, especially for the guarding of the seas, and safe-guard of merchants; yet the subjects have been ever careful to use such cautions and limitations in those grants, as might prevent any claim to be made that such subsidies do proceed from duty, and not from the free gift of the subject; and that they have, heretofore, used to limit a time in such grants, and for the most part but short, as for a year or two. And, if it were continued longer, they have sometimes directed a certain space of cessation or intermission; that so the right of the subject might be more evident at all other times. It hath been granted, upon occasions of war, for a certain number of years; with proviso, that if the war ended in the mean time, then the grant should cease; and, of course, it hath been sequestered into the hands of some subjects, to be employed for the guarding of the coasts and narrow seas. And it is acknowledged, by the ordinary answers of your majesty's predecessors in their assents to the bills of subsidies, proceeding from the good-will of the subjects: very few of your predecessors had it for life until the reign of Henry 7. who was so far from conceiving that he had any right thereunto, that although he granted commissions for the collecting of certain duties and customs due by law, yet he made no commissions for receiving of the subsidies of Tunnage and Poundage, until the same was granted unto him in parl.— Since his time, all the kings and queens of this realm have had the like grants for life, by the free love and good will of the subject; and whensoever the people have been grieved by laying any impositions or other charges upon their Goods or Merchandizes, without authority of law; (which hath been very seldom) yet upon complaint in parliament, they have been forthwith relieved; saving in the time of your royal father, who (having, through ill advice, raised the rates and charges upon merchandizes to that height, at which they now are) was yet pleased so far to yield to the complaint of his people, as to offer, That if the value of those impositions which he had set might be made good unto him, he would bind himself and his heirs by act of parliament never to lay any other; which offer the commons at that time, in regard of the great burden, did not think fit to yield unto.—Nevertheless your loyal commons in this parliament, out of their especial zeal to your service, and special regard of your pressing occasions, have taken into their considerations, so to frame a grant of Subsidy of Tunnage and Poundage to your maj. that you might have been the better enabled for the defence of your realm; and your subjects, by being secured from all undue charges, be the more encouraged, cheerfully to proceed in their course of trade; by the increase whereof your majesty's profit, and likewise the strength of the kingdom would be very much augmented: but not being, now, able to accomplish this their desire, there is no course left unto them, without manifest breach of their duty both to your maj. and their country, save only to make this humble Declaration, That the receiving of Tunnage and Poundage, and other Impositions, not granted by parliament, is a breach of the fundamental liberties of this kingdom, and contrary to your majesty's royal Auswer to the Petition of Right. And therefore, they most humbly beseech your maj. to forbear any further receiving of the same; and not to take it in ill part from those of your majesty's loving subjects, who shall refuse to make payment of any such charges, without warrant of law demanded. And as, by this forbearance, your most excellent maj. shall manifest unto the world your royal justice in the observation of your laws; so they doubt not but hereafter, at the time appointed for their coming again, they shall have occasion to express their great desire to advance your majesty's honour and profit."

The Speaker refuses to put the Question; and, offering to leave the House, is held in the Chair.] This was again offered to be put to the question; but the Speaker said, "He was commanded otherwise by the king." To this Mr. Selden answered, "Mr. Speaker, if you will not put the question, which we command you, we must sit still; and so we shall never be able to do any thing. We sit here by command from the king, under the great seal; and as for you, you are, by his majesty, sitting in his royal chair before both houses, appointed our Speaker: and do you now refuse to be a speaker?" The Speaker replied, "He had an express command from the king, so soon as he had delivered his Message, to rise." And, thereupon, he rose and left the chair; but was drawn to it again, by Mr. Hollis, son to the earl of Clare, Mr. Valentine, and other members. Mr. Hollis (notwithstanding sir Tho. Edmonds, and other privy counsellors, endeavoured to free the Speaker) swore, "God's wounds," "He should sit still, till it pleased them to rise." Then the Speaker, with abundance of tears, answered, "I will not say, I will not, but I dare not;" desiring that they would not command his ruin therein, in regard he had been their faithful servant, and would sacrifice his life for the good of his country; but he durst not sin against the express command of his sovereign.

Mr. Selden replied, "That he ever loved his person well, but he could not choose but much blame him now: that he, being the servant of the house, should refuse their command, under any colour; and that his obstinacy would be a precedent to posterity, if it should go unpunished: for that hereafter, if we should meet with a dishonest Speaker (as we cannot promise ourselves to the contrary) he might, under pretence of the king's command, refuse to propose the business and intendment of the house: and therefore wished him to proceed; which he, still, refused with extremity of weeping and supplicatory orations.'

Sir Peter Heyman, a gentleman of his own county (Kent) told him, 'He was sorry he was his kinsman, for that he was the disgrace of his country, and a blot of a noble family; and that all the inconveniences that should follow (yea their destruction) should be derived to posterity, as the issue of his baseness, by whom he should be remembered with scorn and disdain; and that he, for his part, since he would not be perswaded to do his duty, thought it fit he should be called to the bar, and a new Speaker chosen.'

Protestation of the Commons.] In the mean time, since neither advice nor threats could prevail, Mr. Hollis was required to read certain Articles as the Protestation of the house; which, jointly as they were read, were allowed with a loud voice by the house: the effect of which Articles are as followeth, viz. "1. Whoever shall bring in innovation in Religion, or by favour seek to extend or introduce Popery or Arminianism, or other opinions disagreeing from the true and orthodox church, shall be reputed a capital enemy to this kingdom and commonwealth. 2. Whosoever shall counsel, or advise, the taking and levying of the subsidies of Tunnage and Poundage, not being granted by parliament; or shall be an actor or instrument therein, shall be likewise reputed an innovator in the government, and a capital enemy to this kingdom and commonwealth. 3. If any merchant or other person whatsoever, shall voluntarily yield or pay the said subsidies of Tunnage and Poundage, not being granted by parliament; he shall likewise be reputed a betrayer of the liberty of England, and an enemy to the same."

The King sends the Black Rod and threatens to force the Door of the H. of Commons.] These being read and allowed of, the house rose up, after they had sitten down two hours; and in the mean time, the king hearing that the house continued to sit, notwithstanding his command for the adjourning the house, sent a messenger for the serjeant with his mace; which being taken from the table, there can be no further proceedings; but the serjeant was, by the house, stayed; and the key of the door taken from him, and given to a member of the house to keep.—The king sent Mr. Maxwell for the dissolution of the parliament with his Black Rod; but being informed, that neither he nor his Message would be received by the house, he grew into much rage; and sent for the captain of the pensioners and guard to force the door; but the rising of the house, which was adjourned to the 10th of March, prevented the inconveniences and mischiefs that thereon might have ensued.

The King's Speech at the Dissolution of the Parliament.] March 10. The king came to the house of lords, the peers being in their robes, and many of the commons being at the bar of that house; and spake as followeth:—

"My Lords, I never came here upon so unpleasing an occasion, it being for the Dissolution of the Parliament; therefore many may wonder, why I did not rather choose to do this by commission; it being a general maxim of kings, to lay harsh commands by their ministers, themselves only executing pleasing things. But considering that justice is as well answered in commending and rewarding of virtue, as punishing of vice, I thought it necessary to come here this day; to declare to you, my lords, and all the world, that it was only the disobedient carriage of the lower-house that hath caused this dissolution at this time; and that you, my lords, are so far from being causers of it, that I have as much comfort in your lordships carriage towards me, as I have cause to distaste their proceedings. Yet, that I may be clearly understood, I must needs say, that they do mistake me wonderfully, that think I lay the fault equally upon all the lower-house: for as I know there are many as dutiful and loyal subjects as any are in the world; so I know that it was only some vipers amongst them, that had cast this mist of difference before their eyes; although there were some amongst them, that would not be infected with this contagion; inasmuch, that some by their speaking (which indeed was the general fault of the house on the last day) did shew their obedience. To conclude, my lords, as those evil-affected persons must look for their rewards, so you that are here of the higher-house, may justly claim from me that protection and favour, that a good king oweth to his loyal and faithful nobility. And now, my lord keeper, do what I have commanded you."

Then the lord keeper said, "My lords, and gentlemen of the house of commons, the king's majesty doth dissolve this parliament."

The King's Declaration of the Causes of the Dissolution.] Soon after the Dissolution of the Parliament, the following Declaration appeared:—

"HIS MAJESTY'S DECLARATION to all his loving Subjects, of the Causes which moved him to dissolve the last Parliament, March 10, 1628.

"Howsoever princes are not bound to give account of their actions, but to God alone; yet, for the satisfaction of the minds and affections of our loving subjects, We have thought good to set down thus much by way of Declaration, that we may appear to the world in the truth and sincerity of our actions, and not in those colours in which we know some turbulent and ill-affected spirits (to masque and disguise their wicked intentions, dangerous to the state) would represent us to the public view.—We assembled our parliament the 17th of March, in the 3rd year of our reign, for the safety of religion, for securing our kingdoms and subjects at home, and our friends and allies abroad. And therefore at the first sitting down of it, we declared the miserable afflicted estate of those of the reformed religion in Germany, France, and other parts of Christendom; the distressed extremities of our dearest uncle, the king of Denmark, chased out of a great part of his dominions; the strength of that party which was united against us; that (besides the Pope and the House of Austria, and their ancient confederates) the French king professed the rooting out of the Protestant religion; that, of the princes and states of our party, some were over-run, others diverted, and some disabled to give assistance. For which, and other important motives, we propounded a speedy supply of treasure, answerable to the necessity of the cause.—These things, in the beginning, were well resented by the house of commons, and with so much alacrity and readiness, that they agreed to grant a liberal Aid; but before it was brought to any perfection, they were diverted by a multitude of questions raised amongst them, touching their liberties and privileges, and by other long disputes, that the bill did not pass in a long time; and by that delay, our affairs were put into a far worse case than at the first; our foreign actions then in hand, being thereby disgraced and ruined, for want of timely help.—In this, as we are not willing to derogate from the merit and good intentions of those wise and moderate men of that house (to whose forwardness we attribute it, that it was propounded and resolved so soon) so we must needs say, that the delay of passing it when it was resolved, occasioned by causeless jealousies, stirred up by men of another temper, did much lessen both the reputation and reality of that Supply. And their spirit infused into many of the commissioners and assessors in the country, hath returned up the subsidies in such a scanty proportion, as is infinitely short, not only of our great occasions, but of the precedents of former Subsidies, and of the intentions of all well-affected men in that house.—In those large disputes, as we permitted many of our high prerogatives to be debated, which in the best times of our predecessors had never been questioned, without punishment or sharp reproof; so we did endeavour to have shortened those debates, for winning of time, which would have much advantaged our great affairs, both at home and abroad. And therefore, both by speeches and message, we did often declare our gracious and clear resolution, to maintain not only the parliament, but all our people, in their ancient and just Liberties, without either violation or diminution; and in the end, for their full satisfaction and security, did, by an Answer, framed in the form by themselves desired, to their parliamentary Petition confirm their ancient and just Liberties and Rights, which we resolve, with all constancy and justice to maintain.—This parliament, howsoever, besides the settling our necessary Supply, and their own Liberties, wasted much time in such proceedings (blasting our government, as we are unwilling to remember) yet we suffered them to sit, until themselves desired us to appoint a time for their recess, not naming either adjournment or prorogation.—Whereupon by advice of our council, we resolved to prorogue and make a session; and to that end prefixed a day, by which they might (as was meet in so long a sitting) finish some profitable and good laws; and withal gave order for a gracious pardon to all our subjects; which, according to the use of former parliaments, passed the higher house, and was sent down to the commons. All which being graciously intended by us, was ill entertained by some disaffected persons of that house, who by their artifices, in a short time, raised so much heat and distemper in the house, for no other visible cause, but because we had declared our resolution to prorogue, as our council advised, and not to adjourn, as some of that house (after our resolution declared, and not before) did manifest themselves to affect; that seldom hath greater passion been seen in that house upon the greatest occasions. And some glances in the house, but upon open rumours abroad, were spread, That by the Answer to that Petition, we had given away, not only our impositions upon goods exported and imported, but the Tunnage and Poundage; whereas in the debate and hammering of that Petition, there was no speech or mention in either house concerning those impositions, but concerning Taxes and other Charges within the land; much less was there any thought thereby to debar us of Tunnage and Poundage, which, both before and after the Answer to that Petition, the house of commons, in all their speeches and treaties, did profess they were willing to grant. And at the same time, many other misinterpretations were raised of that Petition and Answer, by men not well distinguishing between well-ordered liberty, and licentiousness; as if by our Answer to that Petition, we had let loose the reins of our government. And in this distemper the house of commons, laying aside the Pardon, (a thing never done in any former parliament) and other business fit to have been concluded in that session, some of them went about to frame and contrive a Remonstrance against our receiving of Tunnage and Poundage; which was so far proceeded in, the night before the prefixed time for concluding the session, and so hastened by the contrivers thereof, that they meant to have put it to the vote of the house the next morning, before we should prorogue that session. And therefore finding our gracious favours in the session afforded to our people, so ill required, and such sinister strains made upon our Answer to that Petition, to the diminution of our profit, and (which was more) to the danger of our government; we resolved to prevent the finishing of that Remonstrance, and other dangerous intentions of some ill-affected persons; by ending the session the next morning, some few hours sooner than was expected; and by our own mouth to declare to both houses the cause thereof; and for hindring the spreading of those sinister interpretations of that Petition and Answer, to give some necessary directions for settling and quieting our government, until another meeting, which we performed, accordingly, the 26th of June last. The session thus ended, and the parliament risen, that intended Remonstrance gave us occasion to look into the business of Tonnage and Poundage. And therefore, though our necessities pleaded strongly for us, yet we were not apt to strain that point too far, but resolved to guide ourself by the practice of former ages, and examples of our most noble predecessors; thinking those counsels best warranted, which the wisdom of former ages, concurring with the present occasions, did approve; and therefore gave order for a diligent search of records: upon which it was found, that although in the parliament holden in the first year of the reign of Edw. 4. the Subsidy of Tonnage and Poundage was not granted unto that king, but was first granted unto him by parliament in the third year of his reign; yet the same was accounted and answered to that king, from the first day of his reign, all the 1st and 2nd years of his reign, and until it was granted by parliament. And that in the succeeding times of Rich. 3. Hen. 7. Hen. 8. Edw. 6. queen Mary and Eliz. the Subsidy of Tonnage and Poundage was not only enjoyed by every of those kings and queens, from the death of each of them deceasing, until it was granted by parliament unto the successor; but in all those times, being for the most part peaceable, and not burdened with like charges and necessities, (as these modern times) the parliament did most readily and cheerfully, in the beginning of every of those reigns, grant the same, as a thing most necessary for the guarding of the seas, the safety and defence of the realm, and the support of the royal dignity. And in the time of our royal father of blessed memory, he enjoyed the same a full year, wanting very few days, before his parliament began, and above a year before the act of parliament for the grant of it was passed. And yet when the parliament was assembled, it was granted without difficulty. And in our own time, we quietly received the same 3 years and more, expecting with patience, in several parliaments, the like grant thereof, as had been made to so many of our predecessors; the house of commons still professing, that multitude of other businesses, and not want of willingness on their part, had caused the settling thereof to be so long deferred. And therefore finding so much reason and necessity, for the receiving of the ordinary duties in the custom-house, to concur with the practice of such a succession of kings and queens, famous for wisdom, justice, and government; and nothing to the contrary, but that intended Remonstrance, hatched out of the passionate brains of a few particular persons; we thought it was so far from the wisdom and duty of a house of parliament, as we could not think, that any moderate and discreet man, (upon composed thoughts, setting aside passion and distemper) could be against receiving of Tonnage and Poundage; especially since we do, and still must pursue those ends, and undergo that charge, for which it was first granted to the crown: it having been so long and constantly continued to our predecessors, as that in 4 several acts of parliament, for the granting thereof to Edw. 6. queen Mary, queen Eliz. and our blessed father; it is, in express terms, mentioned to have been had and enjoyed by the several kings named in those acts, time out of mind, by authority of parliament. And therefore upon these reasons, we held it agreeable to our kingly honour, and necessary for the safety and good of our kingdom, to continue the receipt thereof, as so many of our predecessors had done. Wherefore when a few merchants (being at first but one or two) fomented, as it is well known, by those evil spirits, that would have hatched that undutiful Remonstrance, began to oppose the payment of our accustomed duties in the custom-house, we gave order to the officers of our customs to go on, notwithstanding that opposition, in the receiving of the usual duties; and caused those, that refused, to be warned to attend at the council-board, that by the wisdom and authority of our council, they might be reduced to obedience and duty; where some of them, without reverence or respect to the honour and dignity of that presence, behaved themselves with so much boldness and insolency of speech, as was not to be endured by a far meaner assembly; much less to be countenanced by a house of parliament, against the body of our privy council.—And as in this we did what in reason and honour was fit for the present, so our thoughts were daily intensive upon the re-assembling of our parliament; with full intention, on our part, to take away all ill understanding between us and our people; whose love, as we desired to continue and preserve, so we used our best endeavours to prepare and facilitate the way to it. And to this end, having taken a strict and exact survey of our government, both in the church and commonwealth, and what things were most fit and necessary to be reformed: we found in the first place, that much exception had been taken at a book, entituled "Appello Cesarum," or "An Appeal to Cesar," and published in 1625 by R. Montague, then batchelor of divinity, and now bishop of Chichester; and because it did open the way to those schisms and divisions, which have since ensued in the church, we did, for remedy and redress thereof, and for the satisfaction of the consciences of our good people, not only by our public proclamation, call in that book, which ministered matter of offence; but to prevent the like dangers hereafter, reprinted the Articles of Religion established in the time of queen Eliz. and by a Declaration before those Articles, we did tie and restrain all opinions to the sense of those Articles, that nothing might be left for private fancies and in-

innovations. For, we call God to record, before whom we stand, that it is, and always hath been, our hearts desire to be found worthy of that title, which we account the most glorious in all our crown, "Defender of the Faith." Neither shall we ever give way to the authorising of any thing, whereby any innovation may steal or creep into the church; but to reserve that unity of doctrine and discipline, established in the time of queen Eliz. whereby the church of England hath stood and flourish'd ever since.—And as we were careful to make up all breaches and rents in religion at home, so did we, by our proclamation and commandment, for the execution of laws against priests, and popish Recusants, fortify all ways and approaches against that foreign enemy: which if it have not succeeded according to our intention, we must lay the fault where it is, in the subordinate officers and ministers in the country, by whose remissness, Jesuits and priests escape without apprehension; and Recusants from those convictions and penalties, which the law and our commandment would have inflicted on them. For we do promise, that as it is our duty, so it shall be our care, to command and direct well; but it is the art of others to perform the ministerial office. And when we have done our office, we shall account ourself, and all charitable men will account us innocent, both to God and men. And those that are negligent, we will esteem as culpable both to God and us; and therefore will expect, that hereafter they give us a better account.—And, as we have been careful for the settling of Religion, and quieting the church; where we not unmindful of the preservation of the just and antient Liberties of our subjects, which we secured to them by our gracious Answer to their Petition in parliament; having since that time done any act whereby to infringe them. But our care is, and hereafter shall be, to keep them intire and inviolable, as we would do our own right and sovereignty, seeing for that purpose enrolled the Petition and Answer in our courts of justice.—Next to the care of Religion, and of our subjects Rights, we did our best for the provident and well-ordering of that Aid and Supply, which was granted us the last session; whereof a part hath been wastefully spent, nor put to any other use, than those for which it was desired and granted; as, upon payment of our fleet and army; wherein our care hath been such as to choose rather to discontent our dearest friends and allies, and our nearest servants, than to leave our soldiers and mariners unsatisfied, whereby any vexation or disquiet might arise to our people. We have also, with part of those monies, begun to supply our magazines, and stores of munition, and to put our navy into a constant form and order. Our fleet likewise is strong, and almost in readiness, whereby the narrow seas may be guarded, commerce maintained, and our kingdom secured from all foreign attempts. These acts of ours might have made this impression in all good minds, that we were careful to direct our counsels, and dispose our actions, as might most conduce to the maintenance of religion, the honour of our government, and the safety of our people. But with mischievous men once ill-affected, 'seu bene, seu male, facta preununt;' and whatsoever once seem'd amiss, is ever remembered; but good endeavours are never regarded.—Now all these things that were the chief Complaints the last session, being by our princely care so seriously reformed, the parliament re-assembled the 20th of Jan. last. We expected, according to the candour and sincerity of our own thoughts, that men would have framed themselves for the effecting of a right understanding between us and our people. But some few malevolent persons, like empiricks and lewd artists, did strive to make new work, and to have some disease on foot, to keep themselves in request, and to be employed and entertained in the cure. And yet, to manifest how much offences have been diminished, the committees for Grievances, committees for Courts of Justice, and committees for Trade, have, since the sitting down of the parliament, received few Complaints; and those such, as they themselves have not thought to be of that moment or importance, with which our ears should be acquainted.—No sooner therefore was the parliament set down, but these ill-affected men began to sow and disperse their jealousies, by casting out some glances and doubtful speeches, as if the subject had not been so clearly and well dealt with, touching their Liberties, and touching the Petition answered the last parliament. This being a plausible theme, thought on for an ill purpose, easily took hold on the minds of many, that knew not the practice. And thereupon the 2nd day of the parliament, a committee was appointed to search, Whether the Petition and our Answer thereunto were enrolled in the parliament roll, and in the courts at Westminster, and in what manner the same was done. And a day also was then appointed, on which the house being resolved into a committee, should take into consideration those things, wherein the Liberty of the Subject had been invaded, against the Petition of Right. This, though it produced no other effect of moment or importance, yet was sufficient to raise a jealousy against our proceedings, in such as were not well acquainted with the sincerity and clearness of them. There followed another of no less skill; for although our proceedings before the parliament, about matters of Religion, might have satisfied any moderate men of our zealous care thereof, (as we are sure it did the most) yet as bad stomachs turn the best things into their own nature, for want of good digestion; so those distempered persons have done the like of our good intents, by a bad and sinister interpretation: for when they did observe, that many honest and religious minds in that house did complain of those dangers that did threaten the Church; they likewise took the same word in their mouth, and their cry likewise was, "Templum Domini," "Templum Domini," when the true care of the Church never came into their hearts: and what the one did out of zeal unto religion, the other took up as a plausible theme, to deprave our government; as if we, our clergy, and council, were either senseless or careless of religion. And this wicked practice hath been, to make us seem so to walk before our people, as if we halted before God.—Having, by these Artifices, made a jealous impression in the hearts of many; and a day being appointed to treat of the grant of Tunnage and Poundage, at the time prefixed, all expressed great willingness to grant it. But a new strain was found out, that it could not be done without great peril to the right of the subject, unless we should disclaim any right therein, but by grant in parliament, and should cause all those goods to be restored, which, upon commandment from us or our council, were stayed by our officers, until those duties were paid; and consequently should put ourselves out of the possession of Tunnage and Poundage, before they were granted; for else, it was pretended, the subject stood not in fit case to grant it. A fancy and cavil raised of purpose to trouble the business; it being evident, that all the kings before-named did receive that duty, and were in actual possession of it, before, and at the very time, when it was granted to them by parliament. And although we, to remove all difficulties, did from our own mouth, in those clear and open terms that might have satisfied any moderate and well-disposed minds, declare, That it was our meaning, by the gift of our people to enjoy it; and that we did not challenge it of right, but took it de bene esse, shewing thereby, not the right but the necessity by which we were to take it, (wherein we descended, for their satisfaction, so far beneath ourself, as we are confident, never any of our predecessors did the like, nor was the like ever required or expected from them.) Yet for all this, the bill of Tunnage and Poundage was laid aside, upon pretence they must first clear the right of the subject therein; under colour whereof, they entertain the Complaints, not only of John Rolles, a member of their house, but also of Rd. Chambers, John Fowkes, and Bart. Gilman, against the officers of our Customs, for detaining their Goods, upon refusal to pay the ordinary duty, accustomed to be paid for the same. And upon these complaints, they send for the officers of the customs, enforcing them to attend, day after day, by the space of a month together; they cause them to produce their letters patent under our great seal, and the warrants made by our privy council, for levying of those duties. They examine the officers upon what questions they please, thereby to entrap them for doing our service and commandment. In these and other their proceedings, because we would not give the least shew of interruption, we endured long, with much patience, both these, and sundry other strange and exorbitant incroachments and usurpations, such as were never before attempted in that house.—We are not ignorant how much that house hath, of late years, endeavoured to extend their privileges by setting up general committees for Religion, for courts of Justice, for Trade, and the like; a course never heard of until of late; so as, where in former times, the knights and burgesses were wont to communicate to the house such business as they brought from their countries; now there are so many chairs erected, to make enquiry upon all sorts of men, where Complaints of all sorts are entertained, to the unsufferable disturbance and scandal of justice and government; which having been tolerated a while by our father and ourself, hath daily grown to more and more height; insomuch that young lawyers sitting there, take upon them to decry the Opinions of the Judges; and some have not doubted to maintain, That the resolutions of that house must bind the Judges, a thing never heard of in ages past. But in this last assembly of parliament they have taken on them much more than ever before.—They sent messengers to examine our attorney general, (who is an officer of trust and secrecy) touching the execution of some commandments of ours, of which, without our leave first obtained, he was not to give account to any but ourself. They sent a captious and directory Message to the lord treasurer, chancellor, and barons of the exchequer, touching some judicial proceedings of theirs in our court of exchequer.—They sent messengers to examine upon sundry questions, our two chief justices, and 3 other of our judges, touching their judicial proceedings at the gaol-delivery at Newgate, for which they are not accountable to the house of commons.—And whereas suits were commenced in our court of Star-Chamber, against Rd. Chambers, John Fowkes, Bart. Gilman, and Rd. Philips, by our attorney general, for great misdemeanors; they resolved, that they were to have privilege of parliament against us for their persons, for no other cause, but because they had petitions depending in that house; and (which is more strange) they resolved, That a signification should be made from that house, by a letter, to issue under the hand of their Speaker, unto the lord keeper of our great seal, that no attachments should be granted out against the said Chambers, Fowkes, Gilman, or Philips, during their said privilege of parliament. Whereas it is far above the power of that house, to give direction to any of our courts at Westminster, to stop attachments against any man, though never so strongly privileged; the breach of privilege being notice the court that grants, but in the party or minister that puts in execution such attachments. And therefore, if any such letter had come to the lord keeper, as it did not, he should have highly offended us if he had obeyed it. Nay, they went so far, as they spared not the honour of our council board; but examined their proceedings in the case of our customers, interrogating what this or that man of our council said, in direction of them in the business committed to their charge. And when one of the members of that house, speaking of our counsellers, said, 'we had wicked counsel;' and another said, 'That the council and Judges sought to trample under feet the Liberty of the Subject;' and a third traduced our court of Star-Chamber, for the sentence given against Savage, they passed without check or censure by the house. By which may appear, how far the members of that house have of late swollen beyond the rules of moderation, and the modesty of former times; and this under pretext of privilege and freedom of speech, whereby they take liberty to declare against all authority of council and courts, at their pleasure.

—They sent for our sheriff of London to examine him in a cause, whereof they had no jurisdiction; their true and autient jurisdiction extending only to their own members and to the conservation of their privileges; and not to the censure of foreign persons and causes, which have no relation to their privileges, the same being but a late innovation. And yet upon an enforced strain of a contempt, for not answering to their satisfaction, they commit him to the Tower of London; using that outward pretext for a cause of committing him, the true and inward cause being, for that he had shewed himself dutiful to us and our commandment, in the matter concerning our customs.—In these innovations (which we will never permit again) they pretended indeed our service; but their drift was, to break by this means through all respects and ligaments of government; and to erect an universal over-swaying power to themselves, which belongs only to us, and not to them.—Lastly, in their proceeding against our Customers, they went about to censure them as delinquents, and to punish them, for staying some goods of some fictitious merchants, in our store-house, for not paying those duties which themselves had formerly paid; and which the customers, without interception, had received of all other merchants, many years before; and to which they were authorised, both by our great seal, and by several directions and commandments from us and our privy council.—To give some colour to their proceedings herein, they went about to create a new privilege, (which we will never admit) That a parliament-man hath privilege for his Goods against the king; the consequence whereof would be, That he may not be constrained to pay any duties to the king, during the time of privilege of parliament.
It is true, they would have this case to have been between the merchants, and our farmers of our Customs, and have severed them from our interest and commandment, thereby the rather to make them liable to the censure and punishment of that house. But on the other side, we holding it both unjust and dishonour-able, to withdraw ourself from our officers, in any thing they did by our commandment; or to disavow any thing that we had enjoined to be done; upon Monday the 23d of Feb. we sent a Message unto them by secretary Cooke, thanking them for the respect they had shewed in severing the interest of our farmers from our own interest and commandment: but that, nevertheless we were bound, in honour, to acknowledge a truth, that what was done by them, was done by our express commandment and direction; and if for doing thereof our farmers should suffer, it would highly concern us in honour. Which Message was no sooner delivered unto them, but in a tumultuous and discontented manner, they called, 'Adjourn', 'Adjourn.' And thereupon, without any cause given on our part, in a very unusual manner, adjourned until the Wednesday following.— On which day, by the uniform wisdom of our privy council, we caused both houses to be adjourned until the 2nd of March; hoping that in the mean time, a better and more right understanding might be begotten between us and members of that house; whereby the parliament might come to an happy issue.—But understanding, by good advertisement, that their discontent did not in that time digest and pass away; we resolved to make a second adjournment, until the 10th of March; which was done, as well to take time to our self; to think of some means to accomodate those difficulties, as to give them time to advise better; and accordingly, we gave commandment for a second adjournment in both houses, and for cesation of all business till the day appointed; which was very dutifully obeyed in the higher house; no man contradicting or questioning it.

But when the same commandment was delivered in the house of commons by their Speaker, it was straitways contradicted; and although the Speaker declared unto them, It was an absolute right and power in us to adjourn, as well as to prorogue or dissolve; and declared and read unto them divers precedents of that house, to warrant the same; yet our commandment was most contemptuously disobeyed; and some rising up to speak, said,
'They had business to do before the house should be adjourned.'—Whilst the duke of Buckingham lived, he was charged with all the distempers and ill events of former parliaments; and therefore much endeavour was used to demolish him, as the only wall of separation between us and our people. But now he is dead, no alteration was found amongst those envenomed spirits, which troubled, then, the blessed harmony between us and our subjects, and continue still to trouble it. For, now, under the pretence of public care of the common-wealth, they suggest new and causeless fears, which in their own hearts they know to be false; and devise new engines of mischief, so to cast a blindness upon the good affections of our people, that they may not see the truth and largeness of our hearts towards them. So that now it is manifest, the duke was not alone the mark these men shot at, but was only as a near minister of ours, taken up, on the by, and in their passage to their more secret designs; which were only to cast our affairs into a deperate condition, to abate the powers of our

quy; that, in the end, all things may be overwhelmed with anarchy and confusion.—We do not impute these disasters to the whole house of commons, knowing that there were amongst them many religious, grave, and well-minded men; but the sincerer and better part of the house was over-borne by the practices and clamours of the other, who, careless of their duties, and taking advantage of the times and our necessities, have enforced us to break off this meeting; which, had it been answered with like duty on their parts, as it was invited and begun with love on ours, might have proved happy and glorious, both to us and this whole nation.—We have thus declared the manifold Causes we had, to dissolve this parliament, whereby all the world may see, how much they have forgotten their former engagements at the entry into the war, themselves being persuaders to it; promising to make us feared by our enemies, and esteemed by our friends: and how they turned the necessities grown by that war, to enforce us to yield to conditions incompatible with monarchy.—And now that our people may discern, that these provocations of evil men (whose punishments we reserve to a due time) have not changed our good intentions to our subjects, we do here profess to maintain the true Religion and doctrine, established in the church of England, without admitting or conniving at any backsliding, either to popery or schism. We do also declare, That we will maintain the ancient and just rights and liberties of our subjects, with so much constancy and justice, that they shall have cause to acknowledge, that under our government and gracious protection, they live in a more happy and free state than any subjects in the christian world. Yet let no man hereby take the boldness to abuse that liberty, turning it to licentiousness; nor misinterpret the Petition, by perverting it to a lawless liberty, wantonly or frowardly, under that or any other colour, to resist lawful and necessary authority. For as we will maintain our subjects in their just liberties, so we do and will expect, that they yield as much submission and duty to our royal prerogatives, and as ready obedience to our authority and commandments, as hath been performed to the greatest of our predecessors.—And for our ministers, we will not that they be terrified by those harsh proceedings, that have been strai'd against some of them. For, as we will not command any thing unjust or dishonourable, but shall use our authority and prerogatives for the good of our people; so we will expect, that our ministers obey us, and they shall assure themselves we will protect them.—As for our Merchants, we let them know, we shall always endeavour to cherish and enlarge the trade of such as be dutiful, without burthening them beyond what is fitting: but the duty of five in the hundred, for guarding of the seas, and defence of the realm, to which we hold ourselves still obliged, (and which duty hath continued without interruption so many succession of ages) we hold no good or dutiful subject will deny, it being so necessary for the good of the whole kingdom. And if any factious merchant will affront us in a thing so reasonable, and wherein we require no more, nor in no other manner, than so many of our predecessors have done, and have been dutifully obeyed: let them not deceive themselves, but be assured, that we shall find honourable and just means to support our estate, vindicate our sovereignty, and preserve the authority which God hath put into our hands.—And now having laid down the truth and clearness of our proceedings, all wise and discreet men may easily judge of those rumours and jealous fears, that are maliciously and wickedly bruited abroad; and may discern, by examination of their own hearts, whether (in respect of the free passage of the Gospel, indifferent and equal administration of justice, freedom from oppression, and the great peace and quietness which every man enjoyeth under his own vine and fig-tree) the happiness of this nation can be paralleled, by any of our neighbour-countries; and if not, then to acknowledge their own blessedness, and for the same be thankful to God, the Author of all goodness.

Mr. Hollis, sir J. Elliot, and other Members, examined before the Privy Council and committed close Prisoners.] March 4. Two days after the date of the foregoing Proclamation, warrants were directed from the privy council to Denzil Hollis, esq; sir Miles Hobart, sir John Elliot, sir Peter Hayman, John Selden, W. Coriton, Walter Long, W. Strood, and Benj. Valentine, esqrs. commanding their personal appearance the next day. Mr. Hollis, sir J. Elliot, sir M. Hobart, and sir P. Hayman appearing,

Mr. Hollis was questioned, 'Wherefore he, contrary to his former use, did, that morning that the tumult was in the lower house of parliament, place himself above divers of the privy counsellors, by the chair.' He answered, 'That he at some other times, as well as then, seated himself in that place; and as for his sitting above the privy counsellors, he took it to be his due in any place whatsoever, unless at the council-board. And as for his part, he came into the house with as great zeal to do his majesty service as any one whatsoever. And yet nevertheless, finding his maj. was now offended with him, he humbly desired, that he might rather be the subject of his mercy than of his power.' To which the lord treasurer answered, 'You mean rather of his majesty's mercy than of his justice.' Mr. Hollis replied, 'I say of his majesty's power, my lord.'

Sir John Elliot was next called in. He was questioned, 'Whether he had not spoken such and such words, in the lower house of parliament, and shewed unto the said house such and such a paper?' He answered, 'That whatsoever was said or done by him in that place, and at that time, was performed by him as a public man and a member of that house.'

and that he was, and always will be, ready to give an account of his sayings and doings in that place, whensoever he should be called unto it by that house; where, as he taketh it, it is only to be questioned: and, in the mean time, being now but a private man, he would not trouble himself to remember what he had either spoken or done, in that place as a public man.

Sir Miles Hobart, being questioned about his demeanor in the lower house the same day, and for shutting the door; He answered, 'That he desired to know by what warrant he was examined to give an account of his actions in parliament, when he was a member of that house.' And he said, 'He believed that this was a course without precedent, and no council nor commission could take notice of any thing done in parliament but a parliament itself. Nevertheless he would not stick to confess, that it was he that shut the door that day; and when he had locked the door, put the key in his pocket; [and he did it because the house demanded it.]'

Sir Peter Hayman was questioned, 'Wherefore he reproved the Speaker so sharply, that day, in the lower house of parliament?' He answered, 'Because he was the Speaker, and so the servant of the house; and one that ought to have applied himself to the command of the house; and he did it with the more freedom and detestation, because he was his countryman; but yet should also have done it to any other man, that, in the same kind, should have deserved it as he did.' And being farther demanded, 'What he himself would have done, if he had been Speaker, and commanded by the king to deliver such a Message from his maj. to the house?' He answered, 'He would have thrown himself at his majesty's feet, and having given his maj. to understand that, in respect he was the Speaker, he was the most improper and unfit person of any to deliver such a Message; and would therefore have most humbly supplicated his maj. to have elected some other to have performed that part.'

Upon these Answers, the four last-named gentlemen were committed close prisoners to the Tower; the studies of Mr. Hollis, Mr. Selden, and sir J. Elliot were sealed up; and Mr. Loog and Mr. Stroud not appearing, a proclamation was issued out for apprehending them, and not long after they were taken and committed to the King's-bench prison.

Questions proposed to the Judges relating to them. The king being resolved to proceed against these members in the Star-Chamber, ordered all the Judges to be summoned; who being accordingly met at Serjeants Inn, on the 25th of April, one Question was proposed by Mr. Attorney, and resolved, viz. 'That the statute of 4 Hen. 8. intituled, 'An Act concerning R. Strole,' was a particular act of parliament, and extended only to R. Strole, and to those persons that had joined with him to prefer a bill to the house of commons concerning T. uvers; and although the act be private, and extendeth to them alone, yet it was no more than all other parliament-men, by privilege of the house, ought to have, viz. Freedom of Speech concerning those matters debated in parliament, by a parliamentary course.'—The rest of the Questions Mr. Attorney was wished to set down in writing against another day.—Upon Monday following all the Judges met again, and then Mr. Attorney proposed these Questions. 1. Whether if any subject hath received probable information of any treason or treacherous attempt, or intention against the king or state, that subject ought not to make known to the king, or his maj.'s commissioners, when thereunto he shall be required, what information he hath received, and the grounds thereof; to the end the king, being truly informed, may prevent the danger? And if the said subject, in such case, shall refuse to be examined, or to answer the questions which shall be demanded of him for further inquiry and discovery of the truth, whether it be not a high contempt in him, punishable in the Star-chamber, as an offence against the general justice and government of the kingdom. Sol. The Resolution and Answer of all the Justices, is, 'That it is an offence punishable as aforesaid, so that this do not concern himself, but another, nor draw him to danger of treason or contempt, by his answer.'—2. Whether it be a good Answer or Excuse, being thus interrogated, and refusing to answer, to say, 'That he was a parliament-man when he received this information, and that he spake thereof in the parliament house; and therefore the parliament being now ended, he refused to answer to any such questions but in the parliament house, and not in any other place?' Sol. To this the Judges, by advice privately to Mr. Attorney, gave this Answer, 'That this excuse being in nature of a plea and an error in judgment, was not punishable, until he were overruled in an orderly manner, to make another Answer; and whether the party were brought in ore tenus, or by information, for this plea he was not to be punished.'—3. Whether a parliament man, committing an offence against the king or council, not in a parliament way, might, after the parliament ended, be punished or not? Sol. All the Judges, una voce, answered, 'He might, if he be not punished for it in parliament; for the parliament shall not give privilege to any contra morem parliamentarium, to exceed the bounds and limits of his place and duty.' And all agreed, 'That regularly, he cannot be compelled, out of parliament, to answer things done in parliament, in a parliamentary course; but it is otherwise where things are done exorbitantly, for those are not the acts of a court.'—4. Whether if one parliament-man alone shall resolve, or 2 or 3 shall covertly conspire, to raise false scandals and rumours against the lords of the council and judges; not with intent to question them in a legal course, or in a parliamentary way, but to blast them, and to bring them to hatred of the people, and the government is contempt; be punishable in the Star-chamber after the parliament is ended?—Sol. The Judges resolve, 'That the same is punishable out of parliament, as an offence exorbitant committed in parliament, beyond the office, and beside the duty of a parliament-man.'—There was another Question put by Mr. Attorney, viz. 5. Whether if a man in parliament, by way of digression, and not upon any occasion arising concerning the same in parliament, shall say, 'The lords of the council and the judges had agreed to trample upon the liberty of the subject, and the privileges of parliament,' he were punishable or not?—The Judges desired to be spared to make any Answer thereunto, because it concerned themselves in particular.—The next day, Mr. Attorney put to the Judges another case. 6. It is demanded of a parliament-man, being called ore tenus, before the court of Star-chamber, and being charged, that he did not submit himself to examination for such things as did concern the king and the government of the state, and were affirmed to be done by a third person, and not by himself; if he confesses his hand to that refusal, and make his excuse, and plead only that he had privilege of parliament; Whether the court will not over-rule this plea as erroneous, and that he ought to make a further Answer? Sol. 'It is the justest way for the king and the party not to proceed ore tenus; because, it being a point in law, it is fit to hear counsel before it be over-ruled; and upon an ore tenus, by the rules of Star-chamber, counsel ought not to be admitted; and it would not be for the honour of the king, nor the safety of the subject, to proceed in that manner.'

An Information in the Star-chamber against Mr. Hollis, sir J. Elliot. &c.] On these Answers from the Judges, the king's attorney general next proceeded to exhibit an information against the gentlemen, in the court of Star-Chamber; which, though not strictly parliamentary, yet, as it refers to what had been done and said in parliament, deserves our notice; as well as the rest of the proceedings against them, as they are collected in Rushworth, to the end of this business. The Information was as follows:

"Jovis 7mo. Die Maii, Anno 5to. Car. R.

"To the king's most excellent maj.; Humbly sheweth and informeth unto your most excellent maj. sir Rob. Heath, your maj.'s attorney general, for and on your maj.'s behalf, That whereas, by the ancient and fundamental laws of this kingdom, the high court of parliament consisteth of the lords spiritual and temporal in the lords house, and of the knights, citizens, and burgesses in the commons house of parliament; and those two houses, thus composed, do together make up that great and honourable body, whereof your maj. as the supreme sovereign, is the head: and whereas the power of summoning and assembling of parliaments, and of continuing, proroguing, adjourning, and dissolving thereof within this realm at your good pleasure, is the undoubted right of your maj.; and the liberty and freedom of speech, which the members of the said houses of parliament have, according to the privilege of those several houses, to debate, consult, and determine of those things which are propounded amongst them, is, and ever hath been, and ought to be, limited and regulated within the bounds of moderation and modesty, and of that duty which subjects owe to their sovereign: and whereas your maj. for many weighty causes, and for the general good and defence of the church and state of this your kingdom, lately summoned a parliament to be holden at your city of Westminster, the 17th day of March, in the 3d year of your maj.'s reign, which continued from thence by prorogation until the 20th of Jan. last; from which day, until the 25th of Feb. following, the said houses continued sitting. And although the greater part of the house of commons, being zealous of the common good, did endeavour to have effected those good things for which they were called thither; yet between the said 20th of Jan. and the said 25th of Feb. by the malevolent disposition of some ill-affected members of the said house, sundry diversions and interruptions were there made, and many jealousies there unjustly raised and nourished; to the disturbance of those orderly and parliamentary proceedings, which ought to have been in so grave a council. During which time of the said last meeting in parliament, as aforesaid, so it is, may it please your maj. that sir John Elliot, knight, then and all the time of the said parliament, being one of the members of the said commons house, wickedly and maliciously intending, under a feigned colour and pretence of debating the necessary affairs of the present estate, to lay a scandal and unjust aspersion upon the right hon. the lords, and others of your maj.'s most hon. privy-council, and upon the rev. judges, and your counsel learned; and as much as in him lay, to bring them into the hatred and ill opinion of the people; after the said 20th day of Jan. and before the said 25th of Feb. last, did openly and publicly in the said house of commons, falsely and maliciously affirm, 'That your majesty's privy-council, all your judges and your counsel learned, had conspired together to trample under their feet the liberties of the said subjects of this realm, and the privileges of that house.' And further, that when your maj. upon the 25th of Feb. had, by sir John Finch, knt. then Speaker of the said house of commons, signified your royal pleasure, that the said house should be instantly adjourned until the 2d of March then following, he the said sir J. Elliot, and Daniel Hollis, esq.; Benjamin Valentine, gentleman, Walter Long, esq., William Coriton esq., Wm. Strode, esq., John Selden, esq., sir Miles Hobart, and sir Peter Hayman, knights, all members at that time of the said commons house, conceiving with themselves, that your maj. being justly provoked thereto, would open-daily dissolve that parliament; they the said sir J. Eliot, &c. and every of them, by unlawful confederacy and combination between them in that behalf before had, did maliciously resolve, agree and conspire, how and by what means, before that parliament should be dissolved, they might raise such false and scandalous rumours against your majesty's government, and your counsellors of estate attending your person, that thereby as much as in them lieth, they might disturb the happy government of this kingdom, by and under your maj.; interrupt the course of traffick and trade; discourage your merchants, and raise jealousies and suspicions in the hearts of your people, that the sincerity of the true religion professed and established in this kingdom, was neglected: and in pursuance of this their resolution and confidence aforesaid, the said sir J. Eliot, with the privy and consent of the said Denzil Hollis, and all other the said confederates, did prepare a paper or writing, wherein he had written, or caused to be written, divers false and scandalous assertions, touching your majesty's government, and touching the persons of divers of your privy-council; which he and they resolved, and conspired, and agreed, should be delivered into the said house of commons, and there publicly read; to the wicked and seditious intents and purposes aforesaid, and not with any purpose or opinion, that those things that were therein contained, if they, or any of them had been true, as indeed they were not, should, or could be at that time entertained, or pursued in any legal or parliamentary way; but merely and only to express, and vent his and their own malice and disaffection to your maj. and your happy government.—And your maj. upon the said 2nd of March having signified your royal pleasure unto the said sir J. Finch, then Speaker of that house, That the said house should then be presently adjourned until the 10th day of the said month of March, without any further speech or proceedings at that time; and the said Speaker then delivered your majesty's pleasure and commandment to the said house accordingly, and declared unto them your majesty's express charge and command unto him, That if any should, notwithstanding, disobey your majesty's command, that he must forthwith leave the charge, and wait upon your maj.: unto which commandment of your maj. and signification of your royal pleasure in that behalf, for a present adjournment of the house, the greatest number of the members of that house, in their duty and allegiance unto your maj. were willing to have given a ready obedience; as the lords spiritual and temporal, upon the very same day, upon the like signification, made unto them of your majesty's pleasure, by your lord keeper of your great seal of England, the Speaker of that house, had done: yet so it is, that the said sir J. Eliot, for the satisfying of his own malice and disloyal affections to your maj. and by the confederacy and agreement aforesaid, and in a high contempt and disobedience unto your majesty's command, and with set purpose to oppose your majesty's said command, did stand up, and several times offered to speak. Whereupon the said Speaker, in obedience to your majesty's said command, endeavouring to have gone out of the Chair, the said D. Hollis and B. Valentine, being then next the Speaker's Chair, and the one of them on the one hand, and the other of them on the other hand of the Speaker (where they so placed themselves of purpose on that day) out of their disobedience to your maj. and by the confederacy and agreement aforesaid; violently, forcibly, and unlawfully, and with purpose to raise a tumult in the said house, kept and held the said Speaker in the said chair, against his will: and the said Speaker again endeavouring to leave the chair, and having then gotten out of the chair, they, the said D. Hollis and B. Valentine, laid violent hands upon the said Speaker, forcibly, and unlawfully, and by strong hand, thrust him into his chair again; and then the said sir J. Eliot again stood up, and used these speeches; 'We have prepared a short Declaration of our intentions, which I hope shall agree with the honour of the house, and the justice of the king.' And with that, he threw down a paper into the floor of the said house, desiring it might be read: and the said D. Hollis, B. Valentine, and all other the confederates aforesaid, in disobedience and high contempt of your majesty's said command, called and cried out to have the same paper read. But some others of the house spake to the contrary, that it might not be read; and the house thereupon, by reason of the disorderly behaviour of the said confederates, was much troubled; many pressing violently and tumultuously to have the said paper read, and others dutifully and diligently urging the contrary, to the great disquiet and discomfort of many well-affected members of that house. And the said Wm. Coriton, in this distemper, demeaned himself so passionately and violently; that he then, and there violently, forcibly, and unlawfully assaulted and struck — Winter-ton, gent. then being a member of the said house: and divers of the members of the said house, being then desirous, and endeavouring to have gone out of the said house, the said sir Miles Hobart did, of his own head, lock the door of the said house, and kept the key thereof; and imprisoned the members of the said house, being then in the said house, against their wills, so that none of them could go out. And the said Wm. Strode, for the further expressing of his malignity and undutifulness towards your maj. and in pursuance of the agreement and confederacy aforesaid, openly moved, and with much earnestness urged, That the said Paper or Declaration might be first read, 'To the end, that' (as he then, in great contempt of your royal maj. said) 'We' (meaning the members of the house) 'may not be turned off like scattered sheep, and sent home as we were last sessions, with a scorn put upon us in print;' meaning thereby the words which your maj. in your own person, spake at the ending of the last session, and caused the same to be printed: and the said Stroud in a very disorderly manner; further moved, That all those who would have the said Paper read, should stand up; which divers of them thereupon did accordingly, and he, the said Stroud, amongst others did stand up; and in this heat of contention, and height of disobedience, by the confederacy aforesaid, to have the said paper read; the said sir P. Hayman, with rough and reproachful words, reproved the said Speaker, for being constant and resolute in his obedience to your maj. in not putting the reading of the said paper to the question; as by all the said confederates, with many reasons and arguments he was urged to do: and the said sir P. Hayman then further said, 'The said Speaker was made an instrument to cut up the liberty of the subjects by the roots.' But when by no means, the said Speaker would be drawn to transgress your majesty's royal command aforesaid; then, lest the said paper should not be read, the said John Selden moved, That the clerk of the said house might read the same: and when the said sir J. Elliot found, that he and his confederates aforesaid, could not procure the said paper to be read; he, the said sir J. Elliot, to the end he might not lose that opportunity, to vent and publish those malicious and seditious resolutions, which he and his confederates had collected, and prepared as aforesaid, took back the said paper again; and then immediately, in the said house, said, 'I shall now express that by tongue, which this Paper should have done;' and then spake these words: 'The miserable condition we are in, both in matters of Religion and Policy, makes me look with a tender eye both to the person of the king, and to the subjects.' And then speaking of them whom he intended to be ill instruments in this state, at whom he principally aimed, he said, 'There are amongst them some prelates of the church, the great bishop of Winchester, and his fellows; it is apparent what they have done to cast an aspersion upon the honour, and piety, and goodness of the king: these are not all; but it is extended to some others, who, I fear, in guilt of conscience of their own desert, do join their power with that bishop and the rest, to draw his maj. into a jealousy of the parliament; amongst whom, I shall not fear to name the great lord treasurer, in whose person, I fear, is contracted all that which we suffer. If we look into Religion or Policy, I find him building upon the ground laid by the duke of Buckingham, his great master; from him, I fear, came those ill counsels, which contracted the unhappy conclusion of the last session of parliament. I find, that not only in the affections of his heart, but also, by his whole behaviour, he is the head of the papists, and I doubt not to fix it indubitably upon him; and so from the power and greatness of him comes the danger of our religion. For Policy, in that great question of Tunnage and Poundage, the interest, which is pretended to be the king's, is but the interest of that one person, to undermine the policy of this government, and thereby to weaken the kingdom; while he invites strangers to come in to drive away our trade, or at least our merchants to trade in strangers bottoms, which is as dangerous. Therefore it is fit to be declared by us, that all that we suffer, is the effect of new counsels, to the ruin of the government of the state; and to make a protestation against all those men, whether greater or subordinate, that they shall all be declared as capital enemies to the king and kingdom, that will persuade the king to take tannage and poundage without grant of parliament; and that if any merchants shall willingly pay those duties, without consent of parliament, they shall be declared as accessories to the rest.' Which words of the said sir J. Elliot, were by him uttered as aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, and seditiously, out of the wickedness of his own affections towards your maj. and your gracious and religious government; and by the confederacy, agreement, and privy of the said other confederates, and to lay a slander and scandal thereupon; and not with a purpose, or in a way to rectify any thing which he conceived to be amiss, but to traduce and blast those persons against whom he had conceived malice; for so himself the same day in that house said, and laid down as a ground for what he intended to say, 'That no man was ever blasted in that house, but a curse fell upon him.'—And further, That when the said sir J. Elliot had thus vented that malice and wickedness which lay in his heart; and as appeareth by his own words, were expressed in the said paper, which was prepared as aforesaid; the said Walter Long, out of his inveterate malice to your maj. and to your affairs, and by the confederacy aforesaid, then and there said, 'That man who shall give away my liberty and inheritance (I speak of the merchants) I note them for capital enemies to the kingdom.' And lest the hearers should forget these wicked desperate positions laid down as aforesaid, and to the end the same might have the deeper impression, and be the more divulged abroad to the prejudice of your maj. and of your great affairs, and to the scandal of your government; the said D. Hollis collected into several heads, what the said sir J. Elliot had before delivered out of that paper, and then said, 'Whosoever shall counsel the taking up of Tunnage and Poundage, without an act of parliament, let him be accounted a capital enemy to the king and kingdom.' And, further, 'What merchants soever shall pay Tunnage and Poundage without an act of parliament, let him be accounted a betrayer of the liberty of the subject, and a capital enemy to the king and kingdom.'—Which position thus laid, the said D. Hollis, neither being Speaker, nor sitting in the chair as in a committee by direction of the house; but in an irregular way, and contrary to all course of orderly proceedings in parliament offered to put these things so delivered by him as aforesaid, to the question; and drew from his confederates aforesaid an applause and assent, as if these things had been voted by the house.

And further, That the disobedience of the said confederates was then grown to that height, that when Ed. Grimston, the sergeant at arms then attending the Speaker of that house, was sent for by your maj. personally to attend your highness, and the same was made known in the said house; the said confederates notwithstanding, at that time, forcibly and unlawfully kept the said Ed. Grimston locked up in the said house, and would not suffer him to go out of the house to attend your maj.: and when also on the same day, James Maxwell, esq. the gentleman-usher of the black-rod, was sent from your maj. to the said commons house, with a Message immediately from your majesty's own person, they the said confederates utterly refused to open the door of the house, and to admit the said James Maxwell to go to deliver his Message. After all which, the said house was then adjourned until the said 10th day of March then following; and on the said 10th day of March the said parliament was dissolved and ended.—In consideration of all which premises, and forasmuch as the contempt and disobedience of the said sir John Elliot, and other the confederates aforesaid, were so great and so many, and unwarranted by the privilege and due proceedings of parliament; were also committed with so high a hand, and are of so ill example and so dangerous consequence, and remain all unpardoned: therefore he, the said attorney general, prayed a process against them to answer their contempts in the high court of Star-chamber."

The rest of the judicial proceedings against these gentlemen are divided in Rushworth, but we shall connect them together in this manner:

The Members brought, upon a Habeas Corpus, before the Court of King's-Bench.] Pasch. 5 CAROLI, Banco Regis: Upon a Habeas Corpus of this court to bring the body of William Stroud, esq., with the cause of his imprisonment, to the marshal of the King's-bench; it was returned in this manner, 'That Mr. Wm. Stroud was committed into my custody, by virtue of a certain warrant under the hands of 12 of the lords of the privy-council of the king.' The tenor of which warrant followeth in these words: "You are to take knowledge, That it is his majesty's pleasure and commandment, that you take into your custody the body of Wm. Stroud, esq. and keep him close prisoner till you shall receive other order, either from his maj. or this board; for so doing, this shall be your warrant. 2d April, 1629." And the direction of the warrant was, 'To the Marshal of the King's-bench, or his deputy.' He is also detained in prison, by virtue of a warrant under his majesty's hand; the tenor of which warrant followeth in these words: "C. R. Whereas you have in your custody the body of Wm. Stroud, esq. by warrant of our lords of our privy-council, by our special command; you are to take notice, that this commitment was for notable contempts by him committed, against our self and our government, and for stirring up sedition against us; for which you are to detain him in your custody, and to keep him close prisoner, until our pleasure be further known concerning his deliverance. Given at Greenwich, 7th May, 1629." The direction being, 'To the Marshal of our bench for the time being.'—Upon another Habeas Corpus to the Marshal of the household, to have the body of Walter Long, esq. in court, it was returned according as the return of Mr. Stroud.

Trinity, 5 CAROLI, Banco Regis: The first day of this term, upon a Habeas Corpus to sir Allen Apsley, lieut. of the Tower, to bring here the body of John Selden, esq. with the cause of detainer; he returned the same cause as in Mr. Stroud's case. And Mr. Littleton of the Inner-Temple, of counsel with Mr. Selden, moved, 'That the return was insufficient in substance; therefore prayed, That he might be bailed: and said, That it was a matter of great consequence, both to the prerogative of the king, and to the liberty of the subject: but as for the difficulty of law contained in it, he said (under favour) the case cannot be said to be Grand. And so proceeded to his argument, and concluded, That the prisoner ought to be bailed.'—The same day sir Niles Hobart, Benj. Valentine, and Denzil Hollis, esq.; appeared at the bar, upon the Habeas Corpus directed to several prisons. And their counsel were ready to have argued the case for them also: but, because the same return was made for them as for Mr. Selden, they all declared, They would rely on this argument made by Mr. Littleton. Some few days after, sir R. Heath, Attorney-General, argued, 'That this return was good, and that Mr. Selden and the rest of the parties ought not to be bailed; and that, within the return, there appears good cause of their commitment and of their detainer also. He said, the case is great in expectation and consequence, and concerns the liberty of the subject on one part, whereof the argument is plausible; and on the other part it concerns the safety and sovereignty of the king, which (he said) is a thing of great weight; and that the consideration of both pertained to the Judges, without slighting the one, or too much elevating the other: and so proceeded to his argument, and concluded, That the prisoners ought to be remanded.'

The Members removed to other Prisons, by the King's Order.] When the court was ready to have delivered their opinions in this great business, the prisoners were not brought to the bar, according to the rule of the court: therefore proclamation was made, for the keepers of the several prisons to bring in their prisoners; but none of them appeared, except the Marshal of the King's-bench, who informed the court, 'That Mr. Stroud, who was in his custody, was removed yesterday, and put in the Tower of London by the king's own warrant; and so it was done with the other prisoners, for each of them was removed out of his prison in which he was before? But notwithstanding it was prayed by the counsel for the prisoners, that the court would deliver their opinion as to the matter in law; yet they refused to do so, because it was to no purpose; for the prisoners being absent, they could not be bailed, delivered, or remanded.

The King's Letters to the Judges, on that Occasion.] The evening before, there came a Letter to the Judges of this court from the King himself, informing the court with the reasons, wherefore the prisoners were not suffered to come at the day appointed for the resolution of the Judges. These were the words of the letter:

"To our trusty and well-beloved, our chief justice, and the rest of our justices of our bench.

"C. R. Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well: Whereas, by our special commandment, we have lately removed sir Miles Hobart, Walter Long, and Wm. Stroud from the several prisons where they were formerly committed, and have now sent them to our Tower of London; understanding there are various constructions made thereof, according to the several apprehensions of those who discourse of it, as if we had done it to decline the course of justice: we have therefore thought fit to let you know the true reason and occasion thereof; as also, why we commanded those and the other prisoners should not come before you the last day; we (having heard how most of them, a while since, did carry themselves insolently and unmanly both towards us and your lordships) were and are very sensible thereof, and though we hear yourselves gave them some admonition for that miscarriage, yet we could not but resent our honour, and the honour of so great a court of justice to far, as to let the world know how much we dislike the same: and, having understood, that your lordships and the rest of our Judges and barons of our court of Common Pleas and Exchequer (whose advices and judgments we have desired in this great business, so much concerning our government) have not yet resolved the main question, we did not think the presence of those prisoners necessary; and until we should find their temper and discretions to be such as may deserve it, we were not willing to afford them favour. Nevertheless, the respect we bear to the proceedings of that court, hath caused us to give way, that Selden and Valentine should attend you to-morrow; they being sufficient to appear before you, since you cannot as yet give any resolute opinion in the main point in question."

Within three hours after the receipt of those letters, other letters were brought unto the said judges, as followeth:

"To our trusty and well-beloved, our Chief Justice, and the rest of our justices of our bench.

"C. R. Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well; Whereas, by our letters of this day's date, we gave you to understand our pleasure, That of those prisoners, which, by our commandment, are kept in our Tower of London, Selden and Valentine should be brought to-morrow before you; now, upon more mature deliberation, we have resolved, That all of them shall receive the same treatment, and that none shall come before you until we have cause given us to believe they will make a better demonstration of their modesty and civility, both towards us and your lordships, than at their last appearance they did. Given under our signet at our manor at Greenwich, this 24th day of June, in the 5th year of our reign."

So the court delivered no opinion this term; and the imprisoned gentlemen continued in restraint all the long vacation.

The King sends for the Judges.] Towards the latter end of this vacation, all the justices of the King's Bench, being then in the country, received a letter to be at Serjeant's Inn upon Michaelmas-Day. These letters were from the council-table, and the cause expressed in them, was, 'That his majesty had present and urgent occasion to use their service.' The Judges came up accordingly on Tuesday, being Michaelmas-day. The next morning about 4 o'clock, letters were brought to the chief justice from Mr. Trumbal, clerk of the council then attending, that he and judge Whitlock, one of the judges of that court, should attend the king that morning, so soon as conveniently they could; which the chief justice and that judge did at Hampton that morning. Here the king, taking them apart from the council, fell upon the business of the gentlemen in the Tower; and was contented they should be bailed, notwithstanding their obstinacy, in that they would not give the king a Petition, expressing, 'That they were sorry he was offended with them.' He shewed his purpose to proceed against them by the common-law in the King's Bench, and to leave his proceeding in the Star-chamber. Divers other matters he proposed to the said judges by way of advice, and seemed well contented with what they answered, though it was not to his mind; which was, 'That the offences were not capital; and that by law the prisoners ought to be bailed, giving security for their good behaviour.' Whereupon the king told them, 'That he would never be offended with his judges, so they dealt plainly with him, and did not answer him by oracles and riddles.' Both these judges did at that time, what good offices they could to bring on the king to heal this breach.

A Motion to bail the Prisoners.] The first day of Michaelmas term, it was moved, by Mr. Mason, to have the Resolution of the Judges; and the court with one voice said, 'That they are now content, that they should be bailed, but that they ought to find sureties also for their good behaviour.' And Justice Jones said, 'That so it was done in the case which had been often remembered to another purpose, to wit, Russel's Case, in 9 Ed. 3.' To which Mr. Selden answered (with whom all the other prisoners agreed in opinion) 'That they have their sureties ready for the bail, but not for the good behaviour; and desire, that the bail might first be accepted, and that they be not urged to the other; and that for these reasons: I. 'The case here hath long depended in court, they have been imprisoned for these 30 weeks, and it had been oftentimes argued on the one side and the other; and those that argued for the king, always demanded that we should be remanded; and those which argued on our side, desired that we might be bailed or discharged; but it was never the desire of the one side or the other, that we should be bound to the good behaviour. And, in the last term, 4 several days were appointed for the Resolution of the court, and the sole point in question was, 'If bailable or not.' Therefore they now desire, that the matter of bail and of good behaviour may be severed, and not confounded.' II. 'Because the finding of sureties of good behaviour is seldom urged upon returns of felonies or treasons. And it is but an implication, upon the return, that we are culpable of those matters which are objected. III. 'We demand to be bailed, in point of right; and if it be not grantable of right, we do not demand it, but the finding of sureties for the good behaviour, is a point of discretion merely; and we cannot assent to it, without great offence to the parliament, where these matters, which, as surmised by the return, were acted: and, by the statute of 4 Hen. 8. all punishments of such nature are made void and of none effect, therefore,' &c.

The Opinion of the Court.] Curia; The Return doth not make mention of any thing done in parliament; and we cannot, in a judicial way, take notice that these things were done in parliament.—Whitlocke, 'The surety of good behaviour is as a preventing medicine of the damage, that may fall out to the commonwealth; and it is an act of government and jurisdiction, and not of law.'—Crooke, 'It is no inconvenience to the prisoners; for the same bail sufficeth, and all shall be written upon one piece of parchment.'—Hereupon sir R. Heath, Attorney-general, said, 'That by the command of the king, he had an information ready in his hand to deliver in the court against them.'—Hide, chief-justice, 'If now you refuse to find sureties for the good behaviour, and be for that cause remanded; perhaps we, afterwards, will not grant Habeas Corpus for you, inasmuch as we are made acquainted with the cause of your imprisonment.'—Hereupon Ashley, the king's serjeant, offered his own bail for Mr. Hollis, one of the prisoners, (who had married his daughter and heiress) but the court refused it; 'For it is contrary to the course of the court unless the prisoner himself will become bound also.' And this Mr. Hollis had denied to do.—Mr. Long, though he had found sureties in the chief-justice's chamber, for the good behaviour, refused to continue his sureties any longer; inasmuch as they were bound in a great sum of 2000*l.* and the good behaviour was a ticklish point. Therefore, he was committed to the custody of the marshal, and all the other prisoners were remanded to the Tower, because they would not find sureties for the good behaviour.

An Information exhibited in the King's Bench against Sir J. Elliot, &c.] The same term an Information was exhibited, by the attorney-general, against sir J. Elliot, D. Hollis, and B. Valentine. To this Information the defendants put in a plea to the jurisdiction of the court: 'Forasmuch as these offences are supposed to have been done in parliament, they ought not to be punished in this court, or any other except in parliament.' And the attorney-general moved the court to over-rule the plea, as to the jurisdiction of the court; and this he said; the court might do, although he did not demur upon the plea; but the court would not over-rule the plea; but gave a day to join in demurrer that term: and on the first day of the next term, the record to be read, and within a day after argued at the bar.

Mr. Walter Long's Case in the Star-Chamber.] In Hilary term following, the Case of Walter Long, esq. one of the imprisoned gentlemen, came to a hearing in the Star-Chamber, which was as followeth: An Information was exhibited into the Star-Chamber, by sir R. Heath, attorney-general, plaintiff, against the said Walter Long, defendant, "For a great and presumptuous contempt against his maj. for breach of duty and trust of his office, and for manifest and wilful breach of his oath taken as high sheriff of the county of Wilts, and not residing and dwelling in his own person in the said county, according to the said oath; but being chosen one of the citizens for the city of Bath, to serve for the said city in the last parliament, by colour thereof he remained at London or Westminster during the time of that parliament, by the space of 3 months and above; in neglect of his duty, and in manifest contempt of the laws of this kingdom: which cause was now, by his maj.'s said attorney-general, brought to a hearing upon the defendant's own confession. That upon opening the Answer, and reading the examination of the said defendant, it appeared to this court, 'That the said defendant, Long, was by his now maj. made high sheriff of the county of Wilts, in or about Nov. in the 3rd year of his reign, received his patent of sheriffwick for the said county about ten days after; and that he took an oath before one of the masters of the chancery, for the due execution of the said office of sheriff of the said county.' In which oath, as appeared by the same there read in court, he did swear, that he would in his own person remain within his bailiffwick during all the time of his sheriffwick, unless he had the king's license to the contrary; and that at an election of citizens for the said city of Bath, the said defendant,

Long, was chosen one of the citizens to serve for the said city, in the parliament then summoned, to be holden upon the 17th of March, in the said 3rd year of his maj.'s reign; and being so chosen, and returned by the sheriff of the county of Somerset, notwithstanding his said oath taken to remain in his proper person, within his bailiwick, unless he were licensed by his maj.; he the said defendant did make his personal appearance in the commons house of parliament; and did, during the most part of the said parliament, continue in and about the city of London and Westminster, and did attend in the parliament, as a citizen for the said city of Bath, during all which time he likewise was, and continued high sheriff for the said county of Wilts, and had no particular license from his maj. to the contrary. Upon consideration whereof, as also of the particular causes and reasons of the defendants demurrer and plea formerly exhibited unto the said information; the benefit whereof was by order of the court reserved unto the defendant to be debated and considered of at the hearing of this cause; and of divers other matters now urged for the defendant, both to have justified his the said defendant's attendance in parliament, and his not residence in person in the county whereof he was then sheriff, and among other things that it properly belonged to the house of parliament to judge of the justness or unjustness of the said election; and upon grave and mature consideration thereof had and taken by the court, their lordships did not only conceive the said demurrer and plea, and other the arguments and reasons used by the defendant and his counsel, to be of no weight or strength, but also to be in opposition and derogation of the jurisdiction of the court: the reasons moved and urged for the defendant's excuse or justification being clearly answered, and the charges of the information made good by Mr. Attorney-general, and others of his majesty's counsel learned.—And therefore the whole court were clear of opinion, and did so declare, 'That the said defendant, who at that time, as high sheriff, had the custody and charge of the county of Wilts committed unto him by his maj.; had taken his oath according to the law to abide in his proper person within his bailiwick, during all the time of his sheriffwick as aforesaid; and whose trust and employment did require his personal attendance in the said county; had not only committed a great offence in violating the said oath so by him taken, but also a great misdemeanor in breach of the trust committed unto him by his maj.; and in contempt of his maj.'s pleasure signified unto him, by and under his highness's great seal, when he granted unto him the said office of sheriffwick aforesaid. For which said several great offences, in breach of his said oath, neglect of the trust and duty of his office, and the great and high contempt of his maj. their lordships did hold the same defendant worthy the sentence of the court; the rather, to the end that, by this example, the sheriffs of all other counties may be deterred from committing the like offences hereafter; and may take notice, that their personal residence and attendance is required within their bailiwick during the time of their sheriffwick. The court therefore thought fit, ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the said defendant should stand and be committed to the prison of the Tower, there to remain during his maj.'s pleasure, and also pay a fine of 2000 marks to his maj.'s use; and further make his humble submission and acknowledgment of his offence both in the court of Star-chamber, and to his majesty before his enlargement from thence."

The Judges give their Opinions in the Case of sir John Elliot, &c. In the same term, Mr. Mason argued, in the King's bench for sir John Elliot, against the information preferred against him (amongst others) by sir R. Heath, the king's attorney-general; and the same day the attorney-general argued in maintenance of the said Information. The Judges also, the same day, spake briefly to the case, and agreed with one voice, that the court, as this case is, shall have jurisdiction, although that these offences were committed in parliament; and that the imprisoned members ought to answer.'

Mr. Justice Jones began and said, 'That though this question be now newly moved, yet it is an ancient question with him; for it had been in his thoughts these 18 years. For this information, there are 3 questions in it? 1. Whether the matters informed be true or false; and this ought to be determined by jury or demurrer? When the matters of the information are found or confessed to be true, if the Information be good in substance? 3. Admit that the offences are truly charged, if this court hath power to punish them? And that is the sole question of this day.—And it seems to me, that of these offences, although committed in parliament, this court shall have jurisdiction to punish them. The plea of the defendants here to the jurisdiction being concluded with a demurrer, is not peremptory unto them, although it be adjudged against them; but if the plea be pleaded to the jurisdiction, which is found against the defendant by verdict, this is peremptory. In the discussion of this point, I decline these questions. 1. If the matter be voted in parliament, when it is finished, whether it can be punished and examined in another court? 2. If the matter be commenced in parliament, said that ended, if afterwards it may be questioned in another court? I question not these matters, but I hold, That an offence committed, criminally, in parliament, may be questioned elsewhere, as in this court; and that for these reasons. 1. Quia interest reipublicæ, ut maleficia non mancant impunita; and there ought to be a fresh punishment of them. Parliaments are called at the king's pleasure, and the king is not compellable to call his parliament; and if, before the next parliament, the party offending, or the witnesses, die, then there will be a failure of jus tice. 2. The parliament is no constant court; every parliament mostly consists of several men, and, by consequence, they cannot take notice of matters done in the foregoing parliament; and there they do not examine by oath, unless it be in chancery, as it is used of late time. 3. The parliament cannot send process to make the offenders to appear at the next parliament; and being at large, if they hear a noise of a parliament, they will fugam facere, and so prevent their punishment. 4. Put the case that one of the defendants be made a baron of parliament, then he cannot be punished in the house of commons; and so he shall go unpunished.—It hath been objected, 'That the parliament is a superior court to this, therefore this court cannot examine their proceedings.' To this I say, That this court of the King's-bench is a higher court than the justices of oyer and terminer, or the justices of assize: but if an offence be done where the King's-bench is, after it is removed, this offence may be examined by the justices of oyer and terminer, or by the justices of assize. We cannot question the judgments of the parliaments, but their particular offences.—A second Objection is, 'That it is a privilege of parliament, whereof we are not competent judges.' To this I say, That 'privilegium est privata lex, & privat legem.' And this ought to be by grant or prescription, in parliament; and then it ought to be pleaded for the manner, as is in 33 Hen. 8. as it is not here pleaded. Also, we are judges of all acts of parliament; as 4 Hen. 7. Ordinance made by the king and commons is not good, and we are judges what shall be said a session of parliament, as it is in Plowden, in Partridge's Case. We are judges of their lives and lands, therefore of their liberties. And, 8 Eliz. it was the opinion of Dyer, Catlyn, Welsh, Brown, and Southcot, justices, 'That offences committed in parliament may be punished out of parliament.' And 3 Ed. 5. 19. it is good law. And it is usual, near the end of parliaments, to set down some petty punishment upon offenders in parliament, to prevent other courts. And I have seen a roll in this court, in 6 Hen. 6. where judgment was given in a writ of annuity in Ireland; and afterward the said judgment was reversed in parliament in Ireland; upon which judgment, writ of error was brought in this court, and reversed.

Chief Justice Hyde argued to the same effect: 'No new matter hath been offered to us, new, by them that argue for the defendants; but the same reasons and authorities, in substance, which were objected before all the justices of England, and barons of the Exchequer, at Serjeant's-Inn in Fleet-Street; upon an information, in the Star-chamber, for the same matter. At which time, after great deliberation, it was resolved by all of them, 'That an offence committed in parliament, that being ended, may be punished out of parliament: and no court more apt for that purpose than this court, in which we are: for it cannot be punished in a future parliament, because that cannot take notice of matters done in a foregoing parliament.—As to what was said, 'That an inferior court cannot meddle with matters done in a superior;' true it is, that an inferior court cannot meddle with judgments of a superior court; but if particular members of a superior court offend, they are oft-times punishable in an inferior court: as if a judge shall commit a capital offence in this court, he may be arraigned thereof at Newgate. 3 Ed. 3. 19. and 1 Mar. which have been cited, over-rule this case: Therefore, &c.'

Mr. Justice Whitlocke. 'I say in this case, 1. Nihil dictum quod non dictum prius. 2. That all the Judges of England have resolved this very point. 3. That now we are but upon the brink and skirts of the cause; for it is not now in question, if these be offences or no; or if true or false; but only if this court have jurisdiction.—It hath been objected, 'That the offence is not capital, therefore it is not examinable in this court.' But though it be not capital, yet it is criminal; for it is sowing of sedition to the destruction of the commonwealth.—The question now is not between us, that are judges of this court, and the parliament, or between the king and the parliament; but between some private members of the house of commons and the king himself: for here the king himself questions them for those offences; as well he may. In every commonwealth there is one super-eminent power, which is not subject to be questioned by any other; and that is the king in this commonwealth; who, as Bracton saith, 'Solum Deum habet ultorem;' but no other within the realm hath this privilege. It is true, that which is done in parliament, by consent of all the house, shall not be questioned elsewhere; but if any private members, exeunt personas judicum, & induunt malefactorum personas, & sunt seditiosi; is there such sanctimony in the place, that they may not be questioned for it elsewhere?—The bishop of Ross, as the case hath been put, being ambassador here, practised matters against the state: and it was resolved, That although 'Legatus sit rex in alieno solo,' yet when he goes out of the bounds of his office, and consplots with traitors in this kingdom, that he shall be punished as an offender here. A minister hath a great privilege when he is in the pulpit; but yet if, in the pulpit, he utter speeches which are scandalous to the state, he is punishable. So in this case, when a Burgess of parliament becomes mutinous, he shall not have the privilege of parliament. In my opinion, the realm cannot consist without parliaments, but the behaviour of parliament-men ought to be parliamentary. No outrageous speeches were ever used against a great minister of state in parliament, which have not been punished. If a judge of this court utter scandalous speeches against the state, he may be questioned for them before commissioners of Oyer and Terminer; because this is no judicial act of the court.—But it hath been objected: That we cannot examine acts done by a higher power. To this I put this case: when a peer of the realm is arraigned of treason, we are not his judges, but the high-steward; and he shall be tried by his peers: but if error be committed in this proceeding, that shall be reversed by error in this court: For that which we do is coram ipso rege.—It hath been objected, That the parliament-law differs from the law by which we judge, in this court, in sundry cases. And for the instance which hath been made, That, by the statute, none ought to be chosen Burgess of a town in which he doth not inhabit, but that the usage of parliament is contrary: Yet if information be brought upon the said statute against such a Burgess, I think the statute is a good warrant for us to give judgment against him.—And it hath been objected, That there is no precedent in this matter. But there are sundry precedents, by which it appears, that the parliament hath transmitted matters to this court; as 2 Rich. 2. there being a question between a great peer and a bishop, it was transmitted to this court, being for matter of behaviour: and although the judges of this court are but inferior men, yet the court is higher; for it appears, by the 11 Eliz. (Dyer) That the earl Marshal of England is an officer of this court; and it is always admitted in parliament, That the privileges of parliament hold not in 3 cases, 1. In case of Treason; 2. In case of Felony; and, 3. In suit for the peace. And the last is our very case. Therefore, &c.”

Mr. Justice Croke argued to the same intent, he said, “These offences ought to be punished in this court or no where; and all manner of offences, which are against the crown, are examinable in this court. It hath been objected, That by this means, none will adventure to make his complaints in parliament. That is not so; for he may complain in a parliamentary course, but not falsely and unlawfully, as here is pretended; for that which is unlawful cannot be a parliamentary course.—It hath been objected, That the parliament is a higher court than this. And it is true: but every member of parliament is not a court; and if he commit offence, he is punishable here. Our court is a court of high jurisdiction, though it cannot take cognizance of real pleas; but if a real plea comes by error in this court, it shall never be transmitted. But this court may award a Grand Capias, and other process usual in real actions: but of all capital and criminal causes we are originally competent judges; and, by consequence, of this matter. But I am not of the opinion of Mr. Attorney General, That the word Proditors would have made this treason.”

And for the other matters, Mr. Justice Croke agreed with the other judges. Therefore by the court, the defendants were ruled to plead further; and Mr. Lenthall, of Lincoln's-Inn, was assigned of council for them. But, inasmuch as the defendants would not put in other plea, on the last day of the term judgment was given against them upon a nihil dicit; which judgment was pronounced by Mr. Justice Jones, to this effect:

“The matter of the Information now, by the confession of the defendants, is admitted to be true; and we think their plea to the jurisdiction insufficient for the matter and manner of it. And we hereby will not draw the true liberties of parliament-men into question; to wit, for such matters which they do or speak in a parliamentary manner! but, in this case, there was a conspiracy between the defendants to slander the state, and to raise sedition and discord between the king, his peers, and people; and this was not a parliamentary course. All the judges of England, except one, have resolved the statute of 4 Hen. 8. to be a private act, and to extend to Stroud only. But, though every member of the parliament shall have such privileges as are there mentioned, yet they have no privilege to speak at their pleasure. The parliament is an high court, therefore it ought not to be disorderly, but ought to give good example to other courts. If a judge of our court shall rail at the state or clergy, he is punishable for it. A member of the parliament may charge any great officer of the state with any particular offence; but this was a malevolous accusation, in the generality, against all the officers of state; therefore the matter contained within the information is a great offence, and punishable in this court. For the Punishment, although the offence be great, yet that shall be with a light hand, and shall be in this manner: 1. That every of the defendants shall be imprisoned during the king's pleasure: sir John Elliot to be imprisoned in the Tower of London, and the other defendants in other prisons. 2. That none of them shall be delivered out of prison, until he give security in this court for his good behaviour, and have made submission and acknowledgment of his offence. 3. Sir John Elliot, inasmuch as we think him the greatest offender, and the ringleader, shall pay to the king a fine of 2000*l*. and Mr. Hollis a fine of 1000 marks: and Mr. Valentine, because he is of less ability than the rest, shall pay a fine of 500*l*.” And to all this all the other justices, with one voice, accorded. Some of these gentlemen died in prison, because they would not pay the fine; others, not able to pay it, on their petitions, submission, and condition not to come nearer the court than ten miles, and giving a bond of 2000*l*. for their good behaviour, were released.

The King's Proclamation against false Rumours, &c. Soon after this parliament was dissolved, the King understanding, That several members of the house of commons had industriously spread it about, in different parts of the kingdom; “That he was for destroying the liberties of the people, by taking Tunnage and Poundage without consent of parliament; that Trade was quite ruined and gone; and Religion in danger;” set forth another Proclamation; viz.

"By the King: That, notwithstanding his majesty's late Declaration, for satisfying the minds and affections of his loving subjects, some ill-disposed persons do spread false and pernicious rumours abroad; as if the scandalous and seditious proposition, in the house of commons, tumultuously taken by some few, after that by his majesty's royal authority he had commanded their adjournment, had been the voice of the whole house, whereas the contrary is the truth. Which proposition was a thing of a most wicked and dangerous consequence to the good estate of this kingdom; and it appeareth to be so, by those impressions which this false Rumour hath made in men's minds; whereby, out of causeless fears, the Trade of this kingdom is disturbed, and merchants discouraged to continue their traffick. His maj. hath thought it expedient, not only to manifest the truth thereof, but to make known his royal pleasure, That those who raise or nourish false reports, shall be severely punished; and such as cheerfully go on with their trades, shall have all good encouragement; not purposing to overcharge his subjects by any new burdens; but to satisfy himself with those duties that were received by the king his father, of blessed memory, which his now maj. neither can nor will dispense withal. And, whereas, for several ill ends, the calling again of a parliament is divulged; howsoever his maj. hath shewed, by his frequent meeting with his people, his love to the use of parliaments; yet, this late abuse having for the present driven his maj. unwillingly out of that course; he shall account it presumption for any to prescribe any time to his maj. for parliaments; the calling, continuing, and dissolving of them being always in the king's own power. And, his maj. shall be more inclinable to meet in parliament again, when his people shall see more clearly into his intents and actions; when such as have bred this interruption shall receive their condign punishment; and those that are misled by them, and such ill reports as are raised upon this occasion, shall come to a better understanding of his maj. and themselves."

Occurrences from the Dissolution in 1628, to the Meeting of the New Parliament in 1640. Thus ended the third parliament of king Charles I. and in the same manner with the two former; the first, as has been said, being dissolved by the influence of the duke of Buckingham, and the last by the lord treasurer Weston. Whitlocke tells us, "That, soon after the dissolution of this parliament, the king took a course to gain the most eminent members, that had been against him, to become of his party, and to do him service. Accordingly sir Dudley Digges was made master of the rolls, Mr. Noy, Attorney general, and Mr. Littleton, solicitor."

We have now a long series of years to run over, without the least mention of a parliament; the king and his council being resolved to use their utmost efforts in supporting the state, without the assistance of that other great branch of English legislature. Lord Clarendon observes, 'That the unhappy assaults made upon the prerogative, had produced the untimely dissolution of the last parliament; and the king was resolved now to try if he could not give his people a taste of happiness, and let them see the equity of his government in a single state.'—To this end, by the advice of his council, the king first made a firm peace with both the crowns of France and Spain, upon better terms and conditions than could reasonably have been hoped for. Being secured in that grand point, many projects were set on foot to support the state; which, in a free country, must ever be termed illegal. Supplemental acts of state were made to supply defect of laws. Tunnage and Poundage, denied by parliament, and other duties upon Merchandizes, were collected by order of the board; and new and greater impositions laid upon Trade. Obsolete laws were revived, and rigorously executed; 'By which,' says the noble historian, 'the subject might be taught how unthrifty a thing it was, by too strict a detaining of what was his, to put the king, as strictly, to enquire what was really his own.'

For this purpose, in 1630, the antient law of Knighthood was revived; by which a great sum of money was received from men of estates liable to this fine; but though in it's foundation it was right, yet the circumstances in proceeding this way, were thought very grievous. Many other projects were set on foot, some ridiculous and some scandalous, says Clarendon, but all very grievous; the envy and reproach of which came to the king, the profit to other men. Insomuch that of 200,000*l.* drawn from the subject by these ways in one year, scarce 1500*l.* came to the king's use or account. To recompense the damage the crown had sustained by the Sale of the old Lands and the Grants of new Pensions, the old Forest Laws were revived; by which, not only great fines were imposed, but great annual rents intended, and like to be settled by way of contract. This burthen fell mostly on persons of quality and large estates, who thought themselves above ordinary oppressions; and were therefore the more likely to remember it with bitterness.

But the most notorious of all these impositions, and the most remarkable, in the histories of these times, was the affair of Ship-Money. It is said to have been first projected in 1634, by the then attorney-general Noy. It was designed, at first, as an inexhaustible spring, or magazine, that should have no bottom; and for an everlasting supply on all occasions. To this end, a writ was drawn in form of law, and directed to the sheriff of every county in England; 'To provide a Ship of War for the king's service; and to send it, amply stored and fitted up, by such a day, to such a place.' And, with the writ, were sent Instructions to each sheriff, 'That, instead of a Ship, he should levy upon his county such a sum of money, and return the same to the treasurer of the navy for his majesty's use; with direction in what manner he should proceed against such as refused.' By this way, alone, the yearly sum of 200,000*l.* was raised; but, though the receipt of it was levied regularly for 4 years, yet it was, at last, put a stop to, by one private gentleman's refusal to pay 20 or 30 shillings as his share. This occasioned a law suit, between the king and John Hampden, esq.; which was publicly and solemnly argued, in the Exchequer-Chamber, before all the Judges in England: of whom ten gave their opinions for the king's right to impose and the legality of this tax; but, as Lord Clarendon again observes, the Judgment proved of more credit and advantage to the gentleman condemned, than to the king's service. But, as all these Taxes and Impositions, as well as the persons concerned in advising of them, will be more largely treated on in the proceedings of the next parliament, we shall wave any further disquisition of them in this place.

In 1637, some disturbances took place in Scotland, in consequence of the introduction of the English Liturgy into that kingdom. The doctrine of John Knox had gained so fast a footing there, that all archbishop Laud's injunctions or admonitions could not remove it. The Scots began to be very tumultuous on this occasion; they petitioned the king and council against the Liturgy; and, at last, entered into a solemn League and Covenant to support their own reformed kirk. To quiet these perturbed spirits, the marquis of Hamilton was sent as the king's commissioner into Scotland; who had a conference and consultation with the Covenanters; and they, demanding a general assembly of the kirk and a parliament, and at the same time, doubling their guards, the marquis thought himself not safe amongst them; but retired to Dalkeith, and sent to the king for new instructions.

In 1638, the king consented to the desires of the Scots, and allowed of both a General Assembly of their Divines, and a Parliament; but yet the Covenanters were not satisfied, and the marquis had many journeys, backwards and forwards, to settle this affair. This year, on his return to Edinburgh, he summoned a council, to whom he delivered the king's letters, containing a Declaration for nulling the Service-Book, High Commission, Canons, &c. An assembly of divines met at Glasgow, against which the Scots bishops protested; but it did not sit long, being quickly dissolved, and the marquis of Hamilton again returned for England.—The earl of Argyll, about this time, joined the Covenanters; and the acquisition of so potent a lord gave them such spirits, that they began to arm in all parts, and even solicited France, an old ally to the Scots nation, to assist them. State-papers were dispersed in England, to vindicate their actions and intentions, which were suppressed by Proclamation.

In 1639, the king finding that nothing could reclaim his natural-born subjects from this enthusiastic attempt, resolved to reduce them by force; and accordingly marched with an army to the Borders, and encamped within two miles of Berwick, and in view of the Scots army. At the same time the marquis of Hamilton appeared with the English navy, at the mouth of the Firth of Edinburgh. Reduced to these straits, the Covenanters thought fit to capitulate; and the king soon granted them a pacification, on their promise to lay down their arms and prove better subjects for the future. Both the armies were disbanded, and the king returning to London, the Scots seditious papers, being disowned by the Covenanters, were publicly burnt.

The king's councils were now said to be chiefly governed by archbishop Laud and the earl of Strafford. The former had been introduced to court by the favour of the duke of Buckingham, made bishop of St. Davids, afterwards of London, and, lastly, archbishop of Canterbury. Sir Thomas Wentworth has already made a figure in these enquiries, as a private gentleman and a member of the house of commons; but will make a much greater soon, under the titles of baron Wentworth, lord-deputy of Ireland, and earl of Strafford.

The late expedition against the Scots had greatly impoverished the king's exchequer, and there being again reason to fear another insurrection in that kingdom, an army was judged necessary to be raised; but no means could be found to support it, except by the assistance of parliament.

A new Parliament called.] Accordingly, by the unanimous advice of his whole council, the king was induced to call a Parliament, and the lord keeper was directed to issue out writs for one to meet on the 18th of April, in the year 1640, and in the 16th of this reign.—According to ancient custom, proclamation was made in the lobby of the house of commons, by order of the lord steward, the earl of Arundel, That all the members should take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, before him, or they could not take their seats in the house. He also gave orders, That if there were more returned than ought to be, none should be sworn, until it should be decided by the house who were duly elected: and that no earl's eldest son should be called by the title of viscount.

The King's Speech at opening the Session.] April 13. The three estates of the realm being met in the house of lords, with the usual ceremonies and formalities, the king opened the session with a few words to this effect:

"My Lords and Gentlemen, There never was a king that had a more great and weighty caveat to call his people together than myself. I will not trouble you with the particulars; I have informed my lord keeper, and commanded him to speak and desire your attention."

The Lord Keeper's Speech.] Then the Lord Keeper, sir John Finch, spake thus:

"My lords, and you the knights, citizens,

* Speaker of the house of commons during the last parliament.

and bourgeois of the house of commons; You are here this day assembled by his majesty's gracious writ and royal command, to hold a parliament, the general, antient, and greatest council of this renowned kingdom. By you, as by a select choice and abstract, the whole kingdom is presented to his maj.'s royal view, and made happy in the beholding of his excellent and sacred person.—All of you, not only the prelates, nobles, and grandees, but in your persons that are of the house of commons, every one, even the meanest of his maj.'s subjects, are graciously allowed to participate and share in the honour of those counsels, that concern the great and weighty affairs of the king and kingdom. You come all armed with the votes and suffrages of the whole nation; and I assure myself, your hearts are filled with that zealous and humble affection to his maj.'s person and government, that so just, so pious, and so gracious a king hath reason to expect from all his subjects.—I doubt not, but you rejoice at this day's meeting; and methinks you should do so too, for good reason you have to do so; and with all humbleness of heart to acknowledge the great goodness of his maj.; who, sequestering the memory of all former discouragements in preceding assemblies, is now, through a fatherly affection to his people, and a confidence that they will not be failing in their duty to him, graciously pleased to invite you, and all his loving subjects, to a sacred unity of hearts and affections, in the service of him and of the commonwealth: and in the execution of those counsels, that tend only to the honour of his maj. and to the good preservation of you all.—His maj.'s kingly resolutions are seated in the ark of his sacred breast, and it were a presumption of too high a nature, for any Uzziah, uncalled, to touch it; yet his maj. is now pleased to lay by the shining beams of majesty as Phœbus did to Phæton, that the distance between sovereignty and subjection should not barr you of that filial freedom of access to his person and counsels: only let us beware how with the son of Clymene we aim not at the guiding of the chariot; as if that were the only testimony of fatherly affection: but let us ever remember, that though the king, sometimes, lays by the beams and rays of majesty, he never lays by majesty itself.—In former parliaments you have been advised with, for the preventing and diverting of those dangers, which by foreign and more remote counsels, might have tended to the dishonour and ruin of this nation; but herein his maj.'s great wisdom and providence hath, for many years, eased you of that trouble; his majesty having with great judgment and prudence, not only seen and prevented our danger, but kept up the honour and splendor of the English crown, of which at this day we find the happy experience; Almighty God having vouchsafed such success to his maj.'s counsels, that our Fleece is dry, when it rained blood in all the neighbour states. But what availeth this to the kingdom; Si foris hostem non inveniant, si modo

Vol. II.

domi inveniet?—You are now summoned to counsels and resolutions, that more nearly concern you; to prevent a danger and a dishonour that knocks at our gates; and that moves from such, from whom we had little reason to suspect it. It is well known upon what happy and solid counsels, one of our wisest kings made a match with Scotland for his eldest daughter. We cannot forget (I am sure we should not) the blessed success that waited upon those counsels, when the crown of England descended upon king James, of ever blessed and famous memory; who, with the feltness of joy to all true English hearts, made his entry here by blood, and not by bloodshed. The wall of separation was thereby taken away; and that glorious king to make his word good, faciam eos in gentem unam, made all England rejoice: and Scotland, I am sure, had no reason to be sorry for it; since they participated of English honours: the wealth, and revenue of this nation they shared in; and no good thing was withholden from them; such was the largeness of heart in that most excellent king; and such was the comfort we took in this fraternity, or rather unity; when now both of us had but one brazen wall of fortification to look unto, the sea, and all things so equally and evenly carried between us, that

"Tros Tyriusque mihi nullo discrimine habentur."

His maj. our most gracious sovereign became heir, as well to his father's virtues as to his kingdoms,

"Pacatumque regit patriis virtutibus orbem," and in his gracious and tender affection to that nation, hath given as many indulgent testimonies of love and benignity, as they could expect. Thus became we both like a land flowing with milk and honey; peace and plenty dwelt in our streets, and we have had all our blessings crowned with the sweet hopes of a perpetuity. God found out for my lord the king a companion meet for him, his royal consort, our most gracious queen; who, as she is not to be paralleled for her person and virtue; so hath she made his maj. and the whole kingdom most happy and blessed, in the sweetest pledges of their love and our hopes, which now stand like olive-branches about the throne or table: but what I sorrow for, civiles furores patriæ nimis infelicitas. For when his maj. had most reason to expect a grateful return of loyalty and obedience from all the Scots nation, some men of Belial, some Zeba, hath blown the trumpet there; and, by their insolences and rebellious actions, draw many after them, to the utter desertion of his maj.'s government; his maj. and his kingly father's love and bounty to that nation quite forgotten, his goodness and piety unremembered.—They have led a multitude after them into a course of disloyalty and rebellious treason; such as former times have not left in mention, nor this present age can any where equal; they have taken up arms against the Lord's Apointed, their rightful prince, and undoubted sovereign; and, following the wicked counsels of some Achitophels, they have seized on the trophies of honour, and invested themselves with regal power and authority: such and so many acts of disloyalty and disobedience, as (let their pretences be what they will) no true English or Christian heart but must acknowledge them to be the effects of fool and horrid treason.—The last summer his maj. at his own charge, and at the vast expence of many of his faithful and loving subjects of England, went with an army: then they took upon them the boldness to outface and brave his royal army, with another of their own raising: yet, for all this, his maj.'s goodness was not lessened by that; nor could his gracious nature forget what he was to them, nor what they were to him; but considering with himself they were such, 'quos nec vincere, nec vinci gloriosum fuerit,' out of his piety and clemency he chose rather to pass by their former misdoings, upon their humble protestations of future loyalty and obedience, than by just vengeance to punish their rebellion.—But his maj. who is ever awake for the good and safety of all his subjects, hath since too plainly discovered, that they did but pervert with him to divert the storm which hung over their heads; and, by gaining time to purchase to themselves more advantage, for pursuing their rebellious purposes.—For, since his maj. came from Berwick, it is come to his certain knowledge, that instead of performing that loyalty and obedience, which by the laws of God, of nature, and nations, they owe unto him; they have addressed themselves to foreign states, and treated with them to deliver themselves up to their protection and power (as by God's great providence and goodness, his gracious majesty is able to shew under the hands of the prime ring-leaders of that faction) than which nothing could be of more dangerous consequence to this and his majesty's other kingdoms. Whosoever they be that do or shall wish England ill, they may know it to be of too tough a complexion and courage, to be assailed in the face, or to be set upon at the fore-door; and therefore it is not unlikely, but they may, as in former times, find out a postern-gate.—There were heretofore two of them, Scotland and Ireland, and both of them had their several defences. Ireland, through his majesty's just and prudent government, is not only reduced from the distemper of former times, but settled in such a condition of peace; and during his majesty's happy reign, so altered and civilized, that instead of being a charge to him, as it was to his predecessors, it hath yielded to him some revenue; and his subjects there do daily give very acceptable testimonies of their loyal and dutiful affection, both to his person and government. And now lately, at the parliament assembled, they have not only, with full and free consent, made his maj. a cheerful aid towards his present preparations to reduce his disaffected subjects in Scotland to their due obedience; but they have also professed and promised, that they will be ready with their persons and estates, to the uttermost of their ability, for his majesty's future supply; as his great occasions, by the continuance of his forces against that distemper, shall require; so that the hopes of hurting England that way are quite extinct. Scotland then, only, remains; whither, as to a weak and distempered part of the body, all the rheumes and fluxes of factions and seditious humours make their way. His maj. hath taken all these and much more into his princely consideration; and to avoid so manifest and apparent a mischief, threatened to this and his other kingdoms, hath resolved, by the means of a powerful army, to reduce them to the just and modest conditions of obedience and subjection.—It is a course his maj. takes no delight in, but is forced unto it; for such is his majesty's grace and goodness to all his subjects, and such it is and will be to them, how undutiful and rebellious soever they now are; that, if they put themselves into a way of humility becoming them, his majesty's piety and clemency will soon appear to all the world: but his maj. will not endure to have his honour weighed at the common beam; nor admit any to step between him and his virtue; and therefore as he will, upon no terms, admit the mediation of any person whatsoever; so he shall judge it as high presumption in any person to offer it; and as that which he must account most dangerous to his honour, to have any conceive that the solicitation of others can, by any possibility, better incline him to his people than he is, and ever will be, out of his own grace and goodness.—The charge of such an army hath been thoroughly advised, and must needs amount to a very great sum, such as cannot be imagined to be found in his majesty's coffers; which, how empty soever, have neither yet been exhausted by unnecessary triumphs or sumptuous buildings, or other magnificences whatsoever; but most of his own revenue, and whatsoever hath come from his subjects, hath been by him employed for the common good and preservation of the kingdom, and like vapours arising out of the earth and gathered into a cloud, are fallen in sweet and refreshing showers upon the same ground. Wherefore his maj. hath now, at this time, called this parliament; the second means, under God's blessing, to avert these public calamities threatened to all his kingdoms, by the malicious behaviour of the Scots.—And, as, his majesty's predecessors have accustomed to do with your fore-fathers, so his maj. now offers you the honour of working together with himself, for the good of him and his, and for the common preservation of yourselves and your posterity.—Counsels and deliberations that tend to benefit or profit may endure disputes and debates, because they seem only accompanied with persuasions: but deliberations that tend to preservation are waited upon by necessity, and cannot endure either debate or delay; of such nature are the bleeding evils that are now to be provided against.—This summer must not be lost, nor any minute of time unbestowed, to reduce those of Scotland; lest by protraction here they gain time and advantage to frame their parties with foreign states.—His maj. doth therefore desire, upon those pressing and urgent occasions, that you will for a while lay aside all other debates; and that you would pass an act for such and so many Subsidies, as you, in your hearty affection to him and to your common good, shall think fit and convenient for so great an action; and withal that you would hasten the payment of it, as soon as may be: with a proviso in the act, that his majesty's royal assent shall not determine this session. And his maj. assures you all, that he would not have proposed any thing out of the ordinary way; but that such is the straitness of time, that unless the Subsidies be forthwith passed, it is not possible for him to put in order such things as must be prepared before so great an army can be brought into the field.—And indeed, had not his maj. upon the credit of his servants, and security out of his own estate, taken up and issued between 3 and 400,000*l.* it had not been possible for his maj. to have provided those things to begin with, which were necessary for so great an enterprize; and, without which we could not have secured Berwick and Carlisle; or avoided those affronts which the insolency of that faction might have put upon us, by injuring the persons and fortunes of his loyal subjects, in the Northern parts.—To avoid all question and dispute that may arise touching his majesty's taking of Tonnage and Poundage, his maj. hath commanded me to declare unto you, that he hath taken it only de facto; according to the example of former kings, from the death of their predecessors, until the parliament had passed an act for it themselves. That, in like manner, his maj. desires not to claim it but by grant of parliament; for this purpose his maj. hath caused a bill to be prepared in the same form as it passed to his royal father, adding only words to give it him, from the first of his majesty's reign.—This and the bill of Subsidies his maj. expects, for the pressing reasons before delivered unto you, may be dispatched with all speed; which his maj. commanded me to tell you he shall graciously accept, as the welcome pledges of your loving, happy, and dutiful affection to him, his person, and government.—And his maj. is most graciously pleased to give you his Royal Word, that afterwards he will give you time for considering of such petitions as you shall conceive to be for the good of the common-wealth; even now before you part, according as the season of the year, and the great affairs in hand will permit; and what is now omitted, his maj. will give you time to perfect towards winter, when your own leisure and conveniency may better attend it; he knowing well that these Subsidies can be of little use, without that more ample Supply which his maj. expects upon the happy conclusion of this session; and therein his maj. is graciously pleased, according to the antient way of parliaments, to stay till your just Grievances be heard and redressed.—And his maj. assures you, that he will go along with you for your advantage, through all the gracious expressions of a just, a pious, and gracious king; to the end there may be such a happy conclusion of this parliament, that it may be a cause of many more meetings with you.—I have now delivered what I had in command from his majesty."

The King produces a Letter from several Scots Lords to the French King.] After this the king further expressed himself and said;

"My Lords, You shall see he hath spoken nothing hyperbolically, nor nothing but what I shall make good one way or other. And because he did mention a Letter, by which my subjects in Scotland did seek to draw in foreign power for aid, here is the original letter, which I shall command him to read unto you. And because it may touch a neighbour of mine, whom I will say nothing of but that which is just, God forbid I should; for my part, I think it was never accepted of by him; indeed it was a Letter to the French King, but I know not that ever he had it; for by chance, I intercepted it as it was going unto him; and therefore I hope you will understand me right in that."

His maj. delivering the Letter to the lord keeper, his lordship began to read it, and observed as followeth: "The superscription of the Letter is this, Au Roy. For the nature of this superscription, it is well known to all that know the stile of France, that it is never written by any Frenchman to any but their own king; and therefore, being directed Au Roy, it is to their own king; for so in effect they do, by that superscription, acknowledge."

Then his lordship read the Letter in French, which done, he added; "His majesty commanded me to read it in English to you, as it is translated from the original in French under their own hands: viz.

"Sir; Your majesty being the refuge and sanctuary of afflicted princes and states, we have found it necessary to send this gentleman, Mr. Colvil, by him to represent unto your maj. the candor and ingenuity as well of our actions and proceedings, as of our intentions; which we desire should be engraven and written to the whole world, with a beam of the sun, as well as to your maj. We most humbly beseech you therefore, to give faith and credit to him, and all he shall say on our part concerning us, and our affairs; being most assured of an assistance equal to your accustomed clemency heretofore, and so often shewed to this nation, which will not yield to any other whatsoever, the glory to be, eternally, Your majesty's most humble, obedient and affectionate Servants, Rothes, Montrose, Lesley, Marre, Montgomery, Lawdon, Forester."

Then the King added; "Of these gentlemen that have set their hands to this Letter, here is one, and I believe you would think it very strange if I should not lay him fast; and therefore I have signed a warrant to lay him close prisoner in the Tower. My lords, I think (but that I will not say positively, because I will not say any thing here but what I am sure of) I have the gentleman, that should have carried the letter, fast enough; but I know not, I may be mistaken."

And then the Lord Keeper concluded: "Gentlemen, You of the house of commons, his majesty's pleasure is, That you do now repair to your own house, there to make choice of your Speaker; whom his maj. will expect to be presented to him on Wednesday next, at 2 in the afternoon."

John Glanville, Esq. elected Speaker.] The commons, being returned to their house, made choice of John Glanville, esq. serjeant at law, for their Speaker; of whom lord Clarendon gives this character. "That he was a man very equal to the work, very well acquainted with the proceedings in parliament, of a quick conception, and of a ready and voluble expression, dextrous in disposing the house, and very acceptable to them."

The Speaker's Speech to the King to be excused.] April 15. About 2 in the afternoon, the king came by water, and landed at Parliament-Stairs. About half an hour after, a messenger, who, by some of the privy-council, was said to be a quarter-waiter on his majesty, came and told the Speaker elect, that the king was set and staid for him. It is remarkable that the last session of parliament, Mr. Maxwell, gentleman-usher of the house of lords, omitted also to come; and it was then taken ill, being thought an undervaluing and dishonour to the house, as it appears by the Journal-Book of that session. However, upon this occasion, the Speaker commanded the waiter to tell Mr. Maxwell, That it was his duty to have come and brought the Message himself; but because they would not, by any disturbance, make the king wait, the Speaker, accompanied by the house, went up at this summons. On his coming to the bar of the house of lords the Speaker made three obeysauces, and then spoke as follows;

"May it please your majesty; The knights, citizens, and burgesses of your commons house of parliament, in conformity to most antient and most constant usage, the best guide in great solemnities; according to their well-known privileges, a sure warrant for their proceedings; and in obedience to your majesty's most gracious counsel and command, a duty well becoming loyal subjects; have met together in their house, and chosen a Speaker; one of themselves to be the mouth, indeed the servant, of all the rest; to steer, watchfully and prudently, in all their weighty consultations and debates; to collect, faithfully and readily, the genuine sense of a numerous assembly; to propound the same seasonably, and to mould it into apt questions, for final resolutions; and so represent them and their conclusions, their Declarations and Petitions, upon all urgent occasions, with truth, with right, with life, with lustre, and with full advantage, to your most excellent maj. With what judgment, what temper, what spirit, what elocution he ought to be endowed and qualified, that, with any hope of good success, should undergo any such employment, your maj. in your great wisdom, is best able to discern and judge; both as it may relate to your own peculiar and most important affairs of state and government, and as it must relate to the proper business of your house of commons; which was never small nor mean, and is like, at this time, to be exceeding weighty.—Had your house of commons been as happy in their choice (as they were regular, well-warranted, and dutiful) of myself, who stand elected yet to be their Speaker; and am now presented by them to your maj. for your gracious and royal approbation; I should not have needed to become troublesome to your maj. in this suit, for my releasement and discharge; which, now, in duty to your maj. and care for the good, prosperity, and success of your affairs, I hold myself obliged to make. My imperfections and disabilities are best known to myself; and to your maj. I suppose, not altogether unknown; before whom, in the course of my practice and profession, it hath been your goodness towards the meanest of your subjects, divers times to do me the honour and favour to appear and bear a part, as an ordinary pleader.

"It is a learned age wherein we live, under your majesty's most peaceful and flourishing government: and your house of commons, as it is now composed, is not only the representative body, but the abstracted quintessence of the whole commonalty, of this your noble realm of England: there be very many amongst them, much fitter for this place than I am; few or none, in my opinion, so unfit as myself.—I most humbly beseech your maj. (as you are the father of the commonwealth and head of the whole parliament, to whom the care of all our welfare chiefly appertains) have respect to your own ends; have regard to your house of commons; have compassion upon me, the most unworthy member of that body, ready to faint with fears, before the burthen light upon me: let not your maj. through my defect, stand exposed to any hazard of disservice: I have only a hearty desire to serve you; very little abilities for performance.—In the fulness, therefore, of your kingly power, your piety and your goodness, be graciously pleased to command your house of commons, once more to meet together, to consult and deliberate better, about their choice of a meet Speaker; till they can agree of some such person, as may be worthy of their choosing, and of your majesty's acceptance."

The Speaker's Election confirmed by the King.] The Lord-Keeper, after directions received from his majesty, answered:

"His majesty, with a gracious ear and a princely attention, hath listened to your humble and modest excuse, full of flowers of wit, of flowers of eloquence, and flowers of judgment.

Many reasons from yourself he hath taken, to approve and agree to the choice and election, made by the house of commons; but finds none, from any thing that you have said, to dissent or disagree from it; since you have set forth your inabilities with so much ability; you have so well decyphered and delineated the parts, duties, and office of a good Speaker; which is to collect the sense of the house judiciously, to render it with fidelity, to sum it up with dexterity, and to mould it into fit and apt questions for resolutions; and those, as occasion shall serve, to present with vigour, advantage, and humility, to his maj. He doubts not, but you, that are so perfect in the theorick, will, with great ease, perform the practick part, and with no less commendation.—His maj. hath taken notice, and well remembers, your often waiting on him in private causes; wherein you have always so carried yourself, and won so much good opinion from his maj. as he doubteth not but that now, when you are called forth to serve him and the public, your affections and the powers of your soul will be set on work with more zeal and more alacrity. It's that for which the philosophers call a man happy, when men, that have ability and goodness, do meet with an object fit to bring it into act; and such, at this time, is your good fortune, an occasion being ministered unto you, to shew your ability and goodness, your fidelity to his majesty's service, and the candor and clearness of your heart towards those of the house of commons: in all which his maj. nothing doubteth, but you will so discharge yourself, as he may, to his former favours, find occasion and reason to add more unto you; that the house of commons may rejoice in this election of theirs; and that the whole kingdom, by your good, clear, and candid service, may receive fruits that may be comfortable unto all. His maj. therefore, doth approve and confirm the choice of the house of commons, and ratifies you for their Speaker."

The Speaker's Reply to the King's Confirmation.] Then the Speaker addressed himself again to his majesty:

"Most Gracious Sovereign; My profession hath taught me, that from the highest judge and highest seat of justice, there lyeth no Writ of Error, no appeal. Your maj. in full parliament, hath been pleased, by the mouth of the lord-keeper, to declare your royal judgment in affirmation of the election of your house of commons, whereby I am become their Speaker, and their servant. What is there therefore left unto me? But in the first place devoutly to beseech Almighty God, the Author and Finisher of all good works, to enable me, by his blessing, to discharge, honestly and effectually, so great a task, so great a trust.—And, in the next place, humbly to acknowledge, as I do, the great grace and favour, that is done unto me by your maj.; and readily to conform myself to your good pleasure and command, to which I now submit with all possible cheerfulness; lest else my too much diffidence to undertake the service might add a further disadvantage to my performance, than peradventure would arise out of my other imperfections.—Two enemies I might fear, the common enemies of such services, Expectation and Jealousy: I am not worthy of the former, and I condemn the latter. Time that trieth truth, shall let the whole world see and know, that I am, and will be found, an equal freeman; zealous to serve my gracious king, and zealous to serve my dearest country.—Monarchy, royal and hereditary, is of all sorts of government the most compleat and excellent; whether we regard the glory, the wealth, or the safety of the governor or of the people, or of both. And I hope there are not of this nation any that are of antimonarchical spirits or resolutions, no, nor dispositions, nor friends to such as are so; if there be, I wish no greater honour to this parliament, than to discover them; and by all means possible to assist your gracious maj. to suppress them, or to confound them.—You are a great king at all times, but, sitting now attended by your prelates, your lords, and people in free parliament, are in the highest state of majesty and glory.—I remember well, I heard your majesty's most royal and learned father, our late dear sovereign king James of sacred memory, speak to that purpose of himself and of kings in general; his maj. sitting then in parliament, upon that throne which, by descent from him, and from innumerable royal ancestors, is now become your majesty's lawful seat and rightful inheritance.—To behold you thus in peace and safety, upon this great and good occasion, after full 15 years experience of your most peaceful government, yields most compleat joy to all your majesty's loyal and well-affected subjects; who cannot but concur with me in this desire,

"Seruis in cœlum redeas, diuque

"Latus intersis populo Britannno."

England is your seat of residence, not made a province, nor governed by a vice-roy. God open all our eyes and understandings, to discern and value the great blessings and benefits we enjoy, by your majesty's gracious presence and immediate influence of life and cheerfulness to all the parts of these your noblest kingdoms!—Scotland is your birth place, and therein hath advantage of your other realms; God make them, and keep them, ever sensible and worthy of that honour.—Ireland begins a-pace to imitate England, in a great and quick progression in civility of manners and conversation; by many sedulous plantations and improvements of the soil; by their receiving and enacting of the more wholesome laws and statutes of this kingdom; and by many other good effects and fruits of peace and blessed government.—France is still an attendant to your royal stile and title.—The prerogative of a king is as necessary as it is great; without it, he would want that power and majesty which is, and ought to be, inseparable from the crown and scepter. Nor can there any danger result, from such prerogative in the king, to the liberty of the subject; 'so long as both of them admit the temperment of law and justice: especially under such a king as your maj. who, to your immortal glory, among your printed laws, have published this to the whole world for your maxim, 'The Liberty of the people strengthens the king's prerogative, and the king's prerogative is to defend the people's liberty,' (p. 409). A maxim like 'Apples of gold in pictures of silver!'—Kings, as they are kings, are never said to err, only the best may be abused by misinformation. The highest point of prerogative is, 'The King can do no wrong.' If therefore, by the subtilty of misinformers, by the specious false pretences of public good, by cunning and close contrivance of their ways to seduce; the sacred royal person shall, at any time, be circumvented or surprised, or over-wrought and drawn to command things contrary to law, and that the same be done accordingly: these commands will be void, and the king innocent, even in his very person, being defended by his prerogative: nevertheless the authors of such misinformations, and actors in those abuses, will stand liable and exposed to strict examination and just censure; as having nothing to defend themselves but the colour of a void command, made void by just prerogative, and by the fundamental and true reason of state and monarchy: and what difference is there, or can be in law, between a void command, and no command at all?—If Religion, Justice, and Mercy, all happily assembled and graciously lodged together in your royal breast, may give to your well-affected subjects a good hope of the good success of this parl.; I know not why we should not, all of us, expect it with much confidence. Some few particulars, pertaining to these general heads, I humbly beg of your maj. that, without offence to your sacred ears, I may have leave to mention and observe, for the further comfort of myself and all that hear me.—What prince of this land was ever known to keep the hours and times set for prayer, and for the service of Almighty God, with that regularity and constancy as your majesty? Nay more, have you not ever since your access to the crown, had one day in every week, besides the Lord's day, dedicated, and applied to preaching and devotion? I may not stay here, there is another particular equalling, nay much exceeding both the former: and that is your majesty's great care to educate those pledges of conjugal and most abundant mutual love, that is between your majesty and your most gracious consort, the best queen and woman, and the foundation of our future hopes, the most illustrious prince Charles, and the rest of your royal progeny, in the true religion of Almighty God, publicly professed and by law established in this kingdom: what tongue is able to express the great joy and comfort, which all your majesty's most loyal and loving subjects do derive unto themselves, in contemplation of your majesty's great piety and prudence in this one act expressed, extending itself not only to the present time, but to the good of succession in all after-ages!—Touching Justice, there is not any more certain sign to discern an equal judge, than by his patience to be well informed before he give his sentence; and I may boldly say all your judges, throughout all your kingdoms, may take example by your majesty, and learn their duty from your practice in this kind. I myself have often been witness of it to my no little admiration and content. From your patient hearing, let me pass on to your righteous judgment; and therein bring but one instance, but it shall be a great one. When your lords and your people, in your last parliament, presented to your majesty a Petition, concerning divers Rights and Liberties of your subjects; the Petition being of no small weight and importance, as by the same may well appear, your maj. after meet deliberation, in few but effectual words, (soit droit fait comme il est désiré) made them such an Answer, as shall renew you for just judgment, in this age and to all posterity.—I make haste to come to your Mercy, whereof I cannot but have need again and again, before I have finished that service to which I am enjoined; and am not, altogether, in despair of obtaining it: nevertheless the Mercy, which I mean to celebrate, is not only concerning single or particular persons, but whole nations; that unexampled mercy and clemency, which (in your royal wisdom and abundant goodness, happily met together) your maj. vouchsafed to shew to us and all your kingdom; in not drawing your sword of justice, the last summer, against your people of Scotland, though your armies were much the better and the stronger.—It seems your majesty remembered, with more tenderness of heart than they do, that they were christians and your subjects, and that your power was posse & nolle nobile. Whatsoever might be the rule that inclined you to mercy, I am sure the benefit redounds to us and ours; who, by this means, are still in peace and tranquility, not without good hope of long continuance: a blessing peradventure undervalued by us, we have had so much of it, under your majesty's most gracious father's royal government.—I have yet no instructions from your house of commons, therefore can propound nothing as by warrant from them: but, if I may have leave to present to your majesty my own most humble and most hearty wishes and desires, they be directed to Religion, and Chivalry, Commerce, Justice, and Unity.—That this parliament may be famous for the care and contentment of God's true Religion in this world and that to come; and to that purpose, that the most reverend prelates, your majesty's archbishops and bishops, sitting on the right hand of your throne, will be therein most forward, to whom it is most proper.—That the lords temporal, girt with their swords in their creation, as more specially rewarded, or designed for actions military, would call to mind the most noble and most valiant of their ancestors, whose lands and honours they inherit; and how famous this land hath been at home and abroad, for deeds of arms and acts of Chivalry; and to labour to restore it, by all means, to its antient glory. The best way to preserve peace is to be ready prepared and well fitted for war. That your majesty would be pleased to command, that your grave and reverend judges, whose observations should exceed all other men's, though they be but assistants in this service, to contribute the best and utmost they can, to explain, to execute, to advance our good old laws; and to propound such things for the enacting of wholesome and plain new statutes, that every subject of this realm may be enabled to know and understand himself clearly, both what he hath to do, and what he may possess, and what not. There are no considerable mines royal in this kingdom: trade and commerce, the exportation of our wools in manufactures, and native commodities, is that which furnisheth us with gold and silver, the materials of our monies; and hath the only power to enable us to supply your majesty, for the defending of ourselves, and offending of others. That merchants and tradesmen, therefore, should have all meet encouragement, is a most special interest of this island.—But, were we never so valiant, never so wealthy, if love and unity be not amongst us, what good will our wealth do to ourselves, or to your majesty? He that commands a heart in love, he, and he only, commands, assuredly, the purse to pay, and the hands to fight. I pray God, therefore, that we may all endeavour to knit such a knot of true affection, betwixt the head and members; that all jesuited foreign states, who look perchance with envious and malignant eyes upon us, and would be glad to rejoice in our divisions, may see themselves lost and defeated of all their subtle plots and combinations, and of all their wicked hopes and expectations to render us, if their endeavours might prevail, a people inconsiderable at home, and contemptible abroad.—Religion teacheth us, 'Si Deus nobiscum, quis contra nos?' And experience, I hope, will teach us, 'Si simus inseparabiles armis insuperabiles.' It was wont to be, and I hope it ever will be, the tenet and position of your house of commons, That the god of the king and of the people cannot be severed: and cursed be every one that shall go about to divide them.—I fear I have ventured too far on your royal patience, though yet I confess I never knew it wearied; nevertheless I will here conclude. Only first beseech your gracious majesty, in the name and right of the whole house of commons, that, in your justice, you would be pleased to grant and confirm to them, for their better encouragement to proceed in their great business, these their antient and just liberties, which, time out of mind, they have rightfully enjoyed."

The Speaker then made the usual requests for privilege, &c. which being all granted and confirmed, the commons returned to their house; and, after reading one bill, according to custom, adjourned till the next morning, 8 of the clock. The old parliament-hour was to meet at 8 and sit till 12; that the committees, on whom the greatest business depended, might have the afternoons for their preparation and dispatch.

April 16. Secretary Windebank acquainted the commons with the particulars of the Scots Letter to the French king, mentioned two days before; and the Speaker declared, That he had the King's commands to make a report to the house of what was delivered by himself and the lord keeper, at the opening.—A motion was made for a conference with the lords about appointing a Fast, which was agreed to.

April 17. The commons began with regulating elections, &c. after which the Speaker made a report of the speeches delivered by the king and the lord keeper, which was ordered to be entered in their Journals; but with this proviso, That it was done by his majesty's special command; and that this should be no precedent to following Speakers, but upon the like special command or desire of the house.—In this recapitulation of the foregoing speeches, the affronts and indignities offered by the king's Scots subjects, as also their palpable practising of treason with the French king, were mentioned; but no notice was taken of them by the house. Instead of that they fell, again, upon Grievances: and the following Plan was proposed as a rule to go by: 1. Against the Liberty of Parliament; 2. Against the Preservation of Religion; 3. Against the Conservation of the common Liberties of the Kingdom: these Grievances being accounted more hurtful to the king, both in point of honour, profit and safety, than to any other member whatsoever, in respect of the great interest he has in the kingdom.

Debate on Petitions from several Counties relating to Grievances. Petitions from the counties of Northampton, Middlesex and Sussex, were delivered to the house by the respective knights of those several shires, complaining of different Grievances, which were postponed to be debated on, by a committee of the whole house, the next morning.

April 18. Two more Petitions were delivered from the counties of Essex and Hertford, in the same manner as the former. This last complained expressly against Ship-Money, Projects, Monopolies, the Star-Chamber, High-Commission-Court, and other Grievances to the people, both in church and state. Other Petitions, to the like purpose, being received and read,

Mr. Harbottle Grimston stood up, and spoke to the effect following: 'Mr. Speaker, We are called by his maj. to consult together of the great and weighty affairs of the state and kingdom. There hath now a great and weighty business been presented to this house; and a Letter hath been read, importing, according to the interpretation which hath been collected out of it, a defection of the king's ar-

tural subjects. This is a great cause, and very worthy of the consideration and advisement of this great council: but, I am very much mistaken, if there be not a case here at home of as great danger as that which is already put. The one stands without at the back-door, for so dangers from thence in all our histories have ever been termed; but the case we will put, is a case already upon our backs. And in these great cases of danger, which so much concern the welfare of the body politick, we ought to do like skilful physicians, that are not led in their judgments so much by outward expressions of a disease, as by the inward symptoms and causes of it; for it fares with a body politick, as it doth with a natural body. It is impossible to cure an ulcerous body, unless you first cleanse the veins, and purge the body from the obstructions and pestilent humours that surcharge nature; and, that being once done, the blotches, blanes, and scabs, which grow upon the superficies and outside of the body, will dry up, shed, and fall away of themselves. The danger that hath now been presented to the house, it standeth at a distance; and we heartily wish it was further off: yet, as it stands at a distance, it is so much the less dangerous. But the case I shall put, is a case of greater danger here at home; and is so much the more dangerous, because it is home-bred, and runs in the veins. If the one shall appear to be as great a danger as the other, we hope it will not be thought unseasonable at this time, to put the one as well as the other.

—Mr. Speaker, The case is this, the charter of our liberties, called Magna Charta, was granted unto us by king John; which was but a renovation and restitution of the antient laws of this kingdom. This charter was afterwards, in the succession of several ages, confirmed unto us above 30 several times; and in the 3rd year of his majesty's reign that now is, we had more than a confirmation of it; for we had an act declaratory passed: and then, to put it out of all question and dispute for the future, his maj. by his gracious Answer, 'Soit Droit fait comme il est désiré,' invested it with the title of Petition of Right. What expositions contrary to that law of right, have some men given to the undermining the liberty of the subject, with new-invented subtle distinctions; and assuming to themselves a power, I know not where they had it, out of parliament, to supercede, annihilate, and make void the laws of the kingdom? The common-wealth hath been miserably torn and massacred, all property and liberty shaken, the church distracted, the gospel and professors of it persecuted, and the whole nation over-run with swarms of projecting canker-worms and caterpillars, the worst of all the Egyptian plagues: then, as the case now stands with us, I conceive there are two points very considerable in it. The first is, What hath been done any way to impeach the liberties of the subject, contrary to the Petition of Right? The second is, Who have been the authors and causes of it?—The serious examination and discussion of these two questions do highly concern his maj. in point of honour, and his subjects in point of interest: and all that I shall say to it, are but the words that Ezra used to king Artaxerxes of the settlement of that state, which at that time was as much out of frame and order, as ours at this present; that which cured theirs, I hope will cure ours: his words are these, 'Whosoever hath not done the laws of God and the king, let judgment be speedily executed upon him, whether it be unto banishment, or to confiscation of goods, or to imprisonment.' It may be, some do think this a strange text, and it is possible some may think it as strange a case: as for the text, every man may read it that will; and, for the case, I am afraid there are but few here, that do not, experimentally, know it as bad as I have put it; and how to mend a bad case, I take it, is part of the business we now meet about.—His maj. yesterday did graciously confirm unto us, our great and antient liberties of freedom of speech; and having his kingly word for it, I shall rest as confidently upon it, as the greatest security under Heaven, whilst I have the honour to have a place here; and I shall, with all humility, be bold to express myself like a freeman.

—The diseases and distempers, that now are in our bodies politic, are grown to that height, that they pray for and importune a cure. And his maj. out of his tender care and affection to his people, like a nursing father, hath now freely offered himself to hear our Grievances and complaints. We cannot complain we want good laws: for the wit of man cannot invent better than are already made: there want only some examples, that such as have been the authors and causes of all our miseries and distractions in church and commonwealth, contrary to these good laws, might be trampled to expel the poison of mischief out of others. But my part is only ostendere partem; therefore, having put the case, I must leave it to the judgment of this house, Whether our dangers here at home, be not as great and considerable, as that which was even now presented.

Sir Benj. Rudyard. 'There is a great door opened unto us of doing good, if we take the advantage thereof: we are here met, by the blessing of God and our king. Parliaments have of late days become unfortunate; it is our duty, by our good temper and carriage, to restore them to their antient lustre. There be some here present who can remember the breaking up of the last parliament; a business certainly from which the Papists at that time were not exempt; who now, by the discontinuance of parliaments, are come to that arrogance and boldness, that they contend with us, who are the better subjects. Their envy I like, but their presumption is not to be borne. I wish them no harm, but good; for I desire their conviction: and the way to do that, is to set up better lights who have warmth in them, and are not luke-warm in religion. Surely they that quarrel betwixt preaching and prayer, and would have them contend, never meant well to either: but both must have their due. And yet I know not how it comes to pass, but it happeneth to us, which is in no other religion in the world, that a man may be too religious; and many a one, by that scandal, is frightened into a deep dissimulation. It is wisdom in us, to preserve temper and moderation; for breaking of parliaments makes dangerous wounds in the body politic; and if the splinters be not pulled out with a gentle hand, we may hereafter despair of cure. In 14 Edw. 3. Subsidies were given to the king for his expedition into France; but by the ill management of his treasure hert, he was so low, that he was glad to make truce with the French king. In 15 Edw. 3. he returns, and summoned a parliament, wherein there was nothing but jealousies and distempers. In 17 Edw. 3. he called another parliament; to procure an atonement with his subjects, which took good success by their humble carriage to him, and his willingness to ratify their liberty; whereby all breaches were then made up.—A parliament is the bed of reconciliation between king and people; and therefore it is fit for us to lay aside all exasperations, and carry ourselves with humility: howbeit the king's prerogative may go far, yet if it be swayed with equanimity, it may be the better borne. Princes are, and will be, as jealous of their power, as the people of their liberties; though both are then best, when kept within their several bounds. Levying of monies is a great disturbance to the subject; and so will be the scarcity of the king's revenues, until they be supplied. And where the power of the king and necessity meet in one hand, he will not long be disappointed. But, before the ending of this parliament, (the untimely breaking whereof would be the breaking of us) I doubt not but his majesty's revenues may be so settled, that he may live plentifully at home and abroad; and without taking any thing from his maj. save that, which, of itself, would fall away.—In former parliaments, the carriage of some hath been so haughty, as though parliaments would last always; and the carriage of others, as if there would be never any again. And therefore a moderation, if we love ourselves, is requisite. The delays of remedies are well known, how dangerous they are to the commonwealth and religion; seeing that, during this vacation of parliaments, so many disorders have been committed, by innovations in religion, violation of laws, and intrusions upon our liberties. To set all these aright, is now our task: and, if in these tempting provocations, we bear a temperate moderation, we shall not miss of our end; but shall vindicate God in his religion, the king in his honour, and the commonwealth in its gasping extremities. If temper and moderation be not respected by us, beware of having the race of parliaments rooted out.—Men and brethren, What shall we do? If it were for my life, I would desire nothing more, than that we proceed with moderation; that so we may have many happy parliaments, and that no dismal event may happen to any: for when parliaments are gone we are lost.

Mr. Pym, whom lord Clarendon calls a man of good reputation, but much better known afterwards; and as long acquainted with those assemblies as any man then living, spoke last in this debate. His speech of two hours length is thus abridged by Mr. Rushworth:—He that takes away weights from the motions, doth as good service, as he that adds wings unto them. These weights are old Grievances. He therefore will do a good work for the king, who, to expedite his designs, will set good rules and patterns for effecting thereof. When God made the world, he did it by a pattern which himself had conceived: and Moses did according to the pattern he saw in the mount. I shall, therefore, offer you a model of the Grievances which afflict the commonwealth; which have disabled us to administer any Supply, until they be redressed, and will still disable us; which Grievances may be reduced to 3 heads. 1. Those Grievances, which, during these 11 years interval of parliaments, are against the Liberties and Privileges of Parliament. 2. Innovations in matters of Religion. 3. Grievances against the Property of our Goods. Which Grievances I will first propound: secondly, shew that the permission of them is as prejudicial to his maj. as to the commonwealth: and thirdly, I will shew what way they may be remedied. In all these, I shall take care to maintain the great prerogative of the king; which is, 'That the king can do no wrong.'—And first, I will begin with the Grievances against the Privileges and Liberties of Parliament. We all know, that the intellectual part, which should govern all the rest, ought to be kept from distemper; for it is that which purgeth us from all errors, and prevents other mischiefs for time to come. If the understanding part be hurt the mind cannot perform her function. A parliament is that to the commonwealth, which the soul is to the body; which is only able to apprehend and understand the symptoms of all such diseases, which threaten the body politic. It behoves us, therefore, to keep the faculty of that soul from distempers.—I shall briefly give you a view of such occurrences, as have altered the happy and healthful constitution of it: and, in the first place, I must remember the breaches of our Liberties and Privileges of parliament, which are:—1. In that the Speaker, the last parliament, the last day of it, being required to put the question, the house was commanded they should not speak. These are conceived to be the grounds of whatsoever befel those gentlemen, which so lately suffered. It is true, the house was commanded to adjourn presently; yet whilst the house sate, God forbid we should be barred from offering the last sighs and groans to his majesty. 2. In that the parliament was then dissolved, before our Grievances had redress: or before we could make our wills known, which is the privilege of dying men; and to be heard before condemnation, is not denied to private persons. 3. That the Judges presumed to question the proceedings of this house; it is against nature and order, that inferior courts should undertake to regulate superior. The court of parliament is a court of the highest jurisdiction, and cannot be censured by any other law or sentence, but by its own. 4. The several imprisonments of divers gentlemen, for speaking freely in parliament. 5. That inferior courts should be informed to punish acts done in this court; whereby divers members of the house were so kept in prison, till they had put in security for their good behaviour; and some of them died in prison, others not released until writs came for this parliament. Lastly, which I conceive to be the greatest, That the parliament was punished, without being suffered to make its own defence. I call the dissolution of the parliament a punishment, and justly; the breaking of a parliament is death to a good subject.—But it is to be observed, that in this and the other grievances, though the king be no party, for his highness's prerogative is 'to do no Wrong,' yet most of these distempers of state arise and do invade the subjects, by means of misinforming him: as the celestial bodies of themselves send forth nothing but wholesomeness to man; but by the ill distemper in inferior bodies, much hurt ariseth from them.—The next sort of Grievances I deliver, are those that concern matters of Religion. Wherein I will first observe, the great encouragement which is given to them of the popish religion, by an universal suspension of all laws that are against them; and some of them admitted into public places of trust and power.—I desire not to have any new laws made against them, God be thanked, we have enough; nor a strict execution of the old ones, but only so far forth, as tends to the safety of his maj.; and such a practice of them, that that religion, which can brook no cor-rival, may not be the destruction of ours, by being too concurrent with it. There is an intention of a nuncio from the pope, who is to be here, to give secret intelligence to Rome, how we incline here, and what will be thought fit to win us thither.—I observe as a great Grievance, there are divers innovations in Religion amongst ourselves, to make us more capable of a translation; to which purpose popish books have been published in print; disputations of popish points are and have been used in the universities and elsewhere with privilege; preached in the pulpit, and maintained for sound doctrine; whereby popish tenets are maintained.—The introducing of popish ceremonies, as altars, bowing towards the east, pictures, crosses, crucifixes, and the like; which, of themselves considered, are so many dry bones, but being put together, make the man. We are not now contented with the old ceremonies, I mean such as the constitution of the reformed Religion hath continued unto us; but we must introduce again many of those superstitious and infirm ceremonies, which accompanied the most decrepid age of popery, bowing to the altar, and the like.—I shall observe the daily discouraging of all godly men, who truly profess the protestant religion, as though men could be too religious. Some things are urged by ecclesiastical men, without any ground by any canon or article established; nay without any command from the king, either under his great seal, or by proclamation. The parliament, ever since queen Elizabeth's time, desired the bishops to deal moderately; but how they have answered those desires we all know, and these good men for the most part feel.—I may not forget, that many of the ministers are deprived, for refusing to read the book for sports and recreations upon the Sabbath, which was a device of their own heads; which book, I may affirm, hath many things faulty in it.—Then the encroaching upon the king's authority by ecclesiastical courts, as namely the high commission, which takes upon it to fine and imprison men; enforcing them to take the oath ex officio, with many of the like usurpations, which are punishments belonging only to temporal jurisdiction: and it hath been resolved, in the time of king James, that the statute of 1 Eliz. c. 1. gives them no such power; moreover, the power which they claim, they derive not from the king, nor from any law or statute; but they will immediately have it from heaven, Jure Divino. Divers particular ordinaries, chancellors, and archdeacons, take upon them to make and ordain constitutions within their particular limits. All these things are true, to the knowledge of most that hear me.—I now come to the general head of Grievances, which is the grievances belonging to our Goods, and are in civil matters: the heads thereof are too many. The taking of Tonnage and Poundage, and divers others Impositions, without any grant or law to do so, is a great grievance. There are divers ancient customs due to the king, but these are certain what they are, and are due by prescription: these customs being too narrow for his service, and the affections of the people growing stronger and stronger to their prince, Tonnage and Poundage were granted for years to the king; and afterwards, by this house, granted for lives; but never were taken by the king's own act, without a parliament; for doing which, there is no precedent, unless in a year or two in the latter end of queen Eliz.—In the next place of these grievances, I rank Knighthood, the original whereof was, that persons fit for chivalry might be advanced; but this, after, was stretched for another end, for money; and extended not only to terre-tenants, but to lessees and merchants, who were first to appear, and then to plead for themselves at the council-board; but were delayed from day to day, to their great charge and inconvenience; and, notwithstanding the just defence they have made for themselves, there have been infinite distresses laid upon them until the fines were paid; which were imposed, not by courts, but by commissioners assigned for that purpose; and this being a continuing offence, they are by the same rule, as liable now to fines, as ever.—Monopolies, and inundations of them, whereby a burthen is laid not only upon foreign, but upon native commodities; as soap, salt, drink, &c. the particulars whereof are fit for the committee of grievances.—Ship-Money: and although there be a judgment given for it, yet I dare be bold to say it is against all former precedents and laws, and not one judgment that ever maintained it. This is a grievance that all are grieved at, having no limits either for time or proportion: if therefore any shall endeavour to defend this, he must know, that both his reputation and conscience lye at stake in the defence.—The enlarging the Bounds of the Forest. Though our ancestors were heretofore questioned for the same thing, yet upon the satisfaction of all the objections that were, or could be made, they then saved themselves; yet now the same things are turned upon us.—The Sale of public Nuisances, for so they are pretended to be. Many great nuisances have been complained of: but when there hath been money given, and compositions made, then they are no more nuisances; such as buildings and depopulations.—Military Charges and Impositions upon Counties, by letters only from the council table; whereby soldiers conduct-money and coats are to be provided at the country's charge; and horses also provided without ground of law; many things in this kind being done by deputy-lieutenants of their own accord.—Extrajudicial Judgments and Opinions of the Judges, without any cause before them; whereby they have anticipated the judgment which is legal and public; and circumvented one of the parties of their remedies, in that no writ of error lies, but only upon the judicial proceedings.—The next sort of Grievances is, that the great courts do countenance these oppressions; as I may instance in the court of Star-Chamber advancing and countenancing of monopolies, which should be instead of this great council of the kingdom; and the Star-Chamber now is become a court of revenue; informations there being put in against sheriffs, for not making returns of money upon the writs of Ship-Money: it was not usual for meum & tuum to be disputed there.—The privy-counsellors should be lights of the realm: sure in them is the greatest trust, and they, by Magna Charta, are to do justice, as was urged by one in this house the last parliament: but now, if these counsellors should so far descend below themselves, as to countenance, say to plot, projects and monopolies, what shall we think of this? surely it is much beneath their dignity: this is a great grievance, but I must go higher. I know the king hath a transcendent power in many cases, whereby, he may, by proclamation, guard against sudden accidents: but that this power should be applied to countenance Monopolies (the projectors being not content with their private grants without a proclamation) is without precedent. But yet I must go higher than this: It hath been in the pulpit applied, and also published in books and disputations, asserting a power unlimited in the king, that he may do what he pleaseth. This Grievance was complained of in the last parliament, in the case of Dr. Manwaring, who, for maintaining that opinion in a sermon, 'That a subject had no property in his goods, but that all was at the king's pleasure,' made his submission upon his knees in this place; and was then brought so low, that I thought he would not have leaped so soon into a bishoprick (See p. 430).—I have, by this time, wearied you as well as myself; but I am come to the last Grievance, which is the fountain of all these, and that is the Intermission of Parliaments; whereas by two statutes, not repealed nor expired, a parliament ought to be held once in a year. These Grievances are as prejudicial to his maj. as to the commonwealth. The breach of parliaments is much prejudicial; for by this means the great union and love, which should be kept and communicated betwixt the king and his subjects, is interrupted: they cannot make known their Petitions, nor the king his wants, to have Supplies. Where the intercourse of the spirits, betwixt the head and the members is hindered, the body prospers not. If parliaments had been more frequent, the king would have had more Supplies. By our Grievances in Religion, the king's party abroad is much weakened; and that great part of his aids abroad do forsake us, is for that they think we are forsaking our religion. Many of the king's subjects, for that they cannot be quiet in things indifferent, and know not where they shall have an end of them, have departed this land with their goods, estates, and posterities. The preferment of men ill-deserving, and neglecting others of great integrity and merit, hath much weakened and discouraged us. There are but a few now that apply themselves either to do well or to deserve well; finding flattery and compliance to be the easier way to attain their ends and expectations. The not observing of laws, but countenancing of monopolies and such like, breed jealousies in the minds of many; and may prepare a way for distempers, though, thanks be to God, as yet there hath been none; our religion having preserved us. But if any thing but well should happen, one summer's distempers would breed great change, and more than all unlawful courses could recompence. We know how unfortunate Henry 3. and other princes have been, by the occasion of such breaking of their laws. I pray God that we never see such times. We are not content to multiply Impositions upon merchants Goods, which are exported and imported into the kingdom: but now there is a growing mischief in plotting for an imposition upon such goods as never see England, but are conveyed from France to Spain, or the like, by English merchants. A course before this time never heard of; and such illegal things are badly accounted for to the king; whereas legal things will soon be discovered, if not accounted for. Besides, in monopolies and such like, the third part comes not to his majesty's coffers, as to instance in that of Wines. The king hath only 30,000*l.* per ann. upon them, whereas the Wines, in the gains by the putent, come to 80,000*l.* at the first, from the time of their arrival; and, being drawn, come to 230,000*l.* per ann. and the same proportion holds in all other monopolies: hereby it appears, how much the subject is damnified, and how little the king gains.—I come now to the last thing, the Remedy of these Grievances; which is thus: I advise to present them to the lords, that they may join with us to go to the king, and pray that these Grievances, being clear in fact, may be voted. If any thing, in the vote, be stuck upon, that it may be debated; and drawn according to the course of the house, into a Remonstrance; with an humble Petition of both houses for redress. And I hope the wisdom of this house will prepare such a remedy, as will make the king a great king, and the people happy."

After these Speeches the house came to a Resolution, and it was ordered, 'That the Records and Proceedings in the Star-Chamber and King's Bench, that concerned several members of this house in the last parliament, should be sent for immediately, viz. sir John Elliot, Mr. Strode, Mr. Selden, Mr. Valentine, Mr. Hollis, sir P. Hayman, and others that were questioned, after the last parliament, for any passages done in that parliament.—Ordered also, 'That a select committee be appointed to meet for the stating of the matter of fact, touching the violation of the privilege of parliament, the last day of the last parliament; and to report their opinion of it to the house.' Ordered also, 'That the records, inrolments, judgments, and proceedings in the exchequer, and all other courts whatsoever, concerning Ship-Money, should be sent for: and warrants, signed by the Speaker, directed to the officers of the several courts, for all these matters, were issued out accordingly.'

Mr. Secretary Windebank, from the committee on the Fast, delivered in a paper, agreed on by them, for a conference with the lords about it; which was read, importing, 'That the knights, citizens and burgesses of the house of commons, taking into consideration the great and weighty affairs now in agitation, in both houses of parliament, concerning the welfare of the king and the whole kingdom; and believing the principal way and means to attain to a happy and prosperous conclusion of the same, is, to beg the divine assistance and direction of Almighty God in all their consultations, by one solemn humiliation by Fasting and Prayer to his heavenly Majesty; they have commanded us to acquaint your lordships, that you will be pleased to join with them, to move his maj. for his gracious allowance of so pious a work to both the houses of parliament; and also that he would be pleased to grant and appoint a day for a Fast throughout the whole kingdom.'—The lords agreed to this proposal; and Saturday, the 2d of May, was appointed for this solemnity; but matters growing critical between the king and parliament, about that time, the Fast was put off to another day; which never came in this parliament.

The Behaviour of the late Speaker censured. [April 20. Mr. Treasurer, (sir H. Vane,) reported from the committee for stating the fact of the violation of the Privilege of this house, the last day of the last parliament; That he was helped by two members notes, taken at that time, in this manner:—"That the Speaker being pressed, he answered, 'He was the servant of the house, but let not the reward of my service be my ruin.' The reason why he left the chair was, not to disobey the house, but obey his majesty. 'I will not say, I will not put the question, but I say, I dare not.' That the Speaker, as soon as he was set in his chair, delivered the king's pleasure, 'That the house should be adjourned for a sevennight: That he was commanded to leave the chair, and to put no question; but to wait upon his maj. presently.' And, being pressed again to put the question, he answered, 'He was commanded to put no question.' That the command itself being searched into, it appeared to be the king's by the Declaration published in the year 1628."—On this report a motion was made, 'That a select committee be appointed to prepare a Representation to his maj. of the violation of the liberties of this house, that happened the last day of the last parliament; humbly beseeching his maj. that the like violation may not, hereafter, be brought in practice to his prejudice or theirs.' After a long and various debate, it was resolved, 'That it is the opinion of this house, that the Speaker's refusing to put the question, after a verbal command from his maj. signified to this house by the Speaker, to adjourn, and no adjournment made by this house, is a breach of the privilege of this house.'

The Lord Keeper's Speech to hasten a Supply. [April 20. Sir H. Vane delivered a Message from the king to the house, 'That it is his pleasure they should attend him, at 2 in the afternoon, in the Banqueting-house, Whitehall.' Accordingly the Speaker, attended by the whole house, went up in the afternoon, to Whitehall; where, meeting with the lords, the king being present, the lord keeper addressed himself to both houses as follows:

"My lords and gentlemen; You may well remember, upon the beginning of this parliament, his maj. commanded me to deliver unto you the causes of calling of it; which was, for the assistance and Supply of his majesty in so great, weighty, and important affairs, as ever king of England had to require at his subjects hands. I am now to put you in mind what I then said unto you, and withal to let you know, that such and so great are his majesty's occasions at this time, that if the Supply be not speedy, it will be of no use at all: for the army is now marching, and doth stand his maj. at least in 100,000*l.* a month; and if there be not means used to go on with this as is fitting, his majesty's design will be lost, and the charge all cast away. It is not a great and ample Supply for the perfecting of the work, that his majesty doth now expect; but it is only such a Supply, as with out which the charge will be lost, and the design frustrated; being built upon those weighty reasons, which tend to the infinite good of the kingdom, and preservation of you all.—This done, his majesty will give you scope and liberty to present your just Grievances unto him; and he will hear them with a gracious ear, and give them such an Answer, as you and all the kingdom shall have reason to joy therein.—His majesty taketh notice of one particular, and that is concerning Ship-Money; wherein his maj. hath commanded me to declare thus much unto you: first, his majesty never had it in his royal heart, to make an annual revenue of it, nor ever had a thought to make the least benefit or profit of it: but whatsoever he did or intended in it, was for the common good of you all; for the honour, glory and splendor of this nation; and that every one of us are made sharers and partakers in the benefits, fruits and successes of it, of which otherwise you would have felt the woes. He hath been so far from making the least benefit of it, that he hath expended great sums of money, out of his own coffers, to work with, to those necessary ends I have named unto you.—The Accompts of such Monies so received, have been brought to the council-table; the monies delivered to sir Wm. Russel, the treasurer of the navy; and, by them all, it may appear whether there hath been a fulness and clearness of truth in the disbursements thereof, for the good and safety of the kingdom.—It is true, his maj. had once intended, this year, not to have taken that course, but to have raised an army; which his maj. so just a king, for the preservation of the kingdom, hath now taken into consideration: and I must tell you, that his maj. prizeth nothing more than his honour; and he will not lose, for any earthly thing, his honour in the least: ye cannot make those expressions of love, duty and affection to him, which the graciousness of his nature will not exceed in.—Of all his kingdoms, this ought to be the nearest and dearest unto him; yet for his kingdom of Ireland, the last parliament before this, the very second day of the parliament, they gave him six Subsidies; they relied upon his gracious words: the success was, that before the end of the parliament, they had all they did desire granted, and had it with an advantage. This last parliament there, it is well known unto you all, what a cheerful Supply they have given unto his maj., for their hearts went with it; and let it not be apprehended, that subsidies there are of small value; there is not a subsidy that is granted, but it is worth 60 or 60,000*l.* at the least: consider that kingdom, how small proportion it holdeth with this of England; and you will find, that it is as considerable a gift, as hath been given in many years. It hath wrought this effect, That certainly his maj. will make it apparent to all the world, what a good construction, and how graciously, he doth esteem and interpret this act of theirs.—I have directed hitherto my speech to you that are of the house of commons; now I shall address myself to your lordships. It is true, the proper and natural Supply proceeds from the house of commons; yet, in aid at this time, his maj. hath called you hither; and hopeth that he shall not find the house of commons backward to his desires, nor your lordships unwilling to concur with them.—To you of the house of commons, I did forget one thing, of an objection that might perhaps be made, That Tonnage and Poundage is given towards the maintenance of a fleet at sea; let me tell you, that Tonnage and Poundage was never intended but for ordinary preservation of the sea; not that it should be to defend the dominion of the narrow seas, when the navies of all the princes of christendom are so increased as they are. It is fit for his maj. (as things now stand) to have such a strength at sea, as may be a terror to others abroad.—His maj. was once resolved that no shipping writs should have issued out this year; but he was enforced, for your good, for the good of the kingdom, and for his own honour, upon necessary and weighty reasons, to send forth the writs; and those reasons were these: It was of necessity for his maj. to prepare an army, to reduce his disaffected subjects of Scotland to their due obedience. This very year, all the neighbouring princes are preparing with great fleets of ships; so as it is time for his maj. to put himself into a strength, that he may be able to preserve the dominion of the narrow seas; without which this kingdom will be lost, and he not able to maintain his right of being the moderator of the sea, whereby there may be freedom and commerce of trade, which adds exceedingly to the flourishing of this kingdom. Another reason for shipping-writs this year is, That those of Algiers are grown to that insolency, that they are provided of a fleet of 60 sail of ships, and have taken divers English ships, particularly one, called the Rebecca of London (well known to the merchants upon the Exchange) taken upon the coasts of Spain, worth at the least 260,000*l.* and therefore, the writs having gone out upon those weighty reasons, before it was possible the parliament could give any Supply to provide for those things, his maj. cannot this year forbear it; but he doth expect your concurrence in the levying of it for the future. I shall speak that unto you by his majesty's command, which may comfort any English heart: his maj. hath no thoughts of enriching himself by the monies coming in upon these writs; he doth desire but to live as it becometh a king of England, able to defend you and this nation in honour and in lustre, which is famous abroad, and glorious at home; and to live but like such a king, as every true English heart desireth their king should be.—Be masters of your own way; settle it so secure, that it may never come to the least benefit and advantage to himself; but for the common good, and those necessary ends wherein you shall all share in; your plenty, peace, honour, and whatsoever any Englishman can glory in.—His maj. commands me to tell you, you shall propound nothing wherein you may receive all security for the property of your goods, nor nothing for securing your own liberties, wherein he will not most readily listen unto you; and be as willing to grant, as you to ask. His maj. doth now offer unto you the Reasons, occasions, and the way to make this the most blessed and most happy parliament that ever was; and that it may produce such effects, that the king may delight in his people, and the people in their king. And he layeth before you not only the counsel to do so, but he will tell you the way; and that is, by putting an obligation of trust and confidence upon him, which shall more secure you, than all that you can invent; or fears, or jealousies, can imagine to be provided for. It is a course that good manners, duty and reason, should require of you to take into consideration."

Debate on the Lord Keeper's Speech.] April 22. The consideration of the lord keeper's last Speech was ordered to be referred to the next day: at which time, as Rushworth informs us, Mr. Edmund Waller rose, and spoke to this effect: 'I will use no preface, as they do who prepare men for something in which they have a particular interest. I will only propose what I conceive fit for the house to consider; and shall be no more concerned in the event than they that shall hear me. Two things I observe in his majesty's demands: 1. The Supply. 2. Your speedy dispatch thereof. Touching the 1st, his majesty's occasions for money are but too evident; for, to say nothing how we are neglected abroad, and distracted at home, the calling of this parliament, and our sitting here, (an effect, which no light cause in these times hath produced) is enough to make any reasonable man believe, that the exchequer abounds not so much with money, as the state doth in occasions to use it: and I hope we shall appear willing to disprove those, who have thought to dissuade his maj. from this way of parliaments, as uncertain; and to let him see that it is as ready, and more safe for the advancement of his affairs, than any new or pretended old way whatsoever.—For the speedy Dispatch required, which was the second thing, not only his majesty, but reipsa loquitur: the occasion seems to importune no less; necessity is come upon us like an armed man.—The use of parliaments heretofore, as appears by the writs that call us hither, was to advise with his maj. of things concerning the church and common-wealth. And it hath ever been the custom of parliaments, by good and wholesome laws, to refresh the common-wealth in general; yea, and to descend into the remedies of particular Grievances, before any mention made of a Supply. Look back upon the best parliaments, and still you shall find, that the last acts are for the free gifts of Subsidies on the people's part, and general pardons on the king's part: even the wisest kings have first acquainted their parliaments with their designs and the reasons thereof; and then demanded the assistance both of their counsel and purses. But physicians, though they be called of the latest, must not stomach it, or talk what might have been; but apply themselves roundly to the cure: let us not stand too nicely upon circumstances, nor too rigidly postpone the matter of Supply to the healing of our lighter wounds: let us do what possibly may be done, with reason and honesty on our part, to comply with his majesty's desires, and to prevent the imminent evils that threaten us. Consider that they who think themselves already undone, can never apprehend themselves in danger; and they that have nothing left can never give freely; nor shall we ever discharge the trust of those that sent us hither, or make them believe that they contribute to their own defence and safety, unless his maj. be pleased first to restore them to the Property of their Goods and lawful Liberties, whereof they esteem themselves now out of possession. One need not tell you that Property of Goods is the mother of courage, and the nurse of industry; it makes us valiant in war, and industrious in peace. The experience I have of former parliaments, and my present observation of the care the country has had to chuse persons of worth and courage, make me think this house like the Spartans; whose forward valour required some softer musick to allay and quiet their spirits, too much moved with the sound of martial instruments. 'Tis not the fear of imprisonment, or, if need be, of death itself, can keep a true-hearted Englishman from the care to leave this part of his inheritance, as entire to his posterity, as he received it from his ancestors.—This therefore let us first do, and that speedily, that we may come to the matter of Supply. Let us give new force to the old laws, which have been heretofore for the maintaining of our rights and privileges, and endeavour to restore this nation to its fundamental and vital liberties, the Property of our Goods, and the Freedom of our Persons; so way doubting but that we shall find his maj. as gracious and ready, as any of his royal progenitors have been, to grant our just desires therein; for not only the people do think, but the wisest do know, that what we have suffered in this long vacancy of parliaments, we have suffered from his ministers; that the person of no king was ever better beloved of his people; and yet that no people were ever less satisfied with the present ways of levying money. These are two truths which may serve, the one to demonstrate the other; for such is the opposition to the present course, that neither the admiration they have of his majesty's natural inclination to justice and clemency, nor the pre-needed consent of the judges, could make them willingly submit themselves to this late tax of Ship-Money: and such is their natural love and just esteem of his majesty's goodness, that no late pressure could provoke them, nor any example invite them to disloyalty or disobedience: what is it then that hath bred this misunderstanding betwixt the king and his people? How is it that, having so good a king, we have so much to complain of? Why, Mr. Speaker, we are told of the son of Solomon, that he was a prince of a tender heart; and yet, by the advice of violent counsellors, how rough an answer he gave to his people, 'That his fingers should be as heavy as his father's loyes:' this was not his own, but the voice of some persons about him, that wanted the gravity and moderation requisite for the counsel-lors of a young king.—I love not to press allegories too far, but the resemblance of Job's story with ours, holds so well that I cannot but observe it unto you: it pleased God to give his enemy leave to afflict him more than once or twice, and to take all that he had from him; and yet he was not provoked so much as to rebel with his tongue, although he had no very good example of one that lay very near him, and felt not one half that he suffered. I hope his maj. will imitate God in the benigner part too; he was severe to Job, only while he dis-couraged with another concerning him; but when he vouchsafed to speak himself to him, he began to rebuke those who had mistaken and misjudged his case; and to restore the patient man to his former prosperity: so, now his maj. hath admitted us to his presence, and spoken face to face with us, I doubt not but we shall see finer days; be restored again to the possession of our property and liberty; and that his maj. will frown upon those who have given the ill counsel.—I wonder at those that seem to doubt the success of this parliament; or that the misunderstanding between the king and his people should last any longer, when now they are so happily met. His majesty's wants are not so great, but that we may find means to supply him; nor our desires so unreasonable or incompatible with government, but that his maj. might well satisfy them: for our late ex-penience, I hope, will teach us what rocks to shun, and how necessary the use of moderation is; and for his maj. he has had experience enough how that prospers which is gotten without the concurrent good-will of his people: never more money taken from the subject; never more want in the exchequer: if we look upon what has been paid, it is more than usually the people of England were wont to pay in such a time: if we look upon what has been effected therewith, it shews as if never king had been worse supplied; so that we seem to have endeavoured the filling of a sieve with water. Whosoever gave advice for these courses, has made good the saying of the wise man, 'qui contrahat domum suam possidebit ventum': by new ways they think to accomplish wonders, but in truth they grasp the wind;

and are at the same time cruel to us and to the king too: for let the commonwealth flourish, and then he that hath the sovereignty can never want, nor do amiss; so as he governs not according to the interest of others, but go the shortest and easiest way to his own and the common good.—The kings of this nation have always governed by parliament; and if we look upon the success of things since parliaments were laid by, it resembles that of the Grecians,

"Ex illo fluere, ac retro sublapsa referri,

especially on the subjects parts; for though the king hath gotten little, they have lost all: but his majesty shall now hear the truth from us, and we shall make appear the errors of divines, who would persuade us that a monarch must be absolute, and that he may do all things ad libitum; receding not only from their text, though that be a wandering too, but from the way their own profession might teach them 'stare super vias antiquas,' and remove not the ancient bounds and landmarks, which our fathers have set: if to be absolute were to be restrained by no laws, than can no king in Christendom be so; for they all stand obliged to the laws Christian, and we ask no more; for to this pillar is our government fixed; our kings, at their coronation, taking a sacred oath to secure us.—I am sorry these men take no more care to gain our belief of those things, which they tell us for our souls health; while we know them so manifestly in the wrong in that which concerns the liberties and privileges of the subjects of England; but they gain preferment, and then it is no matter though they neither believe themselves, nor are believed by others: yet, since they are so ready to let loose the conscience of their king, we are the more carefully to provide for our protection against this pulpit law; by declaring and reinforcing the municipal laws of this kingdom. It is worthy the observing how new this opinion, or rather this way of rising is, even amongst themselves; for Mr. Hooker, who was no refractory man (as they term it) thinks, 'That the first government was arbitrary, until it was found, that to live by one man's will, became all men's miseries.' These are his words, concluding that 'This was the original of inventing laws.' And if we look further back, our histories will tell us, that the prelates of this kingdom have often been the mediators between the king and his subjects, to present and pray redress of their grievances; and had reciprocally then as much love and reverence from the people; but these preachers, more active than their predecessors, and wiser than the laws, have found out a better form of government.—The king must be a more absolute monarch than any of his predecessors; and, to them he must owe it, though in the mean time they hazard the hearts of his people, and involve him in a thousand difficulties: for suppose this form of government were inconvenient (and yet this is but a supposition, for, during these 500 years, it hath not only maintained us in safety, but made us victorious over other nations :) I say, suppose they have an idea of one more convenient : we all know how dangerous innovations are, though to the better ; and what hazard those princes must run that enterprise the change of a long established government ! Now, of all our kings that have gone before, and of all that are to succeed in this happy race, why should so pious and so good a king be exposed to this trouble and hazard ; besides that king, so diverted, can never do any great matter abroad.—But whilst these men have thus bent their wits against the laws of their country, whether they have not neglected their own province ; and what tares are grown up in the field which they should have tilled, I leave to a second consideration ; not but that religion ought to be the first thing in our purposes and desires, but that which is first in dignity is not always to precede in order of time : for well-being supposes a being, and the first impediment, which men naturally endeavour to remove, is the want of those things without which they cannot subsist.—God first assigned to Adam maintenance of life, and gave him a title to the rest of the creatures, before he appointed him a law to observe. And let me tell you, that if our adversaries have any such design, as there is nothing more easy than to impose a religion on a people deprived of their liberties ; so there is nothing more hard, than to do the same upon free-men.—And therefore, Mr. Speaker, I conclude with this motion, ‘ That there may be an order presently made, that the first thing this house will consider of, shall be the restoring of this nation in general to their fundamental and vital Liberties, the Property of our Goods, and Freedom of our Persons ; and that then we will forthwith consider of the Supply desired.’ Thus shall we discharge the trust reposed in us, by those that sent us hither : his maj. will see that we make more than ordinary haste to satisfy his demands ; and we shall let all those know, that seek to hasten the matter of Supply, that they will so far delay it, as they give interruption to the former.’

The Commons resolve to prefer Grievances to the Supply.] After some further speeches to the same purport, it was ordered, upon the Question, “ To consult with the lords how to prevent Innovation in matters of Religion ; also concerning the Property of Goods, and the Liberties and Privileges of Parliament ; the better to give a present Supply to his majesty.” And a conference was desired accordingly. But, the next day the lords sent an Answer to the request of the commons, by the two chief justices, importing, “ That their lordships did give this house many thanks for their respects shewed unto them in the Message : that the reason the messengers could not be admitted, was because of great and weighty business then before them, the king being there present ; but, so soon as ever the leisure and state of affairs, in that house, would permit, they would send notice of it by messengers of their own.”

—We must here look into the lords Journals, to find the reason and meaning of this visit ; and there we are told, That the king came to the house of lords, very unexpectedly, on this day ; and sitting down in his chair of state, without his robes, he spake to them to this effect :

“ My Lords ; The necessity of calling this parliament, makes me come this day hither, contrary to expectation : you remember what the lord keeper said concerning the occasion of this meeting, the first and second day, but chiefly on the day of conference of both houses at Whitehall. The house of commons did seem to take into consideration my weighty affairs, but they have in a manner, concluded the contrary ; for, instead of performing my occasions, in the first place, they have held consultation of Innovations in Religion, Property of Goods, and Privileges of Parliament ; and so have put the cart before the horse. If it was a time to dispute, I should not much stand upon it ; but my necessities are so urgent, that there can be no delay. If the house of commons will trust me, I will make good what I promised by my lord-keeper. As for Religion, my heart and conscience, with the religion now established in the church of England, shall go together. For the Ship-Money, God is my witness, I never converted any of it to my own profit, but to the end of preserving my dominion on the seas, nor ever intended it. For Property of Goods, it is a thing I never designed to molest : it is my desire to be king of a free and a rich people ; and if no Property in Goods, no rich people. I told the commons, that if they would speedily supply my occasions, for the present, I would give them further time, in winter, to debate and present all their just Grievances. If they will not trust me in this first, all my business this summer will be lost ; and, before the year goeth about, I must be trusted at last ; for, in the winter, I must call them to give me a greater Supply, if the house of commons will not join to prefer my occasions before their Grievances. I conjure your lordships to consider your own honour and mine, and the preposterous course of the commons ; and desire that your lordships will not join with them, but leave them to themselves. I desire you to be careful in this point, else, if the Supply come not in time, I will not say what mischief may and must follow.”

The king having made this short speech, and left the house, the lord keeper acquainted the peers with one particular his maj. had forgotten ; which was, That the house would determine, before they parted, on what the king had proposed to them. Hereupon it was moved, That the house might be put into a committee, for every lord to speak his mind, and to be adjourned during pleasure. After long and great debates, as the Journal expresses it, on the king's Speech, the house was again resumed, and these two questions were agreed upon to be proposed : 1. “ Whether the Supply should have precedence, and be resolved upon before any other matter whatsoever? 2. Whether there should be a conference desired with the commons, in order to dispose them thereto?" These were both carried in the affirmative. And a message was sent to the lower house for the last named purpose; as is before related in their Journals, to which we now return.

Heads of Grievances prepared by the Commons.] The same day that the king came to the house of lords, the committee of the commons, appointed to prepare Heads or Inductions, for a Conference, delivered a series of them to the house, as follow:

"INDUCEMENTS.

"I. Concerning Innovation in Matters of Religion.

1. "The commission that was lately granted to the convocation-house. The rather, because of the innovations brought in and practised, when there was no such commission. 2. The complaints arising from petitions brought in from several counties, by the members of the house, against innovations in religion. 3. The molesting and depriving of godly and conformable ministers, for not yielding to matters enjoined without warrant of law. 4. The publishing of Popish tenets, in licenced books, sermons, and disputations. 5. Restraining conformable ministers from preaching in their own charges."

"II. Concerning Property of Goods.

1. "Monopolies, and restraint of trade. 2. Ship-money. 3. Enlarging the bounds of forests beyond what they have been for some hundred years last past. 4. Military charges, viz. Cost and conduct money, wages, arms taken from the owners, forcing the country to buy or provide, at their own charge, horses and carts, by way of tax. 5. Denial of justice in the courts of Westminster, to the subject's prejudice, in point of the property of his goods. 6. Frequent imprisonments and vexations for nonpayment of unwarrantable taxes, and not submitting to unlawful monopolies."

"III. Liberties and Privileges of Parliament.

1. "Penishing men out of parliament, for things done in parliament. 2. That which is already voted in the house concerning privilege of parliament. 3. Sudden dissolution of parliaments, without redress of grievances.—But this was laid by for the present, and not put to the question. Lastly, 'As that which relates to all, and is a great cause of all our former grievances, the not holding of parliaments every year, according to the laws and statutes of this realm.'—This also was put off for the present.

Resolved, upon different questions, on each particular Article of the first Charge, relating to Religious Matters, 'That they should all be made use of in the intended conference with the lords.'—The same on the second and third, except the two last articles of it, which were deferred to another opportunity.

The Lords, at a Conference, recommend Precedency of Supply.] April 25. The commons received a Message from the lords, by two of the judges, "That his majesty having been pleased to be in their house yesterday, and some occasions having risen from thence, on which some debate had happened, their lordships desired a speedy conference with a committee of both houses about the same." A committee of the commons were instantly appointed, who were to attend the lords, and make a report of the conference on Monday morning.*

April 27. The said report was made to the commons by Mr. Herbert, the queen's solicitor, to this effect; repeating the Heads of the king's speech, at the conference, and what the lord keeper subjoined to it. The former has already been given at large, and the latter being much better digested in the Lords Journals, we shall add from that authority:

"The lord keeper acquainted the commons with the effect of what his maj. said to the lords the day before, and at the meeting at Whitehall. He also put them in mind of what was said the first and second days of this parliament; and that the king had said he would make it all good. He told them, that his majesty's affairs would admit of no delay; but required a present and speedy supply. He let them know the great distemper that Scotland was now in; that the Scots army had pitched their tents in the fields near Dunc, and had taken four English troops; and threaten the invasion of Northumberland: that the Scots had put themselves under the protection of the French king; that his maj.'s honour is concerned in this business; which he is determined to uphold as his life.—That there is a necessity to trust his majesty at present, yet he must trust them hereafter; that he will not break his word with them; and that delay was as bad as denial; and time lost cannot be recovered. They had the word of a king, and not only so, but of a gentleman.—For the three propositions, viz. Religion, Property of Goods, and Privileges of Parliament, he told them, his maj. would graciously hearken unto them, and relieve them; and give them what, in reason, can be desired.—For Religion: he said, his majesty's heart and conscience would go together; and that he will die in the religion of the Church of England. That Ship-Money was never profit to the king; for he spent that, and more out of his own revenue, to preserve the dominion of the seas; and if they would put the king into any other way to secure the seas, he would hear them.—Lastly, He told the commons, That the lords had voted and declared, as their opinion, that his majesty's

* This day Mr. John Rushworth, the Author of the Historical Collections, was admitted as a clerk-assistant to the house of commons, —Journ. Dom. Com.

Supply should have the precedence, and be resolved on before any other matter whatsoever; therefore he desired the house of commons to go on with that first, as that which, in the opinion of the house of lords, is held most necessary. That their lordships in this did not move subsidies, but rather declined it, and only gave their advice therein. That this being done, their lordships would be ready to join in any thing for carrying on the other great business."

This Report of the lord keeper's speech being made in the house of commons, a long debate ensued upon it; and, at last, they came to the following resolutions: 1. Resolved, upon the question, 'That by the late matter propounded, in the late conference with the lords, the privileges of this house are violated.' 2. 'That the words now read by the Solicitor, were a faithful and true report of part of that conference had with the lords; and that the said words shall be entered in the Journal.' 3. 'That their lordships voting, propounding, and declaring concerning matter of Supply, in such sort as is contained in this Report, before it was moved from this house, is a Breach of Privilege of this house.'—And, after ordering the last section of the Report to be read once more, it was further resolved, 'That a select committee should be appointed to consider of this day's debate and resolutions; and to prepare, in writing, an Address unto the lords, for righting the privileges of this house.'

The next day, the commons agreed and approved on an address to the lords, and that Mr. Pym should go up to that house with it; which he delivered to their lordships in manner following:

"That at the last conference, by a committee of both houses, it was submitted by your lordships, that matters of Subsidy naturally belong to the commons; and that your lordships would not meddle therein, nor give advice in it, but had declined it. That, notwithstanding this declaration, your lordships have meddled with, and advised concerning both the matter of supply, and the time when the same should be made: and this before such time as the same was moved to them by the commons, as appears by your lordships declaration, viz. 'That you had voted you held most necessary and fit, that the matter of Supply should have precedence before any other matter or consideration whatsoever: and therefore desired that conference with the commons, to let them know your lordships reasons for it; which being taken into consideration, and done by the commons, your lordships would freely join with them in all that concerns religion, property of estate, and privilege of parliament.' That the course this committee did offer for repair of this breach of privilege, was, That your lordships would, in your wisdoms, find out, yourselves, some sort of reparation, and of prevention of the like infringement for the future. And whereas the committee was induced to conceive, that your lordships had been informed the commons had entered into consideration and debate of the aforesaid matters of religion, &c. and that they were to have precedence before Supply, which might occasion your lordships voting as they had done; they humbly desire to present the same to your lordships, in words to this effect:—That, in case your lordships have taken notice of any orders or proceedings of the commons, concerning Religion, Property, and Privileges, and that they were to proceed to the Supply; which they have some cause to conceive by these words, 'That this being done, your lordships would freely join with the commons in those three things:' for the avoiding all misunderstandings between your lordships and the commons, for time to come, they desire your lordships, hereafter, to take no notice of any thing which shall be debated by the commons, until they shall, themselves, declare the same unto your lordships; which the commons shall always observe towards your proceedings, conceiving the contrary not to consist with the privileges of either house."

The committee being returned, Mr Pym informed the house of what he had done and delivered; and that their lordships Answer, at present, was, 'They would send one in convenient time.' It was ordered, That the thanks of the house should be given to Mr. Pym, for the good service he did them, in his exact and faithful delivery of their Address.

We are told, in the Lords Journals, That when the lord keeper had made a report to the house of what was delivered by the commons, at the conference the day before, their lordships entered into a long and serious debate upon it, and afterwards came to the following Resolution, "That by their lordships first voting, they were of opinion the matter of his maj.'s Supply should have precedence, and be resolved on before any other matter whatsoever, there was no breach of the privilege of the house of commons.

April 30. The lords passed another vote, to the same purpose, "That it was no breach of privilege of the house of commons, for their lordships to hear what his maj. declared to them, and thereupon to report the same to the house of commons." And, in order to be more able to support these two Resolutions, the lords ordered, That notice should be given to the keeper of the records in the Tower to attend the house the next morning, with the original record of the 9th of Hen. 4. concerning the indemnity of the peers and commons. Likewise a committee of lords was appointed to meet that afternoon in the council-chamber at Whitehall, to prepare and draw up heads for another conference with the commons about this great affair.—But to return to that body.

be desired with the lords, about the matters contained under the heads or inducements, before-mentioned; that they had thought fit to assign three men, for the charge of the three heads: Mr. Pym for the first, and to make an introduction to the whole business: Mr. St. John for the second; who desired, that, in regard of the large extent of this head, another might be joined with him to undertake the charge: and Mr. Holborn for the third. Upon delivery of this report the following particulars were by question resolved upon. "1. That in this conference with the lords, there shall be a protestation and a saving made, to preserve and keep entire the right of the commons, not to be bound by any canons, that are or shall be made, upon any commission granted, or to be granted, to the convocation, without the consent of parliament. 2. That, in the said conference, one head shall be, touching the removing of the communion table, in parish churches, and chapels in the universities, and placing them altar-wise, at the east end of the said churches and chapels, close to the wall. 3. That another head of this conference shall be the setting up of crosses, images, and crucifixes, in cathedral and parochial churches and chapels, both in the universities, and divers other places of this kingdom. 4. Another head shall be, the refusing to administer the sacrament to such as will not come up to the rail before the communion table, set altar-wise; and excommunicating some for not doing of it. 5. The making and enjoining of articles at visitations, without any other authority than that of the bishops of the diocese. 6. That, in this conference, another head shall be, touching the molesting, suspending, or depriving of many godly and conformable ministers, for not yielding to matters enjoined without warrant of law; instancing such as have been deprived for not reading the book for recreations on Sundays. 7. That, in this conference, one head shall be, touching the preaching, printing, and determining of and for Popish tenets, contrary to the doctrine of the church of England. 8. Another head to be, touching the enjoining and preaching of bowing to the altar, and the enquiry for the doing, or not doing of it. 9. That, in this conference, another shall be, concerning the restraining of conformable ministers from preaching in their own charges. Lastly, It was resolved, 'That in this conference with the lords, there shall be a reservation to the parties, appointed to carry it on, of further liberty to add more particulars as there shall be occasion.'

The Lords, at a Conference, give their Reasons for preferring the Supply.] May 1. A Message was brought from the lords to desire a present conference, concerning somewhat that fell out in the last. The house was divided on this message, and the question being put, Whether to agree to this conference, or not? it passed in the negative, 257 against 148. Rushworth tells us, 'That this division of the house discovered the temper of it; for the majority, that voted against the conference, were for Redress of Grievances before the Supply.' but he does not acquaint us, That soon after the conference was agreed to, and the treasurer of the household sent up to inform the lords of it; though he has given us the lord keeper's Speech made at this meeting. The speech before mentioned for which this conference was desired, had been reported and agreed upon by the lords; and was delivered to the committee of the commons, by the lord keeper, to the effect following:

"My lords have commanded me to let you know, that the desire and care on your part at the last conference, represented unto them for preserving a good union and correspondence between their lordships and you, is by them entertained with all respect, and requited with all good affection; as that which is the best way to bring our consultations and resolutions to an happy issue, to give his maj. a dutiful account of our zeal and forwardness in those great and weighty affairs, for which we were assembled; and to further those united proceedings that may tend to the happiness of this kingdom, and the contentment of both houses. Their lordships well know the great privileges belonging to both houses of parliament, of which they and you alike participate: and they are not ignorant of those that are distinctly proper to each house: what belongs to you of the house of commons, they never had thought to impeach or diminish in the least kind; and what they may justly challenge to themselves, they presume you will not attempt upon; since you cannot doubt but they will be as tender of their honour in the preservation and upholding of their own, as they are and shall be careful not to invade or violate any of yours.—This their lordships commanded me to tell you, will best and most clearly appear, by the course that hath been held in their own house, and by their proceedings with you.—Their lordships, as in duty and affection to his majesty's crown and government they are bound, took into serious consideration the great and weighty motive of his maj.'s calling us together at this time; the great evils and calamities that hang over our heads, and the apparent danger this kingdom is like to run into, if, by speedy and fitting supply, his maj. be not enabled to prevent it?—These, with other reasons enforcing how unsupportable delay and protraction was, and how impossible it is for both houses to recover the loss of time, in a matter of so urging and pressing consequence, were, by his maj.'s command, delivered to their lordships and you, both in the lords house and in the Banqueting-house at Whitehall; his maj. being present.—His maj. I say, at both those times, expressed his gracious and princely desire to do all that from a just and a gracious king might be expected; whereby this parliament might have an happy and blessed conclusion, to bring joy and consolation to his majesty and all his subjects. He told you, that all your just grievances should be graciously heard and relieved; that he would therein let you be at no loss of time; but for the present, before you parted, you should have, without abridging, as much time as the season and great affairs in hand would possibly permit; and, what you could not now prefer, you should have time towards winter to go through with.—Their lordships were witnesses, that his maj. gave his royal word herein; and, for their parts, lodge it in their hearts with as much trust and confidence of his majesty's royal performance, as ever subjects did.—Not long after, his majesty was pleased to honour the lords house with his presence again; to renew their remembrance of all that before had been delivered to both houses, both for the necessity of the Supply desired, with an impossibility of admitting delay; and the clearness of his majesty's intention and resolutions to give all just satisfaction to what with reason could be desired of him.—His maj. then took notice to their lordships of somewhat that had been voted in your house concerning Religion, Property of Goods, and Liberty of Parliament; whereby his maj. conceived the matter of his Supplies set aside, which he had so often, and with such weight of reason, desired might have precedence; after very gracious assurances to their lordships of his maj.'s constant affection and zeal for the true Religion, for preventing all innovation therein, of his so often iterated promise to give a gracious ear and just relief to all your just Grievances; expressing his royal intentions in that of Ship-Money, which found so much stood upon.—He was further pleased to desire their lordships, (as persons in their ranks and degrees nearest to him in honour, as much and more concerned than others; and, in the safety and prosperity of his kingdom, at least equally interested with the rest of his subjects, in a case of this great and important weight) that they would, by their counsel and persuasion, incline you of the house of commons to give his maj. a speedy answer and resolution, in the matter of Supply.—Their lordships took this his maj.'s desire into serious and dutiful consideration; and, after a great and solemn debate, they resolved, that their opinion was, That the matter of his maj.'s Supply should have precedency, and be resolved of before any other matter whatsoever; and did think fit, there should be a conference desired with you of the house of commons to dispose you thereunto. And this was all they then voted or concluded, with which other conference their lordships acquainted you: this as it was just and honourable for them to do, so it neither extended the bounds and limits of their own privilege, nor narrowed or straitened any of yours. And yet at the last conference (which their lordships are apt and willing to believe, proceeded rather from some mistaking than any intention to lessen their or enlarge your own privileges) it was urged in your name, 'That the voting of this was a breach of your privilege, and that therein their lordships had been transported beyond those bounds, which they had set to themselves; because, in their former conference, their lordships had admitted, that matter of Supply ought to be given in the house of commons, as naturally belonging to that house, and wherein their lordships would not meddle, no not so much as to give advice: and yet by voting what they did, had not only meddled in matter of Supply, but as far as in their lordships lay, had concluded both of matter and order of proceedings, for which you demanded reparation from their lordships. Herein, I'm commanded by their lordships to let you know, that they have neither varied nor been transported from their own bounds; nor voted any thing contrary to your rights and privileges, or to the admitting of them at that conference, which is pretended. For their lordships did and do admit, That the bill of Subsidies ought to have its inception and beginning in your house; and, that when it comes up to their lordships, and is by them agreed unto, it must be returned back to you; and be, by your Speaker, presented.—And therefore, as they do disclaim any thought or intention of such beginning in their house; so they did, at their debate and conference with you, disclaim to meddle with the matter of Subsidies or Supplies; that is by naming the time or number, or any such circumstances incident to the bill, which ought to begin with you; or therein to give you any the least advice, but only to confer and talk with you about Supplies in general. For, to give you their advice therein, they do not, nor ever did, hold derogatory to yours, or exceeding the privileges of their own house; since as you frequently impart your Grievances to them, so it is all the reason in the world they should communicate their fears and foresights of dangers to you: their lordships being a body, that moreth in an orb nearer unto the royal throne than you do; and thereby the likelier to communicate in the counsels and secrets of state; and, for their persons and fortunes, at least as considerable in point of danger. Their lordships are not unacquainted with that establishment in parliament, which was by you, at the conference, styled The Indempnity of the Commons; but it is indeed the Indempnity of the Lords and Commons; and so styled in the record itself. By that record, made at Gloucester, 9 Hen. IV. it appears there was a conference between the lords and commons, about the state of the realm and defence of it; after which the king demanded of the lords, what aid was fit to be granted? They said a tenth and an half in cities and boroughs, and one fifth and an half of others, and a Subsidy of Tonnage and Poundage for two years. Upon which the king sent to the commons, to send up to him and the lords, twelve of their company; when they came, it was by the king's command declared, what had been by the king demanded of the lords, and what the lords answer thereto was; which the king willed to report to their companions, that they might with better speed conform themselves to the intention of the lords. This indeed the commons were troubled at, as being a great derogation to their liberties; whereupon, to prevent, for the future, any thing that might turn to the prejudice of their liberty, or against the liberty of the lords, it was established, 'That it should always be lawful for the lords to commune among themselves, in the king's absence, of the state of the realm, and the remedies thereof; and so for the commons among themselves. Provided always, that neither the lords, or commons, report to the king any things granted by the commons and assented to by the lords; nor the communication of it, before the lords and commons be agreed, and then be represented by the Speaker of the house of commons.'—This is the substance of that establishment, which only hath relation to the manner of presenting subsidies and aids to the king, and giving him knowledge of them. And, as it hath not one word that bars the lords and commons from conferring about them; so it plainly declares, that both lords and commons, in their several houses, may equally treat amongst themselves of the dangers the kingdom is in, and of the way to remedy them. This my lords have well weighed, and are satisfied, verifies their proceedings to have been according to ancient usage and custom, as they are grounded upon just and weighty reasons.—Many other reasons their lordships have, to justify their proceedings in this particular; but they conceive this record, alone, mentioned by yourselves, will give you herein abundant satisfaction; and plainly shew that the house of commons had no cause to demand reparation herein from their lordships. A second thing objected, wherein their lordships have been said to have broke another great privilege of the house of commons established by that ordinance, which I have mentioned before, is, that their lordships have taken notice of some proceedings in the house of commons concerning three particulars, viz. Religion, Property of Goods, and Privilege of Parliament. To which their lordships have commanded me to give you this just and honourable answer. His maj. told their lordships, you had resolved something concerning these three heads; and, by that way of proceeding, preferred Grievances before matter of Supply. How his maj. knew that you had so resolved, belongs not to their lordships to enquire into; their lordships not meddling with any thing that others say to the king. But as to what his maj. said to their lordships, and what their lordships heard his maj. declare to them: certainly for them, thereupon, to report the same to the house of commons, their lordships are so far from holding it any diminution, or violation of your privileges; that, on the contrary, in duty to his maj. they could do no other: and the communicating it to you, in that manner, they think rather merits your opinion and belief of their affections to you, and desire of correspondence with you, than any other misconstruction whatsoever.—As to that which you called the Indecency of the Commons, it hath no word in it that can be construed to make any breach of your privilege. Therefore, their lordships, having thus cleared and justified their own proceedings, and freed themselves from any imputation of invading your liberties, cannot but return to their first grounds and resolution; which were, in all fair and affectionate manner, to stir up in you the just consideration of those great and imminent dangers that threaten this kingdom at this time, and how dangerous and irrecoverable delay is: and withal to dispose you to take, into your first and best thoughts, the matter of his maj.'s Supply, and give him a speedy answer therein. This, their lordships are confident, will be the means to preserve and continue a good union and understanding between their lordships and you: to make this a happy parliament; and to avert the public calamities, that menace the ruin and overthrow of this famous and renowned monarchy."

A Message from the King to the Commons, to hasten a Supply. May 2. Whilst the house was preparing to hear the report made of yesterday's conference with the lords, the treasurer of the household, sir Henry Vane, delivered a Message from the king to them, which was read in hæc verba;

"That his majesty hath by divers and sundry ways, acquainted this house with the urgent necessity of Supply, and with the great danger, inevitably, to fall upon the whole state, upon his own honour, and the honour of this nation, if more time shall be lost therein. That, nevertheless, his majesty hath, hitherto, received no Answer at all; though, heretofore, his majesty had told the house, That a delay in this case is as destructive as a denial; and doth again desire them to give him a present Answer concerning his Supply; his majesty being still resolved, on his part, to make good whatsoever he hath promised by himself or the lord keeper."

On the receiving this Message, the house presently resolved itself into a committee, William Lenthall, esq. in the chair. But though a debate ensued on the message, which lasted till six o'clock at night, they came only to the following Resolution. "That because of the difficulty of the matter debated, there should be further time granted to the committee, to begin it again on Monday the 4th instant, at eight in the morning. And that the Treasurer, Comptroller, and Mr. Secretary Windebank, be intreated, from this house, to acquaint his majesty with this order."

A second Message to the same Purport. May 4. Mr. Treasurer acquainted the house, That they had made known to his majesty their order of Saturday; in Answer to which, the king had sent another Message, which was also read in these words:

was pleased to send a message to this house, desiring you to give a present answer concerning his Supply; to which, as yet, his majesty hath had no other answer, but that, upon this day, you will again take it into further consideration: Therefore his majesty, the better to facilitate your resolutions, this day, hath thought fit to let you know, that, of his grace and favour, he is pleased, (upon your granting twelve subsidies to be presently passed, and to be paid in three years, with a proviso that it shall not determine the sessions) not only, for the present, to forbear the further levying of any Ship-Money, but will also give way to the utter abolishing of it, by any course that yourselves shall like best.—And for your Grievances, his majesty will (according to his royal promise) give you as much time as may be now, and the next Michaelmas; and he expects a present and positive Answer upon which he may rely, his affairs being in such a condition as can endure no longer delay.”

The King dissolves the Parliament.] The commons went again into a committee of the whole house, to consider of his majesty's Messages of Saturday and of this day. The serjeant was sent to the several bars, in Westminster Hall, to summon the members to come to the service of the house. But though they spent this whole day, also, in preparing an Answer to the king's Messages, they came to no other Resolution than to adjourn it till the next morning at 8 of the clock; and that the former officers should acquaint his majesty with it. But, the next day, Rushworth informs us, That Mr. Secretary Windebank went early to the Speaker's house in Chancery-Lane, with a command to bring him to Whitehall: that the commons met at the usual hour; but the Speaker not appearing, according to custom, they concluded they were to be dissolved. And, as they were discoursing with one another, James Maxwell, esq. gentleman-usher of the black rod, came to require their appearance in the upper house: where the king spake as follows:

“My Lords; There can no occasion of my coming to this house be so displeasing unto me, as this at this time. The fear of doing that, which I am to do this day, made me not long since come into this house; where I express as well my fears as the remedy, which I thought necessary for the eschewing of what is to follow. I must confess and acknowledge that you, my lords of the higher house, did give me so willing an ear, and with such affection did shew yourselves; that, certainly I may say, if there had been any means to have given an happy end to this parl. you took it; so that it was neither your lordships fault nor mine, that it is not so. Therefore in the first place, I must thank you, my lords, for your good endeavours.—My lords, I hope you remember what, the first day of the parliament, my lord keeper said to you in my name; and what likewise he said in the Banqueting house in Whitehall; and what, lately, I said unto you in this place myself. I name all this unto you, not doubting that you do not well remember it; but to shew you that I never said any thing in way of favour to my people, but, by the grace of God, I will punctually and really perform it.—I know they have insisted very much on Grievances; I will not say but there may be some, though I will confidently affirm that there are not, by many degrees, so many as the public voice doth make them. Wherefore I desire you to take notice, now especially at this time, that out of parliament I shall be as ready, if not more willing, to hear and redress any just grievances, as in parliament.—There is one thing much spoken of, I mean as to matters of religion. Concerning which, albeit I expressed myself fully the last day in this place, yet I think it fit again on this occasion to tell you, that as I am concerned, so I shall be most careful to preserve that purity of religion which I thank God, is so well established in the church of England; and that as well out of, as in, parliament.—My Lords, I shall not trouble you long with words, it being not my fashion; wherefore to conclude, what I offered the last day to the house of commons, I think is very well known to you all; as likewise how they accepted it, which I desire not to remember; but wish they had remembered how at first they were told by my lord keeper, that delay was the worst kind of denial: yet I will not lay this fault on the whole house of commons; I will not judge so uncharitably of those whom, for the most part, I take to be loyal and well affected subjects; but it hath been the malicious cunning of some few seditiously affected men that hath been the cause of this misunderstanding.—I shall now end as I begun, in giving your lordships thanks for the care you have of my honour and affairs, desiring you to go on and assist me in the maintaining of my government and the liberties of the people, that they now so much startle at; for, my lords, no king in the world shall be more careful to maintain the Property of their Goods, the Liberties of their Persons, and the true Religion, than I shall be. And now, my Lord-keeper, do as I have commanded you.”

The lord-keeper then added: “My lords, and you the gentlemen of the house of commons, the king's majesty doth dissolve this parliament.”

The King's Declaration of his Reasons for dissolving the Parliament.] Soon after the dissolution of this parliament the king published a Declaration of the Grounds and Reasons, which induced him to take such a step; in which is a recapitulation of all his Speeches, Messages, and Answers to them, from the beginning to the end of this parliament: to avoid tautology, we shall not repeat them here, but only give the Declaration itself:

“His Majesty's DECLARATION to all his loving Subjects, of the Causes which moved him to dissolve the last PARLIAMENT.

“The king's most excellent majesty well knoweth, that the calling, adjourning, proroguing and dissolving of parliaments are undoubted prerogatives inseparably annexed to his imperial crown; of which he is not bound to render any account, but to God alone, no more than of his other regal actions.—Nevertheless his maj. whose piety and goodness have made him ever so to order and govern all things, that the clearness and candor of his royal heart may appear to all his subjects; especially in those great and publick matters of state, that have relation to the weal and safety of his people, and the honour of his royal person and government; hath thought fit (for avoiding and preventing all sinister constructions and misinterpretation, which the malice of some ill-affected persons to his crown and sovereignty, hath or may practise to infuse into the minds and ears of his good and faithful subjects) to set down by way of declaration, the true causes, as well of his assembling, as of his dissolving, the late parliament.—It is not unknown to most of his majesty's loving subjects, what discouragements he hath formerly had, by the undutiful and seditious carriage of divers of the lower house in preceding assemblies of parliaments; enough to have made him averse to those antient and accustomed ways of calling his people together; when, instead of dutiful expressions towards his person and government, they vented their own malice and disaffections to the state; and, by their seditious and malignant courses, endeavoured nothing more than to bring into contempt and disorder all government and magistracy.—Yet his majesty, well considering that but few were guilty of that seditious and undutiful behaviour; and hoping that time and experience had made his loving subjects sensible of the distemper the whole kingdom was like to be put into, by the ill-governed actions of those men: and his maj. being ever desirous to tread in the steps of his most noble progenitors, was pleased to issue forth his writs under the great seal of England for a parliament, to be holden the 13th day of April last.—On that day his majesty, by the lord-keeper of his great seal, was graciously pleased to let both houses of parliament know how desirous he was, that all his people would unite their hearts and affections in the execution of those counsels, that might tend to the honour of his maj. the safety of his kingdoms, and the good and preservation of all his people: and withal, how confident he was that they would not be failing in their duties and affections to him and to the public.—He laid open to them the manifest and apparent mischief threatened to this and all his other kingdoms, by the mutinous and rebellious behaviour of divers of the Scots nation; who had, by their examples, drawn many of his subjects there into a course of disloyalty and disobedience, not fit for his maj. in honour, safety, or wisdom to endure. And how that, to strengthen themselves in their disloyal courses, they had addressed themselves to foreign states, and treated with them to deliver themselves up to their protection and defence; as was made apparent under the hands of the prime ringleaders of that rebellious faction.—These courses of theirs tending so much to the ruin and overthrow of this famous monarchy, united by the descent of the crown of England upon his maj. and his father of blessed memory: his maj. in his great wisdom, and in discharge of the trust reposed in him by God, and by the fundamental laws of both kingdoms, for the protection and government of them, resolved to suppress; and, thereby, to vindicate that sovereign power intrusted to him.—He had, by the last summer's trial, found that his grace and goodness was abused; and that, contrary to his expectation and their faithful promises, they had, since his being at Berwick and the pacification there made, pursued their former rebellious designs: and therefore it was necessary now, for his maj. by force to reduce them to the just and modest condition of their obedience and subjection; which, whenever they should be brought unto, or, seeing their own errors, should put themselves into a way of humility and obedience becoming them; his maj. should need no other mediator for clemency and mercy to them, than his own piety and goodness, and the tender affection he hath ever born to that his native kingdom. This being of so great weight and consequence to the whole kingdom, and the charge of an army fit to master such a business amounting to such a sum as his maj. hath no means to raise; having not only emptied his own coffers, but issued between three and four hundred thousand pounds, which he borrowed of his servants upon security out of his own estate, to provide such things as were necessary to begin such an action with: his maj. after the example of his predecessors, resorted to his people in their representative body, the parliament; whom he desired, with all the expressions of grace and goodness which could possibly come from him, that, taking into serious and dutiful consideration the nature of these bleeding evils, and how dangerous it was to lose the least minute of time, lest thereby those of Scotland should gain the opportunity to frame their parties with foreign states: they would, for a while, lay aside all other debates, and pass an act for the speedy payment of so many Subsidies, as might enable his maj. to put in readiness, for the summer's expedition, those things which were to be prepared before so great an army could be brought into the field. But for a further Supply, necessary for so great an undertaking, his maj. declared, that he expected it not, till there might be a happy conclusion of this session; and till their just Grievances might be, first, graciously heard and relieved.—And therein as his maj. would, most willingly, have given them the precedence before matters of Supply, if the great necessity of his occasions could have permitted; so he was graciously pleased, for their full assurance and satisfaction therein, to give them his royal word, that, without determining the session, upon granting of the Subsidies, he would give them, before they parted, as much time as the season of the year and the great affairs in hand would permit, for considering all such petitions as they conceived to be for the good of the commonwealth; and what they could not now finish, they should have full time to perfect towards winter: his maj. graciously assuring them, that he would go along with them for their advantage, through all the expressions of a gracious and pious king; to the end there might be such a happy conclusion of that, as might be the cause of many more meetings with them in parliament.—From their first assembling until the 21st of April, the house of commons did nothing that could give his maj. any content or confidence in their speedy supplying of him: whereupon he commanded both the houses to attend him in the Banqueting-House, at Whitehall, in the afternoon of that 21st of April; where, by the lord-keeper, his maj. put them in mind of the end for which they were assembled, which was for his majesty's Supplies: that if it were not speedy it would be of no use unto him, part of the army then marching at the charge of above a hundred thousand pounds a month; which would all be lost, if his maj. were not, presently, supplied, so as it was not possible to be longer forborn. Yet his maj. then expressed, that the Supply he for the present desired, was only to enable him to go on with his designs for three or four months; and that he expected no further Supply till all their just Grievances were relieved.—And, because his maj. had taken notice of some misapprehensions about the laying of Ship-Money, his maj. commanded the lord-keeper to let them know, that he never had any intention to make any revenue of it, nor had ever made any; but that all the money collected had been paid to the treasurer of the navy, and by him expended, besides several great sums of money every year out of his majesty's own purse: that his maj. had once resolved, this year, to have levied none; but that he was forced to alter his resolution, in regard he was of necessity to send an army for reducing those of Scotland, during which time it was requisite the seas should be well guarded. And besides his maj. had knowledge of the great fleets prepared by all neighbouring princes this year, and of the insolencies committed by those of Algiers, with the store of ships they had in readiness. And therefore, though his maj. for this present year could not forbear it, but expected their concurrence in the laying of it; yet, for the future, to give all his subjects assurance, how just and royal his intentions were, and that all his aim was, but to live like their king; able to defend himself and them; to be useful to his friends, and considerable to his enemies; to maintain the sovereignty of the seas, and so make the kingdom flourish in trade and commerce: he was graciously pleased to let them know, that the ordinary revenue, now taken by the crown, could not serve the turn; and therefore that it must be by Ship-money, or some other way, wherein he was willing to leave it to their considerations, what better course to find out; and to settle it how they would, so the thing were but done, which so much imported the honour and safety of the kingdom. That his maj. for his part, would most readily and cheerfully grant any thing they could desire, for securing them in the property of their goods and estates, and in the liberty of their persons: his maj. telling them, it was in their power to make this as happy a parliament as ever was; and to be the cause of the king's delighting to meet with his people, and his people with him: and that there was no such way to effect this, as by putting obligations of trust and confidence upon him; which, as it was the way of good manners with a king, so it was a surer and safer course for themselves, than any that their own jealousies and fear could invent; his majesty being a prince that deserved their trust, and could not lose the honour of it; and of so gracious a nature that he disdained his people should overcome him by kindness: that he had made this good to some other subjects of his; and if they followed his counsel, they should be sure not to repent it; being the people that were nearest and dearest unto him, and subjects that he did and had reason to value more than the subjects of any of his other kingdoms.—His majesty having thus graciously expressed himself unto them, he expected the house of commons would have, the next day, taken into consideration the matter of Supply; and laid aside all other debates, till that was resolved according to his desire. But, instead of giving an answer therein, such as the pressing and urgent occasions required, they fell into discount and debates about their pretended Grievances; and raised up so many, and of so several nature, that, in a parliamentary way, they could not but spend more time than his majesty's great and weighty affairs could possibly afford.—His majesty foreseeing, in his great wisdom, that they were not in the way to make this happy parliament, which he so much desired, hoped; yet, that nothing might be wanting to his part, to bring them into the right way; he resolved, for his honour, the safety of the kingdom, and their own good, to desire the assistance of the lords of the higher house, as persons in rank and degree nearest to the royal throne; and who, having received honour from him and his royal progenitors, he doubted not would, for those and many other reasons, be moved in honour and dutiful affection to his person and crown, to dispose the house of commons to express their duty to his majesty; in expediting the matter of Supply, for which they were called together, and which required so urgent a dispatch.—For this purpose his maj. his royal person, came again to the last house on Wednesday, the 24th of April, where he himself declared to the lords the cause of his coming; which was to put them in mind of what had been, by the lord-keeper in his name, delivered to both houses the first day of this parliament, and after at Whitehall and how, contrary to his expectation, the house of commons, having held consultation of matter of Religion, Property of Goods, and Liberty of Parliament; and voted some things concerning those three heads, had thereby given them the precedence before the matter of his Supply: that his necessities were such, they could not bear delay: that whatever he had by the lord keeper promised, he would perform, if the house of commons would trust him.—That, for Religion, his heart and conscience went together with the Religion established in the church of England; and he would give order to his archbishops and bishops, that no innovation in matter of Religion should creep in.—For Ship-Money, that he never made, nor intended to make any profit to himself of it, but only to preserve the dominion of the seas; which was so necessary, that without it the kingdom could not subsist: but for the way and means, by Ship-Money, or otherwise, he left it to them.—For Property of Goods, and Liberty of Parliament, he ever intended his people should enjoy them; holding no king so great, as he that was king of a rich and free people; and if they had not property of goods and liberty of persons, they would be neither rich nor free.—That, if the house of commons would not first trust him, all his affairs would be disordered, and his business lost. That though they trusted him in part at first, yet, before the parliament ended, he must totally trust them; and, in conclusion, they must, for the execution of all things, wholly trust him. Therefore since the matter was no more, than who should be first trusted; and that the trust of him first, was but a trust in part; his majesty desired the lords to take into their considerations his and their own honour, the safety and welfare of this kingdom, with the great danger it was in; and that they would, by their advice, dispose the house of commons to give his Supply the precedence before their Grievances.—His majesty being departed, the lords took into serious consideration what his majesty had commended to their care; and, forthwith, laying aside all other debates (such was their lordships dutiful and affectionate carriage, they well remembering what had been formerly declared in his maj.'s name to both houses, his maj.'s gracious promises and expressions then, and at this time, with the pressing and urgent occasions which so much imported the honour of his majesty, and the good of his kingdom) their lordships delivered their votes in these words, 'We are of opinion, that the matter of his majesty's Supply should have precedence, and be resolved on before any other matter whatsoever. And we think fit, that there shall be a conference desired with the house of commons, to dispose them thereunto.'—Accordingly the next day, being Saturday the 25th of April, a conference was held in the Painted Chamber, by a committee of both houses; where the lord-keeper, by command of the lords, told the house of commons of his maj.'s being, the day before, in person, in the higher house; how graciously he had expressed himself in matter of Religion, Property of Goods, and Liberty of Parliament; and that he would therein graciously hear and relieve them, and give them what, in reason, could be desired; with the effect of what else had been graciously delivered unto them by his majesty, as well touching his constant zeal and affection to the Religion established in the church of England, as touching the Ship-Money.' [Next follow the proceedings in parliament, as before related, then the Declaration goes on thus:] By all the proceedings herein declared, it is evident to all men, how willing and desirous his majesty hath been, to make use of the antient and noble way of parliaments, used and instituted by his royal predecessors, for the preservation and honour of this famous monarchy: and that, on his maj.'s part, nothing was wanting, that could be expected from a king, whereby this parliament might have had a happy conclusion; for the comfort and content of his maj.'s subjects, and for the good and safety of this kingdom. On the contrary it is apparent, how those of the house of commons whose sinister and malicious courses enforced his maj. to dissolve this parliament, have vitiated and abused that antient and noble way of parliament; perverting the same to their own unworthy ends, and forgetting the true use and institution of parliaments.—For whereas these meetings and assemblies of his majesty with the peers and commons of this realm, were, in their first original, and in the practice of all succeeding ages, ordained and held as pledges and testimonies of affection between the king and his people; the king, for his part, graciously hearing and redressing such grievances as his people, in humble and dutiful manner, should represent unto him; and the subjects, on their part, as testimonies of their duty, supplying his maj. upon all extraordinary occasions, for support of his honour and sovereignty, and for preserving the kingdom in glory and safety: those ill-affected members of the house of commons, instead of an humble and dutiful way of presenting their grievances to his majesty, have taken upon them to be the guides and directors in all matters that concern his majesty's government, both temporal and ecclesiastical: and, as if kings were bound to give an account of their regal actions, and of their manner of government, to their subjects assembled in parliament, they have, in a very audacious and insolent way, entered into examination and censuring of the present government; traduced his majesty's administration of justice, and, as much as in them lay, rendered odious to the rest of his maj.'s subjects, not only the officers and ministers of state, but even his maj.'s government itself; which hath been so just and gracious, that never did this, or any other nation, enjoy more blessings and happiness, than hath been, by all his maj.'s subjects, enjoyed ever since his majesty's access to the crown; nor did this kingdom ever so flourish in trade and commerce, as at this present, or partake of more peace and plenty in all kinds whatsoever. And whereas, the ordinary Revenues of the crown not sufficing to defray extraordinary charges, it hath ever been the usage, in all parliaments, to aid and assist the kings of this Realm with free and fitting Supply, towards the maintenance of their war, and for making good their royal undertakings; whereby the kingdom, intrusted to their protection, might be held up in splendor and greatness: these ill-affected persons of the house of commons have been so far from treading in the steps of their ancestors, by their dutiful expressions in this kind, that, contrarily, they have introduced a way of bargaining and contracting with the king; as if nothing ought to be given him by them, but what he should buy and purchase of them; either by quitting somewhat of his royal prerogative, or by diminishing and lessening his revenues; which courses of theirs, how repugnant, they are to the duty of subjects; how unfit for his maj. in honour, to permit and suffer; and what hazard and dishonour they subject this kingdom to; all men may easily judge, that will but equally and impartially weigh them. His maj. hath been, by this means, reduced to such straits and extremities, that, were not his care of the public good and safety far greater than theirs, the common men, as much as in them lies, would quickly bring ruin and confusion to the state, and render contemptible this glorious monarchy. But this frowardness and undutiful behaviour of theirs cannot lessen his maj.'s care of preserving the kingdoms intrusted to his protection and government; nor his gracious and tender affection to his people, for whose good and comfort his maj. by God's gracious assistance, will so provide, that all his loving subjects may still enjoy the happiness of living under the blessed shade and protection of his royal sceptre.—In the mean time, to the end all his maj.'s loving subjects may know, how graciously his maj. is inclined to hear and redress all the just grievances of his people, as well out of parliament as in parliament; his maj. doth hereby further declare his royal will and pleasure, that all his loving subjects who have any just cause to present, or complain of any grievances or oppressions, may freely address themselves, by their humble petition, to his sacred majesty; who will graciously hear their complaints, and give such fitting redress therein, that all his people shall have just cause to acknowledge his grace and goodness towards them; and to be fully satisfied that no persons or assemblies can more prevail with his maj. than the piety and justice of his own royal nature, and the tender affection he doth, and shall ever bear to all his people and loving subjects."

Remarks on the Proceedings of the late Parliament.] Besides giving the king's Declaration of his Reasons for dissolving this Parliament, it will be necessary also to give the sentiments of cotemporary historians, concerning the occasional debates in the house of commons, during this session; particularly, of the last two days of it. We have, hitherto, altogether followed the authority of the Journals and Mr. Rushworth, in the foregoing account; but they not entering so deeply into these proceedings as some others have done, and particularly lord Clarendon, who was himself a member of this parliament, it cannot be amiss to give that noble author's own account of them first: and, chiefly, in his own words.—After giving an abstract of the king's and lord-keeper's speeches, at the opening, with some subsequent speeches in the house of commons made by Mr. Pym, Mr. Grimston, and others, on Grievances, particularly Ship-Money; and that one Peard, a bold lawyer of little note, said, It was an Abomination; he tells us, "That they were smartly taken up by Herbert, the king's solicitor; who, with all imaginable address, put them in mind, with what candour his majesty had proceeded in that and all other things, which related to the administration of justice to all his people: and that howsoever he was persuaded within himself of the justice, as well as the necessity of levying Ship-Money, he would not send out a writ for the doing thereof, till he received the affirmative advice of all the judges in England: and when the payment thereof was opposed by a gentleman, (whom he then took occasion to stroke and commend, for his great temper and moderation in that suit) the king was very well contented that all the judges of England should determine the right: That never any cause had been debated and argued more solemnly before the Judges; who, after long deliberation amongst themselves, and being attended with the Records, which had been cited on both sides, delivered each man his opinion and judgment publicly in court; and so largely, that but two Judges argued in a day. And after all this, such a Judgment with that solemnity pronounced for the king, by which he was as legally possessed of that right, as of any thing else he had: that any particular man should presume to speak against it with that bitterness, as to call it an 'Abomination,' was very offensive and unwarrantable: and desired that the gentleman, who had used the expression, might explain himself, and then withdraw." On this speech several of the members were for calling Peard to the bar; and he hardly got off without a severe reprimand. Which affair the noble historian mentions, chiefly to shew the temper and sobriety of the house, and that their dissolution, afterwards, was the more to be lamented.

Our author next proceeds to relate the several transactions, in the succeeding days, pretty much as they are given in Rushworth and the Journals, till he comes to the debates on the king's Message for Supply; where he mentions the particular Subsidies he wanted. On which account, he says, "Mr. Hampden, the most popular man in the house, in regard of his singly opposing Ship-Money, thought it fit time to put the question, 'Whether the house would consent to the proposition made by the king, as it was contained in the message? Which would have been sure to have found a negative from all who thought the sum too great, or were not pleased that it should be given in recompence for Ship Money. We shall give the noble author's own words for the rest; observing that, when he mentions Mr. Hyde, it is himself he speaks of; who seems to have had a great sway, and to have been well heard, in the house, at that time.

"When many called to have this question, Serjeant Glanville, the Speaker, (who sat by amongst the other members whilst the house was in a committee, and had rarely used to speak in such seasons) rose up, and, in a most pathetic speech, in which he excelled, endeavoured to persuade the house 'To comply with the king's desire, for the good of the nation, and to reconcile him to parliaments for ever; which this seasonable testimony of their affections would infallibly do.' He made it manifest to them how very inconsiderable a sum 12 Subsidies amounted to, by telling them, 'That he had computed what he was to pay for those 12 Subsidies;' and when he named the sum, he being known to be possessed of a great estate, it seemed not worth any farther deliberation. And, in the warmth of his discourse, which he plainly discerned made a wonderful impression upon the house, he let fall some sharp expressions against the imposition of Ship Money, and the judgment in the point; which he said, plainly, 'Was against law, if he understood what law was,' (who was known to be very learned) which expression, how necessary and artificial soever to reconcile the affections of the house to the matter in question, very much irreconciled him at court, and to those on whom he had the greatest dependence."—There was scarce ever a speech that more gathered up and united the inclinations of a popular counsel to the Speaker: and, if the question had been presently put, it was believed the number of the dissenters would not have appeared great: but, after a short silence, some men, who wished well to the main, expressed a dislike of the way: so that other men recovered new courage, and called again, with some earnestness, 'That the question, formerly proposed by Mr. Hambden, should be put;' which seemed to meet with a concurrence. Mr. Hyde then stood up, and desired, 'That question might not be put;' and said, 'It was a captious question, to which only one sort of men could clearly give their vote; which were they who were for a rejection of the king's Proposition, and no more resuming the debate upon that subject: but that they, who desired to give the king a Supply, as he believed most did, though not in such a proportion, nor, it may be, in that manner, could receive no satisfaction by that question; and therefore he proposed, to the end that every man might frankly give his Yes, or his No, that the question might be put, only, upon the giving the king a Supply; which being carried in the affirmative, another question might be upon the proportion and the manner; and if the first were carried in the negative, it would produce the same effect as the other question, proposed by Mr. Hambden, would do.' This method was received by some with great approbation, but opposed by others with more than ordinary passion, and diverted by other propositions; which, being seconded, took much time without pointing to any conclusion. In the end Serjeant Glanville said, 'That there had been a question proposed by his countryman that agreed very well with his sense; and moved, 'That the gentleman might be called upon to propose it again.' Mr. Hyde stated the case again as he had done, answered somewhat that had been said against it, and moved, 'That question might be put.' Whereupon for a long time there was nothing said, but a confused clamour and call, 'Mr. Hambden's Question,' 'Mr. Hyde's Question;' the call appearing much stronger for the last than the former; and it was generally believed that the question had been put and carried in the affirmative, though it was positively opposed by Herbert, the solicitor-general, for what reason no man could imagine, if Sir Henry Vane, the secretary, had not stood up and said, 'That as it had been always his custom to deal plainly and clearly with that house in all things, so he could not but now assure them, That the putting and carrying that question could be of no use; for that he was most sure, and had authority to tell them so, That if they should pass a vote for the giving the king a Supply, if it were not in the proportion and manner proposed in his majesty's Message, it would not be accepted by him; and therefore desired that question might be laid aside.' Which being again urged by the solicitor-general, upon the authority of what the other had declared; and the other privy-counsellors saying nothing, though they were much displeased with the secretary's averment, the business was no more pressed: but it being near five o'clock in the afternoon, and every body weary, it was willingly consented to, that the house should be adjourned till the next morning."

"Both sir Henry Vane, and the solicitor-general, whose opinion was of more weight with the king than the others, had made a worse representation of the humour and affection of the house than it deserved; and undertook to know, that if they came together again, they would pass such a vote against Ship-Money as would blast that revenue and other branches of the receipt: which others believed they would not have had the confidence to have attempted; and very few, that they would have had the credit to have compassed. What followed in the next parliament, within less than a year, made it believed, That sir Henry Vane acted that part maliciously, and to bring all into confusion; he being known to have an implacable hatred against the earl of Strafford, lieutenant of Ireland, whose destruction was then upon the anvil. But what transported the solicitor, who had none of the ends of the other, could not be imagined, except it was his pride and peevishness, when he found he was like to be of less authority there than he looked to be; and yet he was heard with great attention, though his parts were most prevalent in puzzling and perplexing that discourse he meant to cross. Let their motives be what they would, they two, and they only, wrought so far with the king, that without so much deliberation as the affair was worthy of, his majesty, the next morning, which was on the 5th of May, near a month after their first meeting, sent for the Speaker to attend him, and took care that he should go directly to the house of peers, upon some apprehension, that if he had gone to the house of commons, that house would have entered upon some ungrateful discourse, which they were not inclined to do: and then sending for that house to attend him, the keeper, by his majesty's command, dissolved the parliament."

"There could not a greater damp have seized upon the spirits of the whole nation, than this Dissolution caused; and men had much of the misery in view, which shortly after fell out. It could never be hoped that more sober and dispassionate men would ever meet together in that place, or fewer who brought ill purposes with them; nor could any man imagine what offence they had given, which put the king upon that resolution. But it was observed, that, in the countenances of those who had most opposed all that was desired by his majesty, there was a marvellous serenity; nor could they conceal the joy of their hearts: for they knew enough of what was to come, to conclude that the king would be shortly compelled to call another parliament; and they were as sure, that so many, so unbiassed men, would never be elected again.—Within an hour after the dissolving, Mr. Hyde met Mr. Saint-John, who had naturally a great cloud in his face, and very seldom was known to smile; but then had a most cheerful aspect; and, seeing the other melancholic, as in truth he was from his heart, asked him, 'What troubled him?' Who answered, 'That the same that troubled him, he believed troubled most good men; that in such a time of confusion, so wise a parliament, which alone could have found remedy for it, was so unseasonably dismissed.' The other answered with a little warmth, 'That all was well; and that it must be worse before it could be better; and that this parliament could never have done what was necessary to be done:' as indeed it would not, what he and his friends thought necessary."

Lord Clarendon farther tells us, "That when the king had reflected on what he had done, and what was like to fall out; and was better informed of the temper and duty of this house of commons; and that they had voted a Supply, if sir Hen. Vane had not hindered it, by so positive an assertion, That the king would refuse it; he was heartily sorry for what he had done; and declared, with great anger, 'That he had never given him such authority; and that he well knew the giving him any Supply would have been welcome to him; because the reputation of his subjects assisting him, in that conjuncture, was all that he looked for and considered.' That the king consulted the same day, whether he might, by his Proclamation, recall them to meet together again; but finding that impossible, he went upon trying all expedients for raising money without them: in which he had such wonderful success, that, in less than 3 weeks, by the voluntary Loan of the particular lords of the council, and of other private gentlemen about the city, there was no less than 300,000*l.* paid into the exchequer for his majesty's use. A sum, adds our author, that sufficiently manifests the plenty of that time; and greater than most princes in Europe could have commanded at so short warning; and was an unanswerable argument, that the hearts of all his subjects were not then alienated from their duty to their king, or a just jealousy for his honour."

Principal Proceedings after the Dissolution] Before we enter upon the proceedings of the next parliament, it is necessary to be a little particular in the recital of those affairs, which happened after the Dissolution of the last. The day after it was dissolved, warrants were issued out from the council for searching the studs and pockets of the lord Brooke, on a great suspicion that he held a correspondence with the Scots. Sir Henry Bellasis and sir John Hotham, two Yorkshire barons were also convened before the council; who, refusing to answer to questions, about matters done in parliament, were committed to the Fleet. Mr. Crew, another member also, and chairman to the committee on Religion, for refusing to deliver the Petitions and Complaints, made to the committee, on those matters, was sent to the Tower.

Though the parliament was dissolved, yet the king ordered the Convocation to sit still; which occasioned a new dispute, in pamphlets; some arguing that both those assemblies were to end together: others to the contrary; for that the writ, for calling the Convocation, run for their continuance durante bene placito regis. And the sages of the law being consulted, they gave it, 'That the Convocation, called by the king's writ, was not to dissolve but by the king's writ, notwithstanding the dissolution of the parliament.' Some synodical affairs were done here; as the Imposition of a new Oath, to support Episcopacy, and the present Church-Government; which they did, in opposition to the lay-elders in Scotland, who had framed a Covenant for the destruction of it. But this, and some other matters, must have been done in fear and trembling; for the king was forced to set a guard about Westminster-abbey, during their whole sitting. The abb. of Canterbury's palace was assaulted in the night, by above 500 apprentices; who, if he had not

Whilst these tumults were in agitation, the king lost no time in raising another army, in order to suppress the invasion of the Scots; but either by cowardice or treachery, or both, they were beat at Newburn, on the banks of the river Tyne; which the Scots passing, made themselves masters of Newcastle and Durham, and all the country round them.—This last overthrow did not much diminish the king's forces, and he had still a very good army on foot; yet his affairs were very perplexed and intricate. Money was wanting; and, since the last parliament had resolved to grant none till the public Grievances were redressed, in consequence of which the king had been persuaded to dissolve them; his majesty was now again reduced to borrow money of the Spanish merchants, and others concerned in the bullion, then in the Tower, to the amount of 40,000*l*. But this being soon dissipated, his army only acting on the defensive, the king was now driven to the utmost distress.

Petitions to the King to call another Parliament.] This unhappy situation of affairs produced two Petitions to the King, (the one from several Peers, and the other from the city of London) complaining of Grievances and recommending the Calling of a Parliament as the only way to redress them. The Petitions were presented to the king at York, and were in these words:

"To the King's Most Excellent Majesty: The humble Petition of your majesty's most loyal and obedient subjects, whose names are here under-written, in behalf of themselves and divers others:

"Most gracious sovereign; The sense of that duty and service, which we owe unto your sacred majesty, and our earnest affection to the good and welfare of this your realm of England, have moved us, in all humility, to beseech your royal maj. to give us leave to offer unto your most princely wisdom, the apprehension which we, and other your faithful subjects, have conceived of the great distempers and dangers now threatening the church, the state, and your royal person, and the fittest means by which they may be prevented.—The Evils and Dangers whereof your maj. may be pleased to take notice, are these; 1. That your sacred maj. is exposed to hazard and danger, in the present expedition against the Scots army; and, by the occasion of the war, your revenue is much wasted, your subjects burthened with tax and conduct money, billeting of soldiers, and other military charges; and divers rapines and disorders committed in several parts in this your realm, by the soldiers raised for that service; and your whole kingdom become full of fear and discontent. 2. The sundry Innovations, in matters of Religion; the oath and annous lately imposed upon the clergy, and other your majesty's subjects. 3. The great increase of Popery, and employing of popish recusants, and others ill-affected to the religion by law established, in places of power and trust; and especially commanding of men and arms, both in the field and divers counties in this realm; whereas, by the laws, they are not permitted to have arms even in their own houses. 4. The great mischief which may fall upon this kingdom, if the intentions, which have been credibly reported, of bringing in of Irish forces shall take effect. 5. The urging of Ship-Money, and prosecution of some sheriffs in the Star-Chamber for not levying of it. 6. The heavy charges of Merchandize, to the discouragement of trade; the multitude of Monopolies, and other patents, whereby the commodities and manufactures of the kingdom are much burthened, to the great and universal grievance of your people. 7. The great grief of your subjects, by the Intermission of Parliaments, in the late and former dissolving of such as have been called; with the hopeful effects which, otherwise, they might have procured.—For a Remedy whereof, and prevention of the danger that may ensue to your royal person, and to the whole state, we do, in all humility and faithfulness, beseech your most excellent maj. that you would be pleased to summon a parliament within some short and convenient time; whereby the cause of these, and other great Grievances, which your poor petitioners now lye under, may be taken away; and the authors and counsellors of them, may be there brought to such legal trial and condign punishment, as the nature of the offence does require; and that the present war may be composed, by your majesty's wisdom, without bloodshed, in such manner as may conduce to the honour and safety of your majesty's person, the content of your people, and continuance of both your kingdoms against the common enemy of the reformed religion. (Signed) BEDFORD, ESSEX, HERTFORD, WARWICK, BRISTOL, MULGRAVE, SAY and SEAL, HOWARD, BOLINGBROOKE, MANDEVILLE, BROOKE, PAGET."

"To the King's most Excellent Majesty: The humble Petition of your majesty's subjects the Citizens of London:

"Most gracious sovereign; Being moved with the duty and obedience, which, by the laws, your petitioners owe unto your sacred majesty, they humbly present unto your princely and pious wisdom, the several pressing Grievances following, viz. 1. The pressing and unusual Impositions upon Merchandize imported and exported, and the urging and levying of Ship-Money; notwithstanding both which, merchants ships and goods have been taken and destroyed, both by Turkish, and other pirates. 2. The multitude of Monopolies, Patents, and Warrants; whereby trade in this city, and other parts of the kingdom, is much decayed. 3. The sundry Innovations in matters of Religion. 4. The Oath and Canons lately enjoined by the Convocation; whereby your petitioners are in danger to be deprived of their ministers. 5. The great concourse of papists, and their inhabitations in London, and the suburbs, whereby they have more means and opportunity of plotting, and executing their designs, against the religion established. 6. The seldom calling, and sudden dissolutions of Parliaments, without redress of your subjects grievances. 7. The Imprisonment of divers citizens for nonpayment of Ship-Money, and Impositions; and the prosecution of many others in the Star-chamber, for not conforming themselves to commissioners in patents of Monopolies; whereby trade is restrained. 8. The great danger your sacred person is exposed unto in the present war, and the various fears that seized upon your petitioners, and their families, by reason thereof; which grievances and fears have occasioned so great a stop and distraction in trade, that your petitioners can neither buy, sell, receive, or pay as formerly; and tends to the utter ruin of the inhabitants of the city, the decay of navigation and cloathing, and the manufactures of this kingdom.—Your humble petitioners conceiving, that the said Grievances are contrary to the laws of this kingdom; and finding, by experience, that they are not redressed by the ordinary course of justice, do therefore, most humbly, beseech your most sacred maj. to cause a Parliament to be summoned with all convenient speed; whereby they may be relieved in the premises. And your petitioners and loyal subjects shall ever pray, &c.”

These Petitions, we are told, were delivered to the king at York; but, before he received them, his majesty had issued out writs for summoning a great council of the peers to convene in that city, on the 24th of September following; therefore, for Answer to the Petition of the Lords, his majesty commanded them to offer what they had to propose for his honour and the safety of the kingdom, in that council.

Petition from the Scots Commissioners, to the same Purpose.] About this time also the Scots sent a Petition from their army to the king, but directed to the earl of Lanerk, secretary of state for Scotland; which was delivered to his majesty and answered by him, in the form following:

“To the king's most excellent majesty:
The humble Petition of your Commissioners of the late Parliament, and others of your majesty's most Loyal Subjects of the kingdom of Scotland:

“Humbly sheweth; That whereas through many sufferings in this time past, extreme necessity hath constrained us, for our reliefs, and obtaining our humble and just desires, to come into England; where, according to our intentions formerly delivered, we have, in all our convoy, lived upon our own means, victuals, and goods brought along with us; and neither troubling the peace of the kingdom of England, nor hurting any of your majesty's subjects, of whatsoever quality in their persons or goods; having carried ourselves in a most peaceable manner, till we were pressed, by strength of arms, to put such forces out of the way, as did without our deservings, and (as some of them at the point of death have confessed) against their own consciences, opposed our peaceable passage at Newburn upon Tyne; and have brought their own blood upon their own heads, against our purposes and desires, expressed by letters sent to them at Newcastle: for preventing of the like, or greater inconveniences, and that, without further opposition, we may come to your majesty's presence, for obtaining, from your majesty's justice and goodness, full satisfaction to our just demands; we, your majesty's most humble and loyal subjects, do persist in that most humble and submissive way of petitioning which we have kept from the beginning; and from the which, no provocation of your majesty's enemies and ours, no adversity we have hitherto sustained, no prosperous success that can befall us, shall be able to divert our minds; most humbly entreating, that your maj. would, in the depth of your royal wisdom, consider at least our pressing Grievances; provide for the repair of our wrongs and losses; and, with the advice of the states of the kingdom of England, convened by parliament, settle a firm and durable peace against all invasions by sea and land; that we may, with cheerfulness of heart, pay unto your maj. as our native king, all duty and obedience, that can be expected from loyal subjects, against the many and great evils which at this time threaten both kingdoms; whereat all your majesty's good, loyal, and loving subjects tremble to think, and which we unanimously beseech God Almighty to avert, that your majesty's throne may be established, in the midst of us, in religion and righteousness.—Your majesty's Answer we humbly desire, and earnestly wait for.”

According to the prayer of this Petition, the king sent an Answer as follows:

“At the Court of York, Sept. 5. 1640. His majesty hath seen and considered this within-written Petition, and is graciously pleased to return this Answer by me, That he finds it in such general terms, that till you express the particulars of your desires, his maj. can give no direct Answer thereunto: wherefore his maj. requireth, that you would set down the particulars of your demands with expedition: he having been always ready to redress the Grievances of his people. And for the more mature deliberation of the weighty affairs, his maj. hath already given out summons for the meeting of the peers of this kingdom in the city of York, the 24th day of this month, that, with the advice of the peers, you may receive such Answer to your Petition, as shall most tend to his honour, and the peace and welfare of his dominions. And, in the mean time, if peace be what you so much desire, as you pretend, he expects, and by this his maj. commands, That you advance no further with your army into these parts; which is the only means that is left, for the present, to preserve peace between the two nations, and to bring these unhappy differences into a reformation; which none is more desirous of than his most sacred majesty.

LANERK.

A Meeting of the Peers at York.] Whilst things were in this untoward situation the great Assembly of Peers met at York. Lord Clarendon writes, "That this assembly of the peers was a new invention, not before heard of; or so old, that it had not been practised, in England, for some hundreds of years. And that the grounds and intentions of this particular summons was never known:" but adds, "That it probably was the result of troubled and afflicted thoughts, since no other way at that time occurred."—The king's whole army, consisting of 12,000 foot and 3000 horse, was then in York, or were quartered in the villages round it. Several more petitions, from different counties, were now also presented to the king; all tending to advise him to call a parliament, as the only way to compose the difference between the two kingdoms.

The King's Speech to the Peers.] The time appointed by the king's writ for the grand Assembly of the Peers being come, a great number of them met at York; and, on the 24th of Sept. this Convention was opened in the Hall of the Deanery House, within the Close of the Cathedral; which was richly ornamented with tapestry, &c. for that purpose.* The king's chair of state was placed upon the half-pace of the stairs, at the upper end of the Hall; from whence his maj. delivered himself in the following speech to them:

"My lords; Upon sudden invasions, where the dangers are near and instant, it hath been the custom of my predecessors to assemble the Great Council of the peers, and, by their advice and assistance, to give a timely remedy to such evils, which could not admit a delay so long, as must of necessity be allowed for the assembling of the parliament. This being our condition at this time, and an army of rebels lodged within this kingdom, I thought it most fit to conform myself to the practice of my predecessors in like cases: that, with your advice and assistance, we might justly proceed to the chastisement of these insolencies, and securing of my good subjects.—In the first place, I must let you know, that I desire nothing more, than to be rightly understood of my people. And, to that end, I have of myself resolved to call a parliament; having already given order to my lord keeper to issue the writs instantly, so that the parliament may be assembled by the 3rd of November next: whither if my subjects bring those good affections which become them towards me, I shall not fail on my part to make it a happy meeting. In the mean time, there are two points wherein I shall desire your advice, which indeed were the chief cause of your meeting. First, What Answer to give to the Petition of the Rebels, and in what manner to treat with them. Of which, that you may give a sure judgment, I have ordered that your lordships shall be clearly and truly informed of the state of the whole business, and upon what reasons the advices that my privy-council unanimously gave me, were grounded. The second is, How my army shall be kept on foot and maintained, until the Supplies of a parliament may be had. For so long as the Scots army remains in England, I think no man will counsel me to disband mine: for that would be an unspeakable loss to all this part of the kingdom, by subjecting them to the greedy appetite of the rebels, besides the unspeakable dishonour that would thereby fall upon this nation."

A Treaty with the Scots at Ripon.] Lord Clarendon tells us, That when the Scots Petition came to be read, which was one of the first things the king ordered, it necessarily begat a Treaty. The Scots had always given the king as good and as submissive words as can be imagined. And this Petition, full of as much submission as a victory itself could suggest, as was urged by some lords, produced a treaty; and 16 of the English peers, then assembled, were appointed for it. These commissioners, to give no umbrage to the Scots, were chosen out of those lords, who were well affected to a Parliament, and no bitter enemies to the Covenanters. York was the place mentioned by the king for the Treaty, which the Scots would not consent to; giving for reason, That it was not a secure place for them, since their great enemy, the earl of Strafford, commanded there in chief, who had proclaimed them traitors in Ireland, before the king had done it in England, threatening to destroy their memory; against whom they had high matters of complaint: so Ripon was nominated by them, and agreed to by the king.—The treaty being opened, the great council of the peers continued still to meet; and took into consideration the king's second Proposition, concerning the keeping on foot and paying his forces; and being acquainted by the lord Strafford, that it would take 200,000*l.* to support them, it was resolved, That this sum should be borrowed of the city of London, and a letter from the lords was prepared and sent accordingly.

From the 24th of Sept. to the 18th of Oct. following, did the king and his great Council of Peers continue to sit as usual; the commissioners, from time to time, repairing to York, to acquaint them how they proceeded: but it all ended in nothing; for, as Whitlocke remarks, "Too many not only favouring, but joining with, and assisting the proceedings of the Scots Covenanters, the king was persuaded to remove the Treaty to London, and subject the country still to pay a contribution of 850*l.* a day, till all was concluded on. At which many wondered, and some inveighed against this Treaty, wishing the king would have put it rather to the issue of a battle; than to have given such terms to his subjects in rebellion; and of this judgment was Strafford and the episcopal party. But the other party cried up this treaty, as 'just, honourable, and pious, to prevent effusion of blood, and to settle peace:' and the king saw plainly, that both divers officers of his army, and even the private soldiers generally (which was a most remarkable inclination) had no mind to fight against the Scots; which chiefly caused the king to conclude this Treaty."

A New Parliament called.] Whilst this Assembly sat at York, the king had determined to summon a Parliament; and writs were accordingly issued out for one to meet on the 3d of November.—The Treaty at Upton being adjourned, as beforementioned, the king and his lords came to London, in order to meet that Parliament, which will ever be remarkable in English History: a parliament, which many, before that time, thought would never have had a beginning; and afterwards, that it would never have had an end.

Nov. 3, 1640, the parliament met at Westminster, pursuant to the king's writs for that purpose. Before we begin our account of their proceedings, it may not be improper to give a List of the Members of both Houses:

A STATE of the PEERAGE at this time, distinguishing how much the number of Peers was increased since the Accession of the Stuart Family to the Crown. Extracted from the Lords Journals, Dugdale's Baronage, and other Authorities.

LIST OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.*

The List of the House of Commons, as given in all the Collections we have yet met with, appears to have been taken about two years after the opening of the session: the names of many members, originally returned, and who highly distinguished themselves in the subsequent debates, being wholly omitted. For this reason we have endeavoured to extract from the Journals all the several Alterations in that house, whether by advancement to peerage, undue elections, death, or expulsions, from the first meeting of the parliament, Nov. 3, 1640, to the forcible dissolution thereof by Cromwell, in 1653.—During the two first years of this parliament, writs were duly issued for supplying of vacancies: but from that time we meet with very few instances of any till after the Battle of Naseby, in June 1645. Within 12 months next following that event nearly 150 writs were issued, and these chiefly to supply the places of such members as had been disabled in 1642 and 3, for taking part with the king. Where we find the day on which any member was disabled from sitting in parliament, and the cause thereof, particularized in the Journals, they are so expressed; and the dates of their respective decease rest upon the authority of the printed Lists and Diaries of the times: but where the particular day of such decease or disablement is not mentioned, such member is found to be deceased or disabled only by the writ for electing his successor, which in most cases did not issue: till some years after such vacancy.—We have also added some Distinctions to point out what party the several members adhered to after the breaking out of the war. By these the reader will see at one view who were the men that were for redressing of Grievances and restraining the Prerogative of the Crown within its just bounds; and who those were that, under that pretence, subverted the constitution, to advance their own ambitious purposes.—These Distinctions are grounded upon the following Authorities:

c. Those who subscribed the Solemn League and Covenant. From the Commons Journals.

o. Such as left the Parliament, and joined the King at Oxford, where they formed the Convention or Anti-Parliament. From their Proceedings, printed there by Leonard Litchfield, with the King's authority.

s. The Members imprisoned or secluded, as well as those that were seized on by the Army, Dec. 6, 1648, after having voted, the day before, 'That the King's Answers to the Propositions of both Houses were a ground for Peace.' From a pamphlet, intitled, 'A Vindication of the imprisoned and secluded Members, printed by M. Spark, and licensed by John Langley, Jan. 20, 1648.'

* Such of the Commissioners appointed for the Trial of the King as did not act at all. From the Ordinance of Parliament.

|| Commissioners who occasionally attended, but did not sign the Warrant for beheading him. From Phelps's Journal of the High Court of Justice.

† Such as signed that Warrant. From the Original.

* Taken from the Parliamentary or Constitutional History of England, vol. ix. p. 13.

The Members marked thus † are those who were elected in the places of those first returned: but as there are few instances in which we could exactly ascertain the time when these last were elected we have been obliged to content ourselves with extracting, from the Commons Journals, the days when the respective writs were ordered to be issued for such elections. These, compared with the dates of the decess, expulsion, or disablement, will shew, in most instances, how long time each county, city or borough, were deprived of their representatives; and will also help to account for the thinness of the house between the years 1642 and 1645. And as we find several instances of writs being twice, and even thrice, issued for supplying the place of the same member, we suppose this to have been owing to the want of due obedience being given to the first writ by the proper officer, occasioned by the confusion of the times.—Where writs were issued to supply the places of members disabled, and others were chosen in their places, after the breaking out of the War; though the matter amounted in fact to an expulsion, yet, as the Commons Journals, in these instances, make use of the term ‘disabled,’ we have therefore conformed ourselves to the style and language of those authorities. To prevent repetition, the letters w. i. stand for writs issued.

The King's Speech on opening the Parliament. The king being come to the house of lords, and seated on the throne, his majesty signified his reasons for calling this parliament, in the following Speech :

"My Lords; The knowledge I had of the desire of my Scots subjects, was the cause of my calling the last assembly of parliament; wherein, had I been believed, I sincerely think that things had not fallen out as now we see. But it is no wonder that men are so slow to believe, that so great a sedition should be raised on so little ground. But now, my lords and gentlemen, the honour and safety of this kingdom lying so near at stake, I am resolved to put myself freely and clearly on the love and affection of my English subjects; as those of my lords that waited on me at York may very well remember I there declared.—Therefore, my lords, I shall not mention mine own interest, or that support I might justly expect from you, till the common safety be secured; though I must tell you, I am not ashamed to say, those charges I have been at, have been merely for the security and good of this kingdom, though the success hath not been answerable to my desires. Therefore I shall only desire you to consider the best way, both for the safety and security of this kingdom; wherein there are two parts chiefly considerable, first, the chasing out of rebels; and secondly, that other in supplying your just Grievances; wherein I promise you to concur so heartily and clearly with you, that all the world may see my intentions have ever been, and shall be, to make this a glorious and flourishing kingdom. There are only two things that I shall mention to you; the one is to tell you, that the loan of money which I had lately from the city of London, (wherein the lords that waited on me at York assisted me) will only maintain my army for two months, from the beginning of that time it was granted. Now, my lords and gentlemen, I leave it to your consideration, what dishonour and mischief it might be, if, for want of money, my army be disbanded, before the rebels be put out of this kingdom. Secondly, the securing against the calamities the Northern people endure at this time, and so long as the treaty is on foot. And in this, I say, not only they, but all this kingdom will suffer the harm; therefore I leave this also to your consideration. For the ordering of these great affairs, whereof you are to treat at this time, I am so confident of your love to me, and that your care is for the honour and safety of the kingdom, that I shall freely and willingly leave it to you where to begin: only this, that you may the better know the state of all the affairs, I have commanded my lord keeper to give you a short and free account of those things that have happened in this interim; with this protestation, that if this account be not satisfactory, as it ought to be, I shall, whensoever you desire, give you a full and perfect account of every particular. One thing more I desire of you, as one of the greatest means to make this a happy parliament, that you, on your parts, as I, on mine, lay aside all suspicion one of another; for, as I promised my lords at York, it shall not be my fault; if this be not a happy and good parliament."

"My lords, and you the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons;—You have been summoned by his maj.'s gracious writ, under the great seal of England, and you are here this day assembled for the holding of a parliament. The writ tells you, 'Tis to treat and consult of the high, great, and weighty affairs that concern the state and safety of the kingdom.' It tells you true; for, since the conquest, never was there a time that did more require, and pray for the best advice and affection of the English people. It is ill viewing of objects, by viewing them in a multiplying glass; and it is almost as mischievous in the species of such a broken glass, which represents but to the half. The only and the perfect way is to look in a true mirror. I will not take upon me to be a good looker in it: I will only hold it to you to make use of it.—The kingdom of England is this multiplying glass; you may there see a state which hath flourished for divers hundred years, famous in time of peace and war, glorious at home, and ever considerable abroad; a nation to whom never yet any conqueror gave new laws, nor abolished the old; nor would this nation ever suffer a conqueror to meddle with their laws, no not the Romans; who yet, when they subdued all the people, made it part of their conquest to lead their laws in triumph with them. For the Saxons,

Danes, and the Normans, if this were a time to travel in such particulars, it were an easy task to make it appear, that they never changed the old established laws of England, nor ever brought in any new; so that you have the frame and constitution of a common-wealth made glorious by antiquity. And it is with states, as with persons and families, certainly an uninterrupted pedigree doth give lustre. It is glorious in the whole frame, worth your looking upon long, and your consideration in every part.—The king is the head of the common-wealth, the fountain of justice, the life of the law; he is anima & delicia legis. Behold him in the happy times, that we have so long lived under his monarchical government.—For his excellent maj. that now is, our most gracious sovereign, you had need wipe the glass, and wipe your eyes, and then you shall truly behold him a king of exemplary piety and justice, of rare endowments and abilities of nature: and what he hath got by acquisition, depth of judgment, quickness of apprehension, unparalleled moderation in great councils and great affairs, such as you, my lords, that had the happiness to attend him at the council of peers at York, to our great joy and comfort can witness, and after-ages will remember, to his eternal honour and fame.—For his just and pious government I dare boldly say, that if any under him, as an instrument, who have had the distributing of justice to his people, have not done as they ought, the fault is their own; and they have done contrary to the royal nature and express command of our gracious sovereign, from whom I have often learned this golden rule and maxim, 'He serves me best, that serves me with honesty and integrity.'—Behold him in another part of himself, in his dearest consort, our gracious queen, the mirror of virtue; from whom, since her happy arrival, now after three lustres of years, never any subject received other than gracious and benign influence: and I dare avow, as she is nearest and dearest to our sovereign, so there is none, whose affection and endeavours (his maj. only excepted) have, or do, or can co-operate more to the happy success of this parli. and the never-to-be-equalled joy and comfort of a right understanding between the king and his people.—Behold him in his best image, our excellent young prince, and the rest of the royal and lively progeny, in whom we cannot but promise to ourselves to have our happiness perpetuated.—From the throne, turn your eyes upon the two supporters of it; on the one side, the step of honour, the nobility and clergy; on the other side, the gentry and commons.—Where was there, or is there in any part of the world, a nobility so numerous, so magnanimous, and yet with such a temper, that they neither eclipse the throne, nor overtop the people, but keep in a distance fit for the greatness of the throne?—Where was there a common-wealth so free, and the balance so equally held as here? And certainly so long as the beam is truly held, it cannot be otherwise. In right angles, if you turn the line never so little, it groweth quickly acute or obtuse; and so in states, the least deviation makes a great change: but his majesty's great wisdom and goodness, and the assistance of this honourable assembly, I do not doubt, will be a means to make us so steer between the tropicks of moderation, that there be no declension from the pole of security.—I am; by his maj.'s command, to relate to you some proceedings since the last assembly here.—You may remember, the summer preceding this last, his maj. went with an army into the north, engaged in honour so to do, by reason of the courses that were taken by divers of the subjects of Scotland, to the prejudice of monarchy, and rendering less glorious this kingdom. I know not under what pretence, but at that time they came very near England with an army, so that it was believed they would have then entered and invaded the kingdom. They did profess the contrary, neither did they want remonstrances and declarations to infuse this opinion into the hearts of his majesty's people, before it could appear by the effects, what their intentions from the beginning were. His majesty, by his goodness and wisdom, settled a peace, and made a pacification at Berwick, upon which both armies were disbanded; which pacification, and every article of it, his majesty, on his part, hath been so far from violating, that whensoever any question shall be made of it, it shall plainly and clearly appear that it was his care to see it in all things performed. On the contrary, those subjects of his, not contented with that grace which his maj. then gave them in those articles of pacification, have not only strained them beyond the bounds and limits of the intention and meaning: but they have over and above attempted, and acted divers things so prejudicial to monarchy, and contrary and repugnant to the law, and settled constitution, and usage of that kingdom, that his majesty could not in honour connive at it.—This being made known unto his maj. and to his privy council, by those who best knew the state and affairs of that kingdom, and that were most trusted and employed by his maj., his maj. by the unanimous consent of his privy council, resolved to raise an army to reduce them to a modest and just condition of true obedience and subjection, to defend this kingdom from all damage and danger, that by their means, how speciously soever they shadow their pretences, might fall upon it.—His maj. then foresaw and foretold, that though the raising of an army at this time, was to stand upon their own defence, as they professed, yet they had an intention to enter this kingdom, and to seize upon some place of importance and eminency; and his maj. in particular, named Newcastle.—Had his maj. then had means and money, as well as he had certain knowledge of their intentions, I do believe that these calamities that have fallen upon that town, and the counties adjoining, had been prevented. Perhaps the misinterpretation of his

maj.'s intentions, and the misunderstanding of his actions, and, I am afraid, the too benign interpretation of the attempts, actions, and professions of the subjects in Scotland, added some impediment to that which the most of us, I hope, have lived to repent of.—His maj. however, went in person to the North, to see his army ordered, and to take care for the safety and defence of this kingdom, as much as he possibly could. He had not long been there, but that which he foresaw and foretold fell out: for the Scots passed, with their army, the rivers Tweed and Tyne, and seized upon Newcastle; which of what importance it is, you all know; and then they forced contribution of the county of Northumberland, and the bishoprick of Durham, besides many other spoils and destructions that were committed.—His maj. well considering of what weight and importance this was, and then having neither time nor place to call this assembly of parliament, he did resolve, as had been frequently used, to summon a great council of all the peers; that, by their advice and assistance, there might be some interruption given to the calamity that was likely to spread over the whole kingdom; and commanded writs to issue out accordingly.—This was not done to prevent, but to prepare for a parliament. It was not to clash or interfere with this assembly, by acting or ordering any thing which belongeth to this high and supreme jurisdiction; but only to give their assistance for the present, to render things more fit for this great assembly.—That his maj.'s intentions were so, is clear; for before ever any petition was delivered, or ever any speech or petition for a parliament, his maj. had resolved to call one.—The lords understood it so, as will plainly appear by the proceedings of that assembly; of which, if those that were officers and ministers there, had been come to town, upon whose help I rested for my particular instructions, I should have been better able to have given you an account; and his maj. was pleased to let you know, That when there was an occasion of any particular, you may be satisfied in it.—According to his maj.'s command, on the 21th of Sept. all the peers that were summoned, except some few, did meet; where his majesty was, in the first place, pleased to declare unto us his resolution to call a parliament; and to all our joys and contents, as he hath now done it to yours and ours, declared, 'That there was nothing he did more desire than to be rightly understood of his people;' and whosoever he be that shall go about (except it I am sure he cannot) to attempt or endeavour to alter this gracious declaration and resolution of his maj.; or whosoever shall go about to poison the hearts of his good subjects, with an opinion that it cannot be so, or lessen the affection of his loving subjects, (for certainly never subjects of the world better loved their king than the English, nor ever did Englishmen better love a king than now) if, I say there be any such, may a curse and punishment fall upon them; but let the royal throne be established for ever.—His maj. was then pleased to tell us the cause for which he had called us together. In the first place, it was touching an answer to a petition that had been since his coming to York, and before his assembling the lords, sent unto him from those his subjects of Scotland, that were at Newcastle. The first thing that his maj. desired their advice in, was the answer to that petition.—The next thing his maj. conceived, and all that were there were of one opinion, with one voice and consent, That it was not fit his maj. should disband his army so long as the Scots army was on foot: and his majesty wished them to take into consideration, what way to have maintenance for his army in the mean time.—His maj. having opened the cause of calling them together, was pleased to express himself, That he would leave to the lords their freedom of debate, and himself was ready to have gone from the council; but, at the humble suit of the lords, he staid; and I am persuaded, that nothing was of that joy to them, as his majesty's presence; with such freedom of discourse did every man deliver himself, with such grace and sweetness did his maj. hear them, and such content did they take in his moderating, guiding, and directing those councils.—My lords, as holding it most necessary, took the latter of these two considerations propounded by his maj. into their thoughts, and that was the supplying and supporting his maj.'s army, till this parliament might take some course in it. His maj. and my lords did declare themselves, as before I have opened unto you, 'That they could never attempt, nor had the least thought to make, by any act or order, any thing tending to charge the subject, but that it might be left wholly to the supreme jurisdiction;' and therefore not seeing any other way, they resolved by letters to address themselves to the city of London; and with their letters they sent half a dozen of my lords, viz. my lord Privy-Seal, my lord of Clare, who was appointed to go, but his urgent occasions prevented him, visc. Cambden, lord Coventry, lord Goring, and *. And as these lords did express the joy and content they took in the king's grace, so the confidence they had of his gracious assistance was such, that they did freely offer themselves (and, as I dare say there is none but is yet ready) to enter into security with his maj. And the city gave an answer fit for the chamber of a king, and part of the money is already lent, and they will be ready, I assure myself, to supply the rest. For the other part, the first thing propounded by his maj. was touching the answer to be given to that petition, and to the demands of the subjects in Scotland; upon which occasion his maj. was pleased, by those great officers and ministers of his that knew best, and understood the laws and usages of that kingdom, to expound their demands particularly; and to make appear unto their lordships, upon every one, wherein they had exceeded the articles of pacification, which his maj. ever desired might be the square and rule of the treaty with them.—My lords took into consideration what was fit to be done; for his maj. then professed, as he did often during the time of that council, to be wholly ruled, guided, and directed by their advice: for the honour of this nation, and safety of it, he did leave it to their wisdoms and considerations, against whose advice, and without whose judgment and advice, he would do nothing.—My lords howsoever they had received this information, and explanation upon every particular of their demands, yet, in justice, they thought it was fit to hear what could be said on the other side, how the objections might be answered, and what objections might be made by them against that which seemed to be plain enough. For this purpose they were all of opinion, and his maj. was pleased to be of the same opinion, that some lords, selected and trusted by that great council, should treat with those subjects of Scotland upon all those particulars, to the end that they might see what they did clearly intend; that so a firm peace, which was most desired from us, might be had, or a just war be begun.—My lords of the great council that were appointed for that purpose, were the earls of Bedford, Hertford, Essex, Salisbury, Warwick, Bristol, Holland, and Berkshire; the barons were the lords Wharton, Paget, Kimbolton, Brook, Powlet, Howard of Escrick, Savile, and Dunsmore.—After which choice, and some general instructions proceeding from the debate and discourses in that great council, a commission under the great seal was given unto them, to enable them to treat and conclude as they, in their wisdoms and judgments, should think fit.—The place appointed for this treaty was at Ripon, where the lords commissioners wanted the happiness of that, which they and we had at York, his maj.'s presence; and that might be the occasion that more time was spent in it, than otherwise would have been: yet my lords omitted not their parts, but were desirous to look into the depth, to see the utmost extent of their demands.—But before those of Scotland could come to the main treaty, to explain themselves touching their demands, they made a preparatory demand for maintenance for their army, and did go so high as to demand 40,000*l.* a month. My lords (that were very unwilling to do any act, or make any order whatsoever, as I have opened unto you, for the sustenance, maintenance, and keeping a-foot his majesty's army, without this great assembly, which yet they all held fit should not be disbanded) were much startled at the demand of maintenance for an army which was not the king's, and which they did wish could not continue.—But my lords, as well that same they could not hear it, yet they took into consideration the miserable condition of Northumberland, Newcastle, and the Bishoprick of Durham; they took into consideration too the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland; which, if the Scots army should enter, were scarce able, at this time, to defend themselves, and it was inconvenient to bring the king's army thither.—Nay, their lordships were satisfied, that the county of York was in danger, and that not to be prevented, but by a battle, if the Scots came on with an army: and my lords were loath, where there were such odds, that a battle should be adventured. And if the county of York should be in danger, we might quickly foresee how the danger might run over the whole kingdom.—And my lords, as well those that remained at York, as those at Ripon, having received complaints from the bishop of Durham, and from Northumberland and Newcastle; and the mayor of Newcastle being imprisoned, and some of his brethren (as was represented unto them) kept without fire or candle; and having heard of divers wastes and spoils done in the country, my lords did think fit, that since the county of Northumberland, the bishoprick of Durham, and Newcastle, had already made a composition and agreement, that they would at least ratify and confirm the composition and agreement, so as there might be a cessation of arms and acts of hostility, and that they which had fled from their dwellings in those counties, might return in safety; my lords, for these reasons, thought fit, at present, to give way unto them, rather than to hazard so great enmity and affliction as would have fallen on those counties: hereupon they did conclude for 850*l.* per diem; and this to continue for two months, if the treaty before took not effect; the two months to begin from the 16th of October; then they took articles for the cessation of arms.—So now, the state and condition of things, as they were acted, I have shortly and summarily delivered to you: I dare not venture on too many particulars, lest my memory should fail; and if I have not done his maj.'s command, I beg his maj.'s Pardon. And, my lords, of what weight and importance this is to the whole kingdom, what deep consideration it requires in our affection, what unsuspected affections we had need bring with us, is easy to judge. It is his maj.'s pleasure, that you of the house of commons repair to, your own house, to chuse your Speaker, whom his maj. expects you will present to him on Thursday next, at two of the clock in the afternoon.

The Speaker's Speech.] Nov 5. The commons presented William Lenthall, of Lincoln's Inn, esq; for their Speaker; who, with the usual ceremonies, was approved of by the king, after which he made the following speech:

"Most gracious and dread sovereign, In all submissive humbleness the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons are here assembled; who, taking along with them your gracious inclination, have designed me their Speaker, according to their ancient liberties. Whereas I cannot but lament to think, how great a mist may overcast the hopes of this session; yet it is a note of favour to me, who cannot but judge myself unfit for so great an employment, and which appears so to the whole world. Many there be of deep judgment, and great experience, that might have added lustre to this action, and expedition to the work, if they had pleased to have left me in that mean condition they found me; and then might your sacred and pious intentions have had their full advancement.—But is it yet too late? May I not appeal to Caesar? Yes, I may; and, in the lowest posture of humility, I humbly beseech your sacred majesty to interpose your royal authority to command a review of the house, for there were never more than now fitted for such employments.—[Then my lord keeper, by his maj.'s direction, approval of him and the commons choice; upon which he proceeded thus:] It pleaseth not your maj. to vouchsafe a change: actions of kings are not to be by me reasoned. Therefore, being emboldened by this gracious approbation, give me leave a little, dread sovereign, to express my thoughts unto our gracious lord the king.—I see before my eyes the majesty of Great Britain, the glory of times, the history of honour, Charles I. in his forefront, placed by descent of ancient kings, settled by a long succession, and continued to us by a pious and peaceful government.—On the one side, the monument of glory, the progeny of valiant and puissant princes, the queen's most excellent majesty. On the other side, the hopes of posterity, the joy of this nation, those olive branches set around your tables, emblems of peace to posterity. Here shine those lights and lamps placed in a mount, which attend your sacred maj. as supreme head, and borrow from you the splendor of their government.—There the true state of nobility, figures of prowess and magnanimity, fitted, by the long contracted honour in their blood, for the council of princes.—In the midst of these, the reverend judges, whither both parties (as to the oracles of judgment and justice) may resort: cisterns that hold fair waters, wherein each deviation, each wrinkle is discernable; and from whence, as from the center, each crooked line ought to be levelled; the footstool of your throne is fixed there, which renders you glorious to all posterity.—Here we the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the commons house, at your royal feet, contracted from all parts of your kingdom, ensigns of obedience and humility; all these united by the law equally distributed, which cements this great body to the obedience of your sacred maj. and compels as well the hearts as the hands, to contribute for the preservation of your majesty and the common interest; dissipates the invaders of the church and commonwealth, and discovers the impostors; but, give me leave, dread sovereign, knits the crown to the sacred temples, and frees maj. from the interpretation of misdoing. Amongst these, this great council is first sovereign against the distempers of this nation.—Were they infested at sea, troubled at home, or invaded from abroad, there was the sanctuary of refuge; hither was the resort; and no other way found for a foundation of peace:—It is reported of Constantine the Great, that he accounted his subjects purse his exchequer: and so it is. Subtle inventions may pick the purse, but nothing can open it but a parliament, which lets in the eye of sovereignty upon the public maladies of the state, and vigilancy for the preservation of our ancient liberties. For this we need not search into antiquity; if we look but a little back, there we shall see our just liberties graciously confirmed by your most sacred majesty.—And is our happiness shut up in the remembrance of times past only? No; those gracious expressions lately fallen from your sacred lips, as honey from the comb, make glad the hearts of your people.—So that now we do more than promise to ourselves a large and free consideration of the ways to compose the distempers of these kingdoms, and then present them to your royal hands for perfection.—And such shall be our deportment, that as we shall labour the continuance of our liberties, so shall we carry a high regard to preserve that sovereign power, wherewith your maj. is invested for the preservation of your kingdom, and to render your sacred maj. terrible to the nations abroad, and glorious at home.—Are these the fruits we have enjoyed by parliaments? We cannot then but wonder at that horrid invention in this place projected, 'Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens;' but, the Lord be thanked, 'cui lumen ademptum est.' Can this receive a palliation? Men, fathers, and brethren, and all at one blast! No reverence to sacred bones of princes! Were we not all in a lump by them intended to be offered up to Moloch? Let us never forget this day's solemnization. But whither! It is too much boldness to presume longer upon your maj.'s grace and goodness; and therefore, for the better expedition of this service, we humbly desire. 1. That ourselves and servants may obtain freedom from arrest of their persons and goods. 2. That we may have free liberty of speech, without confinement, with a full and free debate. 3. That your maj. will vouchsafe our repair to your sacred person, upon matters of importance, according to the ancient privileges of the house. That with such sincerity we may now proceed to manifest to the world that our retirements were to reinforce a greater unity and duty; and to endeavour a sweet violence, which may compel (pardon, dread sovereign, the word 'compel') your majesty to the love of parliaments. And God will have the honour; your sacred majesty, the splendor; the kingdom, safety; and all our votes shall pass. That your sacred majesty may long, long, long reign over us, and let all the people say, Amen."

'Non mihi tacuisse nocet, nocet esse locutum.'

The King's Speech to the Lords.] The commons being withdrawn, the king again spoke to the lords, in particular, in these words:

"My lords, I do expect that you will heartily make relation to the house of commons, of those great affairs, for which I have called you hither at this time; and also the trust I have reposed in them, and how freely I put myself on their love and affections; and that you may know the better how to do so, I shall explain myself as concerning one thing I spoke the last day: I told you the rebels must be put out of this kingdom: it is true I must needs call them so, so long as they have an army that doth invade us; and although I am under treaty with them, and under my great seal do call them my subjects; for so they are too. But the state of my affairs in short is this; it is true I did expect, when I called my lords and great ones at York, to have given a gracious answer to all their Grievances; for I was in good hopes, by their wisdoms and assistances, to have made an end of that business; but I must tell you you, that my subjects of Scotland did so delay them, that it was not possible to end there.—Therefore I can no ways blame my lords that were at Ripon, that the treaty was not ended; but must thank them for their pains and industry; and certainly had they as much power as affections, I should, by that time, have brought these distempers to a happy period: so that now the treaty is transported from Ripon to London; where I shall conclude nothing without your knowledge, and, I doubt not, but by your approbation; for I do not desire to have this great work done in a corner. I shall open all the steps of this misunderstanding, and causes of this great difference between me and my subjects of Scotland; and I doubt not, by your assistance, to make them know their duty, and to make them return, whether they will or no.”

In order to set the proceedings of both houses in a clearer light, we shall give the preference to those of the commons; since all or most of the material articles had their origin in that house; subjoining, from day to day, the proceedings of the lords, as they concurred with the others, or started any new matter of themselves.

The Commons appoint several Committees.]

Nov. 6. The commons resolved to move the lords to join with them in a petition to his maj. to appoint a day for a Fast. Several committees were appointed, viz. for privileges, for elections, for religion, for grievances, for courts of justice, for trade, and for Irish affairs. This last was debated, whether it should be referred to a committee of the whole house, or a select one: on a division, it was carried for the former, 165 against 152.

Nov. 7. A resolution passed, “That Mr. Henry Burton, Dr. John Bastwick and Mr. Prynne shall be sent for forthwith, by warrant of the house; and withal to certify by whose warrant and authority they were detained.” This affair will be taken notice of in the sequel.

Speeches relating to Grievances.] Grievances being the first thing complained of in the house, in petitions from several counties, and supported by the members who presented them, the first speech we meet with, made in this parliament, after the king's and other ceremonial ones were ended, was by Mr. Pym; wherein he seems to have summed up all the national Grievances together. It is as follows:—

Nov. 7. Mr. Pym stood up, and said:—
 ‘To redress Grievances will not hinder but further the king's service. To take away the weights, as much advantages motion, as to add wings. His method was, 1. Several kinds of Grievances: 2. Hurtful to the king as to the people. 3. And the Remedy equally good to both of them. That the king can do no wrong; the law casts it upon the ministers. The influence of Heaven conveyeth vigour into the sublunary creatures; but the malignity of all epidemical diseases proceeds from the ill-affected qualities of the earth or air.—His order was to mention three Grievances, 1. Against the Privilege of Parliament. 2. Prejudice of Religion. 3. Liberty of the Subjects. For the 1st: the members are to be free from arrests; to have liberty of speech; a legislative, judiciary, and consiliary power being to the body public, as the faculties of the soul to a man. These privileges have been broken: 1. In restraining the members from speaking. 2. In forbidding the Speaker to put a question: both of these practised in the last parliament. 3. By imprisoning divers members for matters done in parliament. 4. By proceedings against them therefore in the inferior courts. 5. Enjoining their good behaviour, and continuance in prison even to death. 6. In abrupt dissolution of parliaments, the great grievance; like the execution of a man, without being heard. It receives a being by the summons, and a civil death by dissolution; not only thereby to die, but to be made intestables, not to make their wills.—The 2nd, Incouragement to Popery: 1. By suspension of all laws against them that there can be no security from Papists, but in their disability; their principles being incompatible with any other religion; laws will not restrain them, oaths will not, the Pope dispenseth with both; and his command acts them against the realm in spirituals, and in temporals ad spiritualia. Hen 3. and Henry 4. of France were no protestants, yet were murdered because they tolerated reformation. 2. Their places of trust and honour in the commonwealth. 3. Their free resort to London and to the court, to communicate their counsels and designs, diving into the secrets of state. 4. That as they have a congregation of cardinals at Rome, for advancing the Pope's authority in England, so have they a nuncio here to the execution thereof.—Innovations of Religion introduced: 1. Maintenance of Popish tenets in books, sermons, and disputations. 2.

• From a book, intitled, ‘Speeches and Passages of this great and happy Parliament, from the 3d of Nov. 1640, to this instant June 1641, collected into one volume, and, according to the most perfect originals, exactly published.’ Printed for Wm. Cook, at Furnival's Inn-Gate, Holborn, 1641.

Practise of Popish ceremonies countenanced and enjoined; as, altars, images, crucifixes, bowings; he compared these to the dry bones in Ezekiel, which first came together, then sinews and flesh came upon them, afterwards the skin covered them, and then breath and life was put into them; so first the form, then the spirit and life of Popery. 3. Preferment of persons popishly affected. 4. Discouragement of protestants, by over rigid prosecutions of the scrupulous for things indifferent, no vice made so great as nonconformity; by punishing, without law, for not reading the book of Sunday Recreations; for not removing the communion-table altar-wise; not coming to the rails to receive the communion; for preaching on the Lord's day after noon; for catechizing otherwise than as in the short catechism in the Common-Prayer Book. 5. And lastly, was the incroachment of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, particularly, 1. In fining and imprisoning without law. 2. Challenging their jurisdiction to be appropriate to their order, jure divino. 3. Contriving and publishing new Articles of Visitation, and new Canons; the boldness of bishops and all their subordinate officers and officials.—The 3rd part of Grievances; in which discovery he observed rather the order of time when they were acted, than of the consequence; but when he comes after to the cure, then he will persuade to begin with the most important; namely, Tonnage and Poundage, and the late new Book of Rates, taken by prerogative without grant of parliament; from whence these inconveniences follow: 1. Men's goods are seized, and their suits in law stopped. 2. Misemployment of the sums of money imposed; intended for the guard of the sea, which are disbursed to other uses, and a new tax raised for the same purpose. 3. The burthen excessive, trade hindered, home commodities abused, and foreign imbalanced; by which means the stock of the kingdom is diminished, especially insupportable to the poor planters in America, by the tax upon Tobacco.—The 4th general Grievance, Composition for Knight-hood; which, though it refers to a former custom, yet, upon the same grounds, the king may renew it by a new fine; immoderate multiplication of distress and issues, and enforced to compound with the commissioners; inundation of monopolies by the Soap Patent, undertaken by papists, full of mischief; 1. By impairing the goodness and enhancing the price of salt, soap, beer, and coals. 2. Under colour of which, trade was restrained to a few hands. 3. Many illegally imprisoned.—The great and unparalleled Grievance of Ship-Money being aggravated, not supported by the judgment; which is not grounded upon law, custom, precedent, or authority. It being improper for a case of necessity, abounding in variety of mischiefs; as, 1. The general extent to all persons, all times, and the subject left remediless. 2. The arbitrary proportion without limits. 3. Imposed by writ, and disposed by instructions: improper for the office of a sheriff in the inland counties, and inconvenient for the inhabitants; without rule or suitable means for the levying or managing of it.—The Inlargement of Forests beyond the bounds of the statute 28 Edw. I. which perambulations then were the cause, after, of that famous Charta de Foresta; and now reviving those old questions, new distempers may follow. The particular obliquities he numbered thus, 1. Surreptitious proceedings, as in Essex; yet that verdict was enforced in other counties, and a judgment upon the matter, after 3 or 400 years quiet possession of the subject, enforced to compound for great fines.—The selling of Nuisances. The king, as a father of the commonwealth, is to take care of the public commodities and advantages of the subjects; as rivers, highways, common sewers, by ordinary writs ad quod damnum; but now, by a course extrajudicial, by enforcing compositions: so then, if a nuisance be compounded for, it is a hurt to the people; if no nuisance, then it is used to the party's prejudice.—The commission for Buildings about London, which was presented as a grievance in the time of king James, is now much more increased, and more prejudicial. The commission for Depopulations began some few years since. By both these commissions the subject is restrained from disposing of his own; demolishing their houses, punishing and fining their persons, so that they are still liable by law; for the king cannot licence a nuisance; and although these are not nuisances, yet it is an ill consequence to be compounded for, and may make a precedent for kings to licence such things as are nuisances indeed.—Military Charges ought not to be laid upon the people by warrant of the king's hand, nor by letters of the council-table, nor by order of the lords lieutenants of the counties nor their deputies. It began to be practised as a loan, for supply of coat and conduct-money, in queen Elizabeth's time, with promise to be repaid it; as appears by a constat warrant in the exchequer, and certain payments; but now a-days never repaid. The first particular brought into a tax was the Muster-Master's wages; which being but for small sums was generally digested; yet, in the last parliament, it was designed to be remedied: but now there follows, 1. Pressing of men against their wills, or to find others. 2. Provisions for public magazines of powder, spades, and pickaxes. 3. Salary of officers, cart-horses and carts, and such like.—The extrajudicial Declarations of Judges, without hearing of counsel or argument; a teeming grievance of many others.—Monopolies countenanced by the council-table, and the clause in their patents of monopoly, commanding the justices of peace to assist them; whereby the great ability of the council receive a stain by such matters of so mean a report in the estimation of law, so ill in the apprehension of the people.—The high court of Star-Chamber, called, in the parliament rolls, Magnum Concilium, to which the parliaments were wont to refer such matters as they had not time to determine. A court erected against oppression; a court of council, and a court of justice; now an instrument of erecting and defending monopolies to set a face of public good upon things pernicious, as soap, ship-money, &c.—This great and most eminent power of the king, Edicts, Proclamations, called leges temporis, which used heretofore to encounter with sudden and unexpected danger, until the great council of the kingdom could be called, hath of late been exercised for enjoining and maintaining monopolies.—But the last and greatest grievance led him to a step higher, even as high as Heaven, as high as the Throne of God, his Word and truth. The ambitious and corrupt clergy, preaching down the laws of God and liberties of the kingdom, pretending divine authority and absolute power in the king to do what he will with us; and this preaching is the high way to preferment, as one Manwaring, sentenced the last parliament, then a doctor, not a bishop, preferred for his doctrines.—The Intermission of Parliaments, contrary to the statute, to be called once a year; the main cause, therefore, of all mischiefs, to which parliaments give remedy.—That these grievances are as hurtful to the king as to the subject; by interrupting their communion: for they have need of his general pardon, and to be secured from projectors and informers, to be freed from obsolete laws, and from the subtil devices of such who seek to strain the prerogative to their own private advantage and to the publick hurt; and the king hath need of them for counsel and support. Queen Elizabeth's victorious attempts were, for the greatest part, made upon the subjects purses, and not upon hers, though the honour and profit was hers. That these discontents diminish the king's reputation abroad, and disadvantage his treaties, and weaken his party beyond seas, by encouraging popery; by forcing the subjects to leave the kingdom, to the prejudice of the king's customs and subsidies; divers clothiers forced away, who set up their manufacture abroad, to the hurt of the kingdom. The king hath received upon the monopoly of Wines, 30,000*l.* per ann. the vintner pays 40*s.* a tun, which comes to 90,000*l.* the price upon the subject, by retail, increased 2*d.* a quart which comes to 8*l.* a ton; so, 45,000 tons brought in yearly, amounts to 360,000*l.* which is 330,000*l.* loss to the kingdom, above the king's receipt.—Now the Remedies consist of two main branches; in declaring the law where it is doubtful, and in provision for the execution of the law where it was clear; but these he referred to a further time; and, for the present, he advised speedily to desire a conference with the lords, and always to humble themselves to God for his assistance.

Sir Benj. Rudyard, member for Wilton, made the following speech the same day:—
'Mr. Speaker; We are here assembled to do God's business and the king's in which our own is included, as we are christians, as we are subjects. Let us fear God, then shall we honour the king the more; for I am afraid we have been the less prosperous in parliaments, because we have preferred other matters before him. Let religion be our primum querite, for all things else are but etceteras to it; yet we may have them too, sooner and surer, if we give God his precedence.—We well know what disturbance hath been brought upon the church, for vain petty trifles. How the whole church, the whole kingdom hath been troubled, where to place a metaphor, an altar. We have seen ministers, their wives, children, and families undone, against law, against conscience, against all howels of compassion, about not dancing upon Sundays. What do these sort of men think will become of themselves, when the master of the house shall come, and find them thus beating their fellow-servants? These inventions are but sieves made of purpose to winnow the best men; and that's the devil's occupation. They have a mind to worry preaching, for I never yet heard of any but diligent preachers that were vexed with these and the like devices. They despise prophecy, and, as one said, 'They would fain be at something more like the mass, that will not bite. A muzzled religion.' They would evaporate and dispirit the power and vigour of religion, by drawing it out into some solemn specious formalities, into obsolete, antiquated ceremonies, new furnished up. And this, belike, is the good work in hand, which Dr. Heylin hath so often celebrated in his bold pamphlets. All their acts and actions are so full of mixtures, involutions, and complications, as nothing is clear, nothing sincere in any of their proceedings: let them not say, that these are the perverse, suspicious and malicious interpretations of some few factious spirits amongst us, when a romanist hath bridged, and been congratulated in print, That the face of our church begins to alter, and the language of our religion to change. And Sancta Clara hath published, That if a synod were held, non intermixtis puritanis, setting puritans aside, our Articles and their Religion would soon be agreed. They have so brought it to pass, that, under the name of puritans, all our religion is branded, and, under a few hard words against Jesuits, all popery is countenanced.—Whosoever squares his actions by any rule, either divine or human, he is a Puritan. Whoever would be governed by the king's laws, he is a Puritan. He that will not do whatsoever other men would have him do, he is a Puritan. Their great work, their masterpiece now is, to make all those of the religion to be the suspected party of the kingdom.—Let us further reflect upon the ill effect these courses have wrought, what by a defection from us on the one side, a separation on the other; some imagining whither we are tending, made haste to turn, or declare themselves Papists before hand, thereby hoping to render themselves the more gracious, the more acceptable. A great multitude of the king's subjects, striving to hold communion with us, but seeing how far we were gone, and fearing how much further we would go, were forced to fly the land; some into other inhabited countries, very many into savage wildernesses, because this land would not bear them. Do not they that cause these things cast a reproach upon the government?—Mr. Speaker; let it be our principal care, that these ways neither continue nor return upon us. If we secure our religion, we shall cut off and defeat many plots that are now on foot by them and others. Believe it, sir, religion hath been for a long time, and still is, the great design upon this kingdom. It is a known and practised principle, that they who would introduce another religion into the church, must first trouble and disorder the government of the state, that so they may work their ends in a confusion which now lies at the door.—I come next to the king's business more particularly; which indeed is the kingdom's; for one hath no existence, no being without the other, their relation is so near; yet some have strongly and subtilly laboured a divorce; which hath been the very bane both of king and kingdoms. When the foundation is shaken, it is high time to look to the building. He hath no heart, no head, no soul, that is not moved in his whole man, to look upon the distresses, the miseries of the commonwealth; that is not forward in all that he is, and hath, to redress them in a right way.—The king likewise is reduced to great straits, wherein it were undutifulness, nay inhumanity, to take advantage of him; let us rather make it an advantage for him, to do him best service when he hath most need. Not to seek our own good, but in him, and with him; else we shall commit the same crimes ourselves, which we must condemn in others. His maj. hath clearly and freely put himself into the hands of this parliament; and, I presume, there is not a man in this house but feels himself advanced in this high trust: but if he prosper no better in our hands than he hath done in theirs, who have hitherto had the handling of his affairs, we shall for ever make ourselves unworthy of so gracious a confidence.—I have often thought, and said, that it must be some great extremity that would recover and rectify this state; and, when that extremity did come it would be a great hazard whether it might prove a remedy, or ruin. We are now upon that vertical turning point, and therefore it is no time to palliate, to foment our own undoing. Let us set upon the remedy, we must first know the disease: but to discover the diseases of the state is, according to some, to traduce the government; yet others are of opinion, that this is the half-way to the cure.—His maj. is wiser than they that had advised him, and therefore he cannot but see and feel their subverting destructive counsels, which speak louder than I can speak of them; for they ring a doleful deadly knell over the whole kingdom. His maj. best knows who they are; for us, let the matters bolt out the men; their actions discover them. They are men that talk largely of the king's service, have done none but their own; and that's too evident. They speak highly of the king's power, but they have made it a miserable power, that produceth nothing but weakness both to the king and kingdom. They have exhausted the king's revenue to the bottom, nay through the bottom, and beyond. They have spent vast sums of money wastefully, fruitlessly, dangerously: so that more money, without other counsels, will be but a swift undoing. They have always, peremptorily, pursued one obstinate pernicious course. First they bring things to an extremity, then they make that extremity, of their own making, the reason of their next action, seven times worse than the former; and there we are at this instant. They have almost spoiled the best instituted government in the world, for sovereignty in a king, liberty to the subject; the proportionable temper of both which, makes the happiest state for power, for riches, for duration. They have unmanly and slobberingly cast all their projects, all their machinations upon the king: which no wise or good minister ever did, but would still take all harsh distasteful things upon themselves, to clear, to sweeten their master. They have not suffered his maj. to appear unto his people in his own native goodness. They have eclipsed him by their interposition; although gross condense bodies may obscure and hinder the sun from shining out, yet is he still the same in his own splendor: and when they are removed, all creatures under him are directed by his light; comforted by his beams: but they have framed a superstitious seeming maxim of state for their own turn, 'That if a king will suffer men to be torn from him, he shall never have any good service done him:' when the plain truth is, that this is the surest way to preserve a king from having ill servants about him. And the divine truth likewise is, 'Take away the wicked from before the king, and his throne shall be established.'—Mr. Speaker; now we see what the sores are in general, and when more particulars appear, let us be very careful to draw out the cores of them; not to skin them over with a slight, suppurating, festering cure, lest they break out again into a greater mischief; consider of it, consult and speak your minds.—It hath heretofore been boasted, 'That the king should never call a parliament till he had no need of his people.' These were words of division and malignity. The king must always, according to his occasions, have use of his people's power, hearts, hands, purses. The people will always have need of the king's clemency, justice, protection: and this reciprocation is the strongest, the sweetest union. It hath been said too, of late, 'That a parliament will take more from the king than they will give him.' It may be well said, that those things which will fall away of themselves, will enable the subjects to give him more than can be taken any way else. projects and monopolies are but leasing conduit-pipes; the Exchequer itself, at the fullest is but a cistern, and now a broken one; frequent parliaments only are the fountain: and I do not doubt but in this parliament, as we shall be free in our advices, so shall we be the more free of our purses, that his majesty may experimentally find the real difference of better counsels, the true solid grounds of raising and establishing his greatness, never to be brought again (by God's blessing) to such dangerous, such such desperate perplexities. Mr. Speaker, I confess I have now gone in a way much against my nature, and somewhat against my custom heretofore used in this place; but the deplorable, dismal condition both of church and state have so far wrought upon my judgment, as it hath convinced my disposition: yet I am not vir sanguinum, I love no man's ruin; I thank God, I neither hate any man's person, nor envy any man's good fortune; only I am zealous for a thorough reformation in a time that exacts it, that extorts it; which I humbly beseech this house may be done with as much lenity, and as much moderation, as the public safety of the king and kingdom can possibly admit.

Sir John Holland, member for Castle-rising, Norfolk, spoke to the following effect: 'Mr. Speaker; The time of actions are not for rhetoric and elocution, which emboldens me to rise: and though I must acknowledge myself to be one of the youngest scholars and meanest proficient in this great school of wisdom, yet I conceive it a great part of my duty, at this time, both to deliver my suit and conscience.—We are called hither, by the royal power: we sit here by the king's majesty's grace and favour; and since his maj. hath been graciously pleased to leave the government of all in our hands, I doubt not but we shall lay such a foundation in the beginning of this parliament, that we shall make it a happy age, and a long and lasting one: since the dangers of these times, the present distempers of this state, and therein both his majesty's and our necessities, yea and the whole kingdom's safety, do require it.—We are now called, Mr. Speaker, as I conceive from the reports you have made of his majesty's gracious Declaration, for 4 principal causes: 1. For Supply of his majesty's Wants. 2. For the relief of our brethren in the Northern parts. 3. For the Remove of the Scots Forces. 4. For Redress of our own Grievances. That his majesty's wants are great and many, I think there is no man doubts it; and it is as certain our grievances are so too; they are great and many both in church and commonwealth: I shall but touch them in either, since they have been so fully remonstrated in both. 1. In the Church; by the usurping power of some prelates and their adherents; by which means many great dangers, innovations of doctrines, of discipline, and of government have been thrust upon us. 2. In the Church; by public sufferances of Priests and Jesuits to come into the land; by which means the number of Romish Catholics are dangerously multiplied, idolatry increased, and God's heavy judgments highly provoked. 3. In the commonwealth; by the late inundations of the prerogative royal, which have broken out and almost overturned all our liberties, even those which have been best and strongest fortified: the Grand Charta itself, that which hath been so oft, so solemnly confirmed in the succession of so many princes, ratified in his majesty's name, founded by the wisdom of former ages, purposely to keep the beam even and between sovereignty; even this, the dearest and chiefest part of our inheritance, hath been infringed, broken, and set at naught in the commonwealth, by the over-potency of some great ones, secret counsellors of state; by whose advice, it is thought, the greatest part of these present distempers, under which the body of this commonwealth at this time labours, do derive their originals. 4. In the Commonwealth; by the mischievous practices and policies of some subtle projectors; who, under the title of the king's profit and the public good, have intitled themselves to great and vast estates, and that to the damage of the whole kingdom. They are, Mr. Speaker, the very moths and cankers that have fretten and eaten out all the trade and commerce, the very beauty, strength and health of this famous island. In the Commonwealth, by the entertainment of Foreigners and Strangers, and that at his majesty's excessive charge; by which means his coffers are empty, his revenues shortened, and the whole kingdom many other ways oppressed.—But I shall not trouble myself any farther in so vast, so large a field; I shall now represent my own weak apprehensions, for our progression in all the particulars for which we have been called, and in all humility submit them unto you. 1. Of Supply in his majesty's Wants; I do humbly desire we may proceed therewith in its due time, and that with as much loyal duty and liberality as ever any people expressed towards their prince. I think I may say the present affairs of the kingdom do require it. 2. For the Relief of our brethren in the Northern parts; with a sense of charity and fellow-feeling of their miseries, afflictions, and losses. 3. In removing of the Scots army with a soft and gentle mediation, pacification, and reconciliation, if possibly it may be wrought with his majesty's honour, and the kingdom's safety; if not, then to repel and repulse them with stout and resolute spirits, with valiant and united hearts and hands, such as will best suit with our duty to God, our king, our country; such as shall best become his honour, and the antient renown of this English nation. 4. In redress of our Grievances in those of the church, which ought to have priority in our consultation, as well in respect of necessity as dignity. In these, I do humbly desire, and doubt not but we shall proceed with all true piety, and well grounded zeal guiding us towards God's house, and his truth. In those of the commonality, with a religious care of our country's freedom; in the faithful performance of the trust reposed in us by them that sent us; in the preservation of our rights, our liberties, our privileges, and our properties. Yet in all, Mr. Speaker, I do humbly desire we may proceed as best suiting the matter and condition of these distempered times, or as best becoming the honour, dignity, and wisdom of this so great a court, so great a council, with all temper, modesty, and all due moderation.'

Mr. Bogshaw, member for Southwark, closed this debate with the following speech:—'I had rather act than speak in those weighty businesses of the kingdom, which have been so excellently handled by the three worthy gentlemen that spoke last, and therefore I shall be short. For when I look upon the body of this goodly and flourishing kingdom in matters of Religion, and of our laws (for, like Hypocrites' twins, they live and die together); I say when I behold these in that state and plight, as they have been represented to us, flere magis libet quam dicere: but this is our comfort, Mr. Speaker, that we are all met together for the welfare and happiness of prince and people; and who knows whether this may not be the appointed time, wherein God will restore our religion as at the first, and our laws as at the beginning. The honour of a king consisteth in the wealth of his people: this undoubted maxim his maj. hath made good by his late gracious speech and promise to us to redress all our grievances, to destroy the enemies of our peace and plenty. To make a people rich, they must have ease and justice: ease in their consciences from the base of superstition, from the intolerable burden of innovation in religion, and from the racks and tortures of strange and new fangled oaths: they must be eased in their persons, being liberi homines and not villani, from all illegal arrests and imprisonment against Magna Charta, being our greatest liberties. They must be eased in their lands, from Forests, where never any deer fed; from Depopulations, where never any farm was decayed; and from Inclosures, where never any hedges were set. And must, lastly, be eased in their Goods from the exactions and expropriations of pursuivants and apparitors, of projectors and monopolists, 'Humanarum calamitatum mercatores,' as an ancient finely calls them. But if the people have all these easements, yet, if they have not justice, they cannot subsist: justice is to the civil body as food to the natural: if the streams of justice be, by unrighteousness, turned into gall and wormwood, or by cruelty, like the Egyptian waters, be turned into blood, those who drink of these brooks must needs die and perish.—The law saith, That all justice is in the king; who is stiled in our books, Fons Justitie, and he commits it to his judges for the execution; wherein he trusts them with two of the chiefest flowers which belong to his crown, the administration of his justice, and the exposition of his laws; but he will not trust them without an oath required of them, by the statute of 18 Edw. 3. which is so strict and severe, that it made a judge, whom I know, though honest and strict, yet to quake and tremble at the very mention of it. The effect of the oath is, That they should do equal law and execution of right to all the king's subjects, poor as well as rich, without regard of any person: that they should not deny to do common right to any man by the king's letters, nor for any other cause: and in case such letters do come, that they proceed to do the law notwithstanding such letters, or for any other causes, as they will answer to the king in bodies, goods, and lands. How this oath hath been performed, we have seen and felt, I need say no more. But when I cast mine eyes upon the inferior courts of justice; wherein no such oath is required, I mean the high coimmission, and other ecclesiastical courts, my soul hath bled for the wrong pressures, which I have observed to have been done and committed in these courts against the king's good people, especially for the most monstrous abuse of the oath ex officio; which, as it is now used, I can call no other than carnificina conscientie. I have some reason to know this, that have been an attendant to the court these 5 years for myself and a dear friend of mine, some time knight for our shire, for a mere trivial business; that the most that could be proved against him, was the putting on his hat in the time of sermon. Of which court I shall say more, and make good what I say, when those ulcers come to be opened.—Mr. Speaker, I say these three worthies, that spake before me, have told you of our miseries; but I cannot tell you of the remedies: for things are come to that height, that I may say, as Livy said of the Roman state in his time, 'Nec vitia nostra scire possumus nec remedia'; for no laws will now do us good. Better laws could not have been made than the statute of Monopolies against Projectors, and the Petition of Right against the infringers of liberties; and yet, as if the law had been the author of them, there hath been, within these few years, more monopolies and infringement of liberties, than have been in any age since the Conquest; and if all those vile harlots, as queen Elizabeth called them, that have been the authors of those evils, and the troublers of our Israel, do go unpunished, it will never be better with us; for now, during parliament, like frozen snakes, their poison dries up; but let the parliament dissolve, and then their poison melts and scatters abroad, and doth more hurt than ever. What then must be done? Why, what the plaister cannot do, must be done by the saw;

'Ense recidendum est, ne pars sincera trahatur.'

I cannot better English it, than in the words of a king, 'Let them be cut off in their wickedness that have framed mischief as a law.' My conclusion is this, let the woful violation of the statute of Monopolies and the Petition of Right be made felony, or premunire at the least; but yet, in the interim, let them be made examples of punishment, who have been the authors of all those miseries, according to the counsel of Solomon, 'Take away the wicked from before the king, and his throne shall be established in righteousness.'

A Fast appointed, &c.] Nov. 9. A day for a solemn Fast, with the consent of the king, was appointed. The next Lord's Day, after the fast, ordered for all the members to receive the sacrament. A select committee to see this punctually obeyed, and to take care that no Papist sit amongst them: to inquire what number of Papists are in London, and ten miles round it, and how armed, &c.—The same day the lord-keeper signified to the lords, 'That his maj. taking notice at this time, of an extraordinary confluence of Popish Recusants to the cities of London and Westminster and the places adjacent, hath been graciously pleased, for preventing all inconveniences that may thence arise, to resolve of setting forth a Proclamation for their departure, and disarming with all speed. Also that because his maj. had been informed some jealousies had grown on his making a Constable of the Tower, and putting in a garrison there; which he did in favour of the city, to prevent the insolencies of base and loose people, his maj. had resolved that it should be left as before, without any constable or garrison.'

Resolution against Monopolists.] This day, it was Resolved, upon the question, "That all Projectors and Monopolists whatsoever; or that have any share, or lately have had any share, in any monopolies; or that do receive, or lately have received, any benefit from any Monopoly or Project; or that have procured any warrant or command for the restraint or molesting of any that have refused to conform themselves to any such Proclamations or Projects; are disabled, by order of this house, to sit here in this house: and, if any man here knows any Monopolist, that he shall nominate him: That any member of this house, that is a monopolist or projector, shall repair to Mr. Speaker, that a new warrant may issue forth; or otherwise, that he shall be dealt with as with a stranger, that hath no power to sit here." Resolved, upon the question, "That the word 'unlawful' should be joined to the word Monopolists."

The lord Digby, eldest son of the earl of Bristol, and member for the county of Dorset, spoke as follows:—"Mr. Speaker; You have received now a solemn account from most of the shires of England, of the several Grievances and oppressions they sustain, and nothing as yet from Dorsetshire. Sir, I would not have you think that I serve for a land of Goshen; that we live there in sun-shine, whilst darkness and plagues overspread the rest of the land. As little would I have you think, that being under the same sharp measure as the rest, we are either insensible or benumbed, or that that shire wanteth a servant to represent its sufferings boldly.—It is true, the county of Dorset hath not digested its complaints into that formal way of petition, which others, I see, have done; but have entrusted them to my partners and my delivery of them, by word of mouth, to this honourable house. And there was given unto us, in the county-court, the day of our election, a short memorial of the heads of them, which was read in the hearing of the free-holders there present, who all unanimously, with one voice, signified upon each particular, that it was their desire, that we should represent them to the parliament; which, with your leave, I shall do, and these they are: 1. The great and intolerable burthen of Ship-Money, touching the legality whereof they are unsatisfied. 2. The many great abuses in pressing of Soldiers, and raising Monies concerning the same. 3. The multitude of Monopolies. 4. The new Canon, and the Oath to be taken by lawyers, divines, &c. 5. The oath required to be taken by church-officers, to present according to articles new and unusual.—Besides this, there was likewise presented to us, by a very considerable part of the clergy of that county, a note of remembrance containing these two particulars: 1. The Imposition of the new oath required to be taken by all ministers and others; which they conceive to be illegal, and such as they cannot take with a good conscience. 2. The requiring of a pretended Benevolence, but, in effect, a Subsidy, under the penalty of suspension, excommunication and deprivation, all benefit of appeal excluded.—This is all we had particularly in charge; but, that I may not appear a remiss servant of my country and of this house, give me leave to add somewhat of my own sense. Truly, Mr. Speaker, the injurious sufferings of some worthy members of this house, since the dissolution of the two last parliaments, are so fresh in my memory, that I was resolved not to open my mouth in any business, wherein freedom and plain dealing were requisite, until such time as the breach of our privileges were vindicated, and the safety of speech settled. But since such excellent members of our house thought fit, the other day, to lay aside that caution, and to discharge their souls so freely in the way of zeal to his majesty's service and their country's good, I shall interpret that confidence of theirs for a lucky omen to this parliament, and, with your permission, licence my thoughts too a little.—Under those heads which I proposed to you, as the Grievances of Dorsetshire, I suppose are comprized the greatest part of the mischiefs which have, of late years, laid heavy either to our estates or consciences. Sir, I do not conceive this the fit season to search and ventilate particulars, yet I profess I cannot forbear to add somewhat to what was said, the last day, by a learned gentleman of the long robe, concerning the acts of that reverend synod, made of an old convocation. Doth not every parliament-man's heart rise to see the prelates thus usurp to themselves the grand pre-eminence of parliament? The granting of Subsidies, and that under so preposterous a name as of a Benevolence, for that which is a Malevolence indeed: a Malevolence, I am confident, in those that granted it, against parliaments; and a Malevolence surely in those that refuse it, against those that granted it; for how can it incite less, when they see wrested from them what they are not willing to part with, under no less a penalty than the loss both of Heaven and earth; of Heaven, by excommunication; and of the earth, by deprivation; and this without redemption by appeal? What good christian can think with patience on such an ensnaring Oath, as that which is, by the new Canons, enjoined to be taken by all ministers, lawyers, physicians, and graduates in the universities? Where, besides the swearing such an impertinence, as that things necessary to salvation are contained in discipline; besides the swearing those to be of divine right, which amongst the learned never pretended to it, as the arch things in our hierarchy; besides the swearing not to consent to the change of that, which the state may, upon great reason, think fit to alter; besides the bottomless perjury of an etcætera; besides all this, Mr. Speaker, men must swear that they swear freely and voluntarily what they are compelled unto; and, lastly, that they swear that oath in the literal sense, whereof not two of the makers themselves, that I have heard of, could ever agree in the understanding.—In a word, Mr. Speaker, to tell you my opinion of this oath, it is a covenant against the king for bishops and hierarchy, as the Scots Covenant is against them; only so much worse than the Scots, as they admit not of the supremacy in ecclesiastical affairs, and we are sworn unto it.—Now for those particular Heads of Grievances, whereby our estates and properties are so radically invaded; I suppose, as I said before, that it is no season now to enter into a strict discussion of them; only thus much I shall say of them, with application to the county for which I serve, that none can more justly complain; since none can more justly challenge exemption from such burdens than Dorsetshire, whether you consider it as a county subsisting much by trade, or as none of the most populous, or as exposed as much as any to foreign invasion.—But, alas! Mr. Speaker, particular lamentations are hardly distinguishable in universal groans. Mr. Speaker, it hath been a metaphor frequent in parliament; and, if my memory fail me not, was made use of in the lord keeper's speech at the opening of the last, 'That what money kings raised from their subjects, it was but as vapours drawn up from the earth by the sun, to be distilled upon it again in fructifying showers.' The comparison, Mr. Speaker, hath held of late years, in this kingdom, too unluckily; what hath been raised from the subject by those violent attractions, hath been formed, it is true, into clouds; but how? To darken the sun's own lustre, and hath fallen again upon the land only in hailstones and mildews, to batter and prostrate still more and more our liberties, to blast and wither our affections; had not the latter of these been still kept alive by our king's own personal virtues, which will ever preserve him, in spite of all ill counsellors, a sacred object both of our admiration and love.—Mr. Speaker, it hath been often said in this house, and, I think, can never be too often repeated, 'That the king's of England can do no wrong;' but though they could, Mr. Speaker, yet princes have no part in the ill of those actions which their judges assure them to be just; their counsellors that they are prudent; and their divines that they are conscientious. This consideration leadeth me to that which is more necessary far, at this season, than any farther laying open of our miseries; that is, the way to the Remedy, by seeking to remove from our sovereign such unjust judges, such pernicious counsellors, and such disconsent divines, as have of late years, by their wicked practices, provoked aspersions upon the government of the graciouslest and best of kings.—Mr. Speaker, let me not be misunderstood; I level at no man with a fore-laid design; let the faults, and those well proved, lead us to the men: it is the only true parliamentary method, and the only fit one to incline our sovereign: for it can no more consist with a gracious and righteous prince to expose his servants upon irregular prejudices, than with a wise prince to withhold malefactors, how great soever, from the course of orderly justice. Let me acquaint you with an aphorism in Hypocrates, no less authentic, I think, in the body politic, than in the natural; this it is, Mr. Speaker, 'Bodies, to be thoroughly and effectually purged, must have their humours, first made fluid and moveable. The humours, that I understand to have caused all the desperate maladies of this nation, are the ill ministers: to purge them away clearly, they must be first loosened, unsettled, and extenuated; which can no way be effected with a gracious master, but by truly representing them unworthy of his protection. And this leadeth me to my motion, which is, That a select committee may be appointed, to draw out of all that hath here been represented, such a Remonstrance as may be a faithful and lively representation unto his majesty of the deplorable estate of this his kingdom; and such as may happily point out unto his clear and excellent judgment, the pernicious authors of it: and that this Remonstrance being drawn, we may, with all speed, repair to the lords, and desire them to join with us in it. And this is my humble motion.'

Sir John Colepeper, one of the knights of the shire for Kent, spoke as follows: Mr. Speaker; I stand not up with a petition in my hand. I have it in my mouth;* and have it in charge from them that sent me hither, humbly to present to the consideration of this house the Grievances of the county of Kent. I shall only sum them up, and they are these. 1. The great increase of Papists, by the remission of those laws which were made to suppress them. The life of the laws is execution; without this they become a dead letter: this is wanting, and is a great grievance.—2. The obtruding and countenancing of divers new ceremonies in matters of religion; as, placing the Communion-Table altar-wise, and bowing or cringing to or towards it; the refusing of the holy sacrament to such as refuse to come up to the rails: these carry with them some scandal and much offence.—3. Military Charges; and therein, 1st, that of Coat and Conduct-Money, required as a loan, or pressed as a due; in each respect equally a grievance. 2dly, The enhancing the price of Powder; whereby the Trained Bands are much discouraged in their exercising: however little this may seem prima facie, yet, upon due examination, it will appear a great grievance. The 3rd is more particular to our county; it is this, The last summer was twelvemonth, 1000 of our best arms were taken from the owners, and sent into Scotland. The compulsory way was this, 'If you will not send your arms, you shall go yourselves.' Mr. Speaker, the Trained Band is a militia of great strength and honour, without charges to the king, and deserves all due encouragement. 4. The Canons: I assign these to be a grievance, 1st, in respect of the matter, besides the etcetera oath. 2dly, in respect of the makers; they were chosen to serve in a convocation; that failing with the parliament, the scene was altered; the same men, without any new election, shuffled into a sacred synod. 3dly, in respect of the consequence; which, in this age, when the second ill precedent becomes a law, is full of danger. The clergy, without confirmation of a parliament, have assumed unto themselves power to make laws, to grant relief by the name of Benevolence, and to intermeddle with our freehold by suspensions and deprivation. This is a grievance of a high nature.—5. Ship-Money: this cries aloud: I may say, I hope without offence, this strikes the first-born of every family, I mean our inheritance. If the laws give the king power, in any danger of the kingdom, wheresoever he is judge, to impose what and when he pleases, we owe all that is left to the goodness of the king, not to the law. Mr. Speaker, this makes the farmers faint, and the plough to go heavy.—6. The great Decay of Cloathing and Fall of our Wools: these are the golden mines of England, which give a foundation to that trade which we drive with all the world. I know there are many stars concur in this constellation; I will not trouble you with more than one cause of it, which I dare affirm to be the greatest; it is the great customs and impositions laid upon our cloths and new draperies. I speak not this with a wish to lessen the king's revenues, so it be done by parliament; I shall give my voice to lay more charge upon the superfluities (due regard being had to trade) which we import from all other nations: sure I am that these impositions upon our native commodities are dangerous, and give liberty to our neighbours to undersell: and I take it for a rule, that besides our loss in trade, which is five times as much as the king receiveth, what is imposed upon our cloths is taken from the rent of our lands.—I have but one Grievance more to offer unto you; but this one compriseth many: it is a nest of wasps, or swarm of vermin, which have over-crept the land, I mean the monopolers and polers of the people: These like the frogs of Egypt, have got possession of our dwellings, and we have scarce a room free from them: they sip in our cup, they dip in our dish, they sit by our fire; we find them in the dye-vat, wash-bowl, and powdering-tub; they share with the butler in his box, they have marked and scaled us from head to foot. Mr. Speaker, they will not bate us a pin: we may not buy our own cloaths without their brokerage. These are the leeches that have sucked the commonwealth so hard, that it is almost become leetrical. And, some of these are ashamed of their right names; they have a vizard to hide the brand made by that good law in the last parliament of king James; they shelter themselves under the name of a corporation; they make bye-laws, which serve their turns to squeeze us, and fill their purses: unface these, and they will prove as bad cards as any in the pack. These are not petty chapmen, but wholesale men. Mr. Speaker, I have echoed to you the cries of the kingdom; I will tell you their hopes; they look to Heaven for a blessing upon this parliament; they hang upon his majesty's exemplary piety and great justice, which render his ears open to the just complaints of his subjects; and we have had lately a gracious assurance of it. It is the wise conduct of this parliament, whereby the other great affairs of the kingdom, and these our Grievances of no less import, may go hand-in-hand, in preparation and resolution; then, by the blessing of God, we shall return home with an olive branch in our mouths, and a full confirmation of the privileges which we received from our ancestors, and owe to our posterity; which every free-born Englishman hath received with the air he breathed in. These are our hopes: these are our prayers.'

Mr. Grimston, member for Colchester, spoke next: 'Mr. Speaker; These petitions, which have been now read, are all of them remonstrances of the general and universal grievances and distempers that are now in the state and government of the church and commonwealth: and they are not these alone, but his majesty's gracious expressions the first day of parliament, that call me up to speak at this present, contrary to my own intentions.—Mr. Speaker, his majesty, who is the head of the body politic, and the father of the commonwealth, hath complained first, declaring his sensibleness of our sufferings; and, amongst other things, hath put us in mind of our grievances; and hath freely left it to ourselves, for our redress and repair therein, to begin and end as we shall think fit. And this draws me on, with much cheerfulness and zeal, to contribute my poor endeavours to so great a work. And, Mr. Speaker, I conceive it will not be altogether impertinent, for your direction and guidance in that great place, which, by the favour of his maj. and this house, your now possess, a little to recollect ourselves in the remembrance of what was done the last parliament, and where we ended. It will likewise be very considerable what hath been done since that parliament, and who they are that have been the authors and causers of all our miseries and distractions, both before and since. In the last parliament, as soon as the house was settled, a subsidiary Aid and Supply was propounded, and many arguments used to give it precedency before all other matters and considerations whatever. On the other side, a multitude of Complaints and Grievances of all sorts, as well concerning our eternal as our temporal estates, were presented, and put in the other balance: the wisdom of that great council, weighing both indifferently, and looking not only at the dangers then threatened from Scotland, which are now upon us; but likewise taking into their consideration the condition and constitution of the present government here at home, concluded that they were in no capacity to give, unless their Grievances were first redressed and removed.—For Mr. Speaker, it then was, and still is, most manifest and apparent, that, by some judgments lately obtained in courts of justice, and by some new ways of government lately started up amongst us, the law of property is so much shaken, that no man can say he is master of any thing; but all that we have we hold as tenants, by courtesy and at will, and may be stripped of it at pleasure. Yet, Mr. Speaker, desirous to give his maj. all possible satisfaction and contentment, as well in the manner or Supply for expedition, as in the substance and matter of it, we confined and limited ourselves but to three particulars only, and to such matter as, properly and naturally, should have reference and relation to these 3 heads. 1. The Privileges of Parliament. 2. Matters of Religion. 3. The Property of our Goods and Estates. And we began with the first, as the great ark in which the other two, Religion and Property, are included and preserved.—Mr. Speaker, the violations complained of the last parliament, touching our Privileges, were of two sorts; either such as had been done in parliament, or out of parliament. Concerning the violations of the first sort, it was resolved, by vote, That the Speaker's refusing to put a question, being thereunto required by the house, or to adjourn the house upon any command whatsoever, without the consent and approbation of the house itself, were breaches and violations that highly impeached our privileges. And, having passed that vote, I conceive it were fit we should now proceed a little further, and consider of a way how to be repaired against them that have been the violaters: for execution does animare legem. The putting of an old law in execution does oftentimes do more good than the making of a new one. As concerning violations of another sort, done out of parliament, in courts of justice, and at the council-board, where neither our persons nor our proceedings ought to have been controlled or meddled withal; and as concerning matters of Religion, and the Property of our Goods and Estates, there were divers things then likewise agreed on by vote, whereupon a conference was desired to have been held with the lords: but what interjections and rubs we met withal by the way, and how the lords controverted the precedency of our Grievances, and how our Speaker was taken away from amongst us, and what an unhappy conclusion we had at the last, the remembrance of it were a subject too sad to begin another parliament withal. Therefore, I shall pass from what was done the last parliament, and come to what hath been done since that parliament ended.—Mr. Speaker, there are some worthy gentlemen now of this house, that were members of the last parliament, that carried themselves in the matters and businesses then and there agitated and debated, with great wisdom, and unexampled moderation. But what had they at last for all their pains, in attending the public service of the commonwealth? Why, as soon as ever the parliament was ended, their studies and pockets were searched, as if they had been felons and traitors; and they committed to several goals; with an intention, I am confident, of their utter ruin and destruction, had they not foreseen a danger approaching; for, Mr. Speaker, if I be truly informed, an information was drawn, or at least directions given for the drawing of it, against them in the Star-chamber. Mr. Speaker, there hath been, since the last parliament, a synod; and in that synod a new Oath hath been made and framed, and enjoined to be taken. They might as well have made a new law, and enjoined the execution of that, as enjoined and urged the taking of the other, not being established by act of parliament; and, in point of mischief, the safety of the commonwealth, and the freedom and liberties of the subject, are more concerned in the doing of the one, than if they had done the other.—The next exception I shall take to it, is to the matter contained in the Oath itself. Mr. Speaker, they would have us, at the very first dash, swear to a damnable heresy, that matters necessary to salvation are contained in the discipline of our church: whereas, it hath ever been the tenet of our church, That all things necessary to salvation are comprehended and contained in the doctrine of our church only; and that hath always been used as an argument, until this very present, against anti-disciplinarians, to stop their mouths withal; and therefore, for that reason, they might, with the less regret and offence, conform and submit themselves to the discipline of our church. And, for prevention, in case the wisdom of the state, in this great council, should at any time think fit to alter any thing in the government of our church, they would anticipate and forestal our judgments: by making us swear, beforehand, That we would never give our consent to any alteration. Nay, they go a little further; for they would have us swear, That the government of the church by archbishops, bishops, deans, archdeacons, &c. is jure divino; their words are, 'As of right it ought to stand,' whereas, Mr. Speaker, we meet not with the name of an archbishop or a dean, or an archdeacon, in all the New Testament. And whatsoever may be said of the function of bishops, it is one thing; but for their jurisdiction, it is merely humana institutione, and they must thank the king for it.—As for their gross and absurd etcetera, wherein they would have men swear they know neither what, nor how many fathom deep: there is neither divinity nor charity in it, and yet they would put that upon us.—Mr. Speaker, what they meant and intended by this new Oath, and their Book of Canons, and their Book of Articles, which they would have our church-wardens sworn unto, to inquire of, and to present thereupon, I must confess I know not; unless they had a purpose therein to blow up the Protestant Religion, and all the faithful professors of it, and to advance their hierarchy a step higher; which, I suppose, we all fear is high enough already. They have likewise, in this synod, granted a Benevolence, but the nature of the thing agrees not with the name; for, in plain English, it is 6 Subsidies, to be paid by the clergy in 6 years: and the penalties they have imposed upon the refusers, for non-payment, is to be deprived of their functions, to be stripped of their freehold, and to be excommunicated; and this act of their synod is not published amongst their canons, for which they might have some colourable seeming authority: but it comes out, in a book by itself, in the Latin tongue, supposing, as I conceive, that laymen are as ignorant as they would have them; and so they dance in a net.—And as in this, so in most of their new canons, if they be thoroughly considered, any judicious man may easily discern and perceive, and they do therein like watermen, that look one way and row another; they pretend one thing, but intend nothing less: and certainly, Mr. Speaker, in this they have flown a high pitch; for a synod called together upon pretence of reconciling and settling controversies and matters in religion, to take upon them the boldness thus, out of parliament, to grant Subsidies, and to meddle with men's freeholds, I dare say the like was never heard of before; and they that durst do this will do worse, if the current of their raging tyranny be not stopped in time.—Who are they, Mr. Speaker, that have countenanced and cherished Popery and Arminianism to that growth and height it is now come to in this kingdom? Who are they, Mr. Speaker, that have given encouragement to those that have boldly preached those damnable heresies in our pulpits? Who are they, Mr. Speaker, that have given authority and licence to them that have published those heresies in print? Who are they, Mr. Speaker, that of late days have been advanced to any dignity or preferment in the church, but such as have been notoriously suspicious in their discipline, corrupt in their doctrine, and, for the most part, vicious in their lives? And who are they, Mr. Speaker, that have overthrown our two great charters, Magna Charta, and Charta de Foresta? What Imposition hath been laid down, or what Monopoly hath been damned, in any court of justice since the last parliament? Hath not Ship-Money, Coat and Conduct-Money, and Money for other Military Charges, been collected and levied with as great violence as ever they were; in violation of our liberties, confirmed unto us in our Petition of Right, notwithstanding our supplications and complaints the last parliament? And who are they, Mr. Speaker, that have caused all those dangerous convulsions, and all the desperate, unnatural, bloody distempers that are now in our body politic?—Mr. Speaker, I will tell you a passage I heard from a judge in the King's Bench. There was a poor man committed by the lords of the council, for refusing to submit to a project; and having attended a long time at the King's Bench bar, upon his habeas corpus, and, at last, pressing very earnestly to be bailed, the judge said to the rest of his brethren, 'Come, brethren,' said he, 'let us bail him, for they begin to say in town, that the judges have overthrown the law, and the bishops the gospel.'—Mr. Speaker, I would not be misunderstood in what I have said, for there are some of both functions and professions, that I highly honour and reverence in my heart, for their wisdoms and integrities: but, I may say it, for I am sure we have all felt it, that there are some of both functions and professions that have been the authors and causers of all the miseries, ruins, and calamities that are now upon us.—Mr. Speaker, this is the age; this is the age, Mr. Speaker, that hath produced and brought forth Achitophels, Hannans, Woolseys, Empsons and Dudleyes, Tresilians and Belknapps, vipers and monsters of all sorts. And I doubt not but, when his majesty shall be truly informed of such matters as we are able to charge them withal, we shall have the same justice against these which heretofore hath been against their predecessors, in whose wicked steps they have trodden. And therefore, Mr. Speaker, to put ourselves into a way for our redress and relief, I conceive it were fit that a committee might be named to take these Petitions that have now been read, and all others of the like nature, into their consideration; to the end that the parties grieved may have just repair for their Grievances; and that, out of them, laws may be contrived and framed for the preventing of the like mischiefs for the future.

Nov. 10. Sir Edward Dering, member for Kent, spake thus: 'Mr. Speaker; Yesterday the great affairs of this house did borrow all the time allotted to the grand committee for Religion. I am sorry that having but half a day in a whole week, we have lost that. Mr. Speaker, it hath pleased God to put into the heart of his majesty (for the king's heart is in the hand of the Lord) once more to assemble us in a senate, to consult upon the unhappy distractions, the sad dangers, and the much feared ruins of this late flourishing church and kingdom. God be praised both for his goodness, and for his severity, whereby he hath impelled this meeting; and humble thanks unto his majesty, whose parental care of us his subjects, is willing to relieve us. The sufferings that we have undergone are reducible to two heads: 1. concerning the Church: 2. belonging to the Commonwealth. The first of these must have the first fruits of this parliament, as being the first in weight and worth, and more immediate to the honour of God and his glory; every drachm whereof is worth the whole weight of a kingdom. The Commonwealth, it is true, is full of apparent dangers. The sword is come home unto us, and the two twin nations, united together under one royal head, brethren together in the bowels and the bosom of the same island; and, which is above all, imbranded together with the same religion (I say the same religion) are, by a devilish machination, like to be fatally embroiled in each other's blood, ready to dig each other's grave; quantillum absint?—For other Grievances also, the poor disheartened subject sadly groans, not able to distinguish betwixt power and law; and, with a weeping heart no question, hath prayed for this hour; in hope to be relieved, and to know hereafter whether anything he hath, besides his poor part and portion of the common air he breathes, may be truly called his own. These, Mr. Speaker, and many others do deserve, and must shortly have our deep regard; but suogradu, not in the first place. There is unum necessarium above all our worldly sufferings and dangers, Religion, the immediate service due unto the honour of Almighty God. And herein let us all be confident, that all our consultations will prove unprosperous, if we put any determination before that of Religion. For my part, let the sword reach from the north to the south, and a general perdition of all our remaining right and safety threaten us in open view; it shall be so far from making me to decline the first settling of Religion, that I shall ever argue, and rather conclude it thus. The more great, the more imminent our perils of this world are, the stronger and quicker ought our care to be for the glory of God and the pure law of our souls.—If then, Mr. Speaker, it may pass with full allowance, that all our cares may give way unto the treaty of Religion, I will reduce that also to be considered under two heads; first, of Ecclesiastic Persons, then of Ecclesiastic Causes. Let no man start or be affrighted at the imagined length of this consultation; it will not, it cannot take up so much time as it is worth. This is God's and the king's, this is God's and the kingdom's, nay, this is God's and the two kingdoms cause. And therefore, Mr. Speaker, my humble motion is, That we may all of us seriously, speedily, and heartily, enter upon this, the best, the greatest, the most important cause we can treat of.—Now Mr. Speaker, in pursuit of my own motion, and to make a little entrance into this great affair, I will present unto you the Petition of a poor oppressed minister in the county of Kent: a man orthodox in his doctrine, conformable in his life, and as laborious in the ministry as any we have, or I do know. He is now a sufferer, as all good men are, under the general obloquy of a Puritan; as, with other things, was excellently delivered by that silver trumpeter* at the bar. The pursuivant watches his door, and divides him and his cure asunder, to both their griefs; for it is not with him, perhaps, as with some that set the pursuivant at work, glad of an excuse to be out of their pulpit; no, it is his delight to preach. About a week since I went over to Lambeth, to move that great bishop (too great indeed) to take this danger off from this minister, and to recall the pursuivant: and, withal, I did undertake for Mr. Wilson (for so your petitioner is called) that he should answer his accusers in any of the king's courts at Westminster. The bishop made me answer, as near as I can remember, in hæc verba, 'I am sure that he will not be absent from his cure a twelvemonth together, and then, I doubt not but once in a year we shall have him.' This was all I could obtain; but I hope, by the help of this house, before this year of threats run round, his grace will either have more grace, or no grace at all: for our manifold griefs do fill a mighty and a vast circumference; yet so, that from every part our lines of sorrow do lead unto him, and point at him the center, from whence our miseries in this church, and many of them in the commonwealth, do flow.'

Sir John Wray, member for Lincolnshire, made the following speech: † 'Mr. Speaker; It was well observed by my lord keeper, 'That a multiplying glass may deceive; but the right English glass of the commonwealth, never.' In which I discern so comely and active a motion, that, out of all question, some great work is here to be done, something extraordinary is here to be decreed; or else God and the king, beyond all our expectations, at the last breath, would never so soon have cemented us again, to meet in this great council. Mr. Speaker, what an happy sight will it be to see the king and his people accord? A threefold cord is not easily broken; and I hope king Charles's threefold kingdoms shall never be so divided, as to break in pieces. God knows the divisions of Great Britain have half untwisted our long union, and I fear God is angry with our national lukewarm temper: the zeal of this house hath not kindled that flame in our hearts, which our seeming good actions have blown abroad; much like the walking of a ghost or lifeless body, which affrights many, but pleases no beholder. 'Omnia honesta opera voluntas inchoat?' It is the heart, or will, which gives the beginning to every good action, and I hope our constant resolutions will be to settle religion in its splendor and purity, by pulling Dragon from the altar, and whipping the buyers and sellers out of the Temple; 'pars prima bonitatis est velle fieri bonum;' the first part of goodness is to have the will of being good. God knows all our hearts, and takes notice of our inward resolutions, and for what ends we come hither; if to propagate and advance his glory and gospel, blessed shall this parliament and nation be, and then most happy we, whose God is the Lord; all things shall work together for our good: for, Mr. Speaker, he that turns the hearts of kings like the rivers of waters, will make the king and his kingdoms all of one mind. Long live king Charles the Great, and his numerous royal issue, to defend the true faith; which will protect and keep him and his safe on his father's throne. Never king gave more full content to his people, than his maj. now hath done; and, I hope, never subjects came with better hearts and affections to their king and country than we do. Let it then appear, by our outward actions and practice, that our inward obedience, both of heart and hand, is true, loyal, and current coin, not false nor counterfeit; for 'Nemo veraciter dicit, volo, qui non facit illud quod potest;' no man truly says, I am in will and heart resolved, unless, according to his ability, he endeavour to perform his resolution; which, to speak the hearts of us all in this renowned synod, I am confident is fully fixed upon the true reformation of all disorders and innovations in church or religion, and upon the well uniting and close rejoining of the now dislocated Great Britain: for, let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that, God be thanked, it is but out of joint, and may be yet well set by the skillful surgeons of this honourable house; to whose loving and christian care, and to whose tender and upright hands I leave it, only with this avise, let brotherly love continue, and be constant and of good courage; for the Keeper of Israel, who neither slumbers nor sleeps, who delivered us from Rome's November Powder-blast, will, no doubt, still preserve his anointed, our gracious king, and us, his loyal subjects, from all dangers of fire or sword; for si Deus nobiscum quis contra nos?

The Collection of Speeches before cited, gives us the following speech of lord Digby, without date; but it appears to have been spoken about the beginning of the session.

Lord Digby rose and said:—'Mr. Speaker; This happy meeting is to bemoan and redress the unhappy state of this commonwealth. Let me have, I beseech you, your leave to give you, in a word, a short view of our griefs, then see whence they flow. Our Laws, our Liberties, our Lives, and, which is the life of all, our Religion; all which have been, by the endeavours of so many ages, secured, and made so much our own, can scarcely now be called ours. Our Laws, the only sinews and ligaments of our estates, which should run in an even stream, are now made to disdain their banks, and to overflow and drown those fields, which they should gently refresh; our Liberties, the very spirit and essence of our wealth, which should differ us from slaves, and speak us Englishmen, are torn away by them, who, even while they take them from us, cannot but confess they are our proper dues. Are not our lives in danger, when a provoked enemy, disguised like a friend, is as it were suffered (because indirectly and in vain resisted) to come almost into our bosom, to rifle some of their goods, others of their loyalty, which perhaps they could not, neither would have touched, might we, with united force, have resisted. And lastly, which is the soul of all our grievances, our Religion, which should have been our cordial in all our distempers, like a forced virgin, laments ever that her pure innocence is taken from her: and sure all these effects must have their causes.—That we have just and wise laws, we may thank those good kings that made them; the settled exposition of just circumscribed laws, to bind and defend the subject, we owe to the judges of former times; and that they are so well framed and useful as to contain enough to make a good king and people perfectly safe and happy.—What do we owe to those grave counsellors, who sat here before us, and that outlive the malice of some unbounded spirits? We are beholden to them for reprieving our laws from ruin, and their lives and fortunes; we call them ours because we are freely born to them, as to the air we breathe in; we claim them, and should possess them under the protection of our gracious king, who is their great patron, and disposes them not inconsiderately; but by the advice of those learned expositors of them, the judges, and those whom he trusts to be his great and faithful counsellors. If these pervert the ground and meaning of the law, and contract the power of it, or make it speak louder or softer, as they themselves are tuned for it, the blame should deservedly fall on those mistaken ministers, who are the base betrayers of his majesty's honour, and his people's rights; to vindicate which, necessity hath here assembled you.—Mr. Speaker, is not his offence and malice as great who should undermine my tenure, and surreptitiously deprive me of my evidence by which I hold my inheritance, as he who, by violence, should wrest it from me? The Scots we have heard branded as Traitors because they have, contrary to the law of na tions, and their loyalty, invaded our kingdom in arms; what other title have they merited, who have invaded our laws and liberties, the precious evidence by which we should freely enjoy ourselves and our estates. The first we may resist and drive forth by united force, and it will be called piety to the king and country; if force be laid against the other, it will be stiled Rebellion.—What now remains but that we should use the law; which, because it hath been inverted and turned against us, contrary to its own natural and plain disposition, should now right us and itself against our adversaries. Surely the law is not so weak and improvident, to take care for others, and never provide for its own defence against those (be they peers or people) that have abused it. If we examine the law well, it will tell us what hath been the reward of such ambitious men, as have monopolized and abused the king's authority; what hath been the punishment of such as have betrayed the well-meaning subject to the king's displeasure, and his prince's counsel to his enemies; what they deserve, who have raised mountains of monopolies, heaps of impositions, oceans of grievances; what hath been the punishment of such as belied justice and their conscience, and have made truth and honesty out of fashion.—And lastly, if no penalty be found for these, surely there is some for such as have so disguised religion in fantastic dresses, that heaven and earth cannot but be angry to see it; and, in their politic pride, have been so long moulding a new state, and a new old church for their own advantage, till they have, by their too much order, put all out of frame, and made us objects of pity, and themselves of hate. What if, for these innovations, we incorporate an exemplary punishment? These are the ground-work of our miseries: and surely, Mr. Speaker, there are too many of all these sorts, which, like envious clouds, hinder us from the gracious shine our sun intends us; therefore, for his greater lustre, and our more assured comfort, let us endeavour to remove these interposers; that he may freely see into his people's bosoms, and read, in their hearts, firm characters of loyalty and glad obedience; which the practices of these latter times have endeavoured to obliterate, but in vain.—I shall not dare to borrow one minute more; but I shall now end, though I have but new begun. If we consider the just extent of our Grievances, the deep search of which wound I leave to better abilities (and I beseech you think not that I sigh out these complaints, undertaking to instruct the grave council of this great assembly); my infant advice presumes not to reach so high: it is but to let you see how much the slightest parts of this abused commonwealth, is not only made sensible of our wrongs, but that what we feel is far exceeded by the numberless number of our just fears, which should, before this time, have utterly distracted us, had not our great Physician now at length applied his sovereign remedy, to keep up our fainting hopes, by which we must either stand or fall.

We meet with the following speech of Sir Francis Seymour,* member for Marlborough, in this month of November, although the day is not mentioned.

Sir Francis Seymour said:—' Mr. Speaker; This great council, as Tully said of the senate of Rome, is the soul of the commonwealth; wherein one may hear and see all the grievances of the subject; and in the multitude of such counsellors is safety. Amongst whom the greatest privilege is liberty of speech: and therefore I humbly offer it unto you, to take into consideration, what wrong hath been done herein; what judgments have been against the members of this house for speaking nothing but what concerned the good of the commonwealth; which said judgments have been against law and reason, and without precedent. What law or reason is there that a parliament, which is the highest of all courts, should be questioned by inferior courts and judges; as if the Common-Pleas should question the King's Bench, or the Chancery be questioned by either of them? Perhaps the authors of it have nature to plead for them; which, indeed, teacheth every man to preserve himself. This perhaps makes them advance a proposition, which, otherwise, must condemn themselves. Such things have been done to maintain their proceedings, as not only trench upon the liberties of parliament, but also upon the liberties of the whole commonwealth; wherein I had rather suffer for speaking the truth, than the truth should suffer for want of my speaking. Where was there ever more piety in a prince, and more loyalty in subjects, and yet what commonwealth ever suffered like this? His maj. is the sun, which, though it ever shines alike in itself gloriously; yet, by reason of clouds, many times doth not appear; and if his maj. by reason of bad counsellors, doth not appear in such splendor, let us labour to clear those clouds: what will it avail us if the fountain be clear, if the streams that issue therefrom be not so also?—I will instance, Mr. Speaker, in some particulars. If we look into the face of Religion, that is out-faced; and such as heretofore durst not appear, now come boldly into our houses, as if they had a declared toleration; I mean the seminary priests; who, tho' they have less power, yet have they not less malice; but more, so long as the Pope has his agents amongst us. See we not how they go to Somerset-house and St. James's with too much countenance? These are the enemies of the church without the church: I wish we had none within who pull down churches, and I am sure they build none up again: amongst which are our non-residents, who overway all by worldly preferences and many livings.—Christ made it the touchstone of Peter's love unto him, to feed his sheep and lambs; but these men look at their own private gains; not taking pains for their own double honours which are daily gotten. What thing is there more against reason and nature, than for one man to have above one wife, and for one shepherd to have more than one sheepfold? These are dumb dogs that cannot speak a word for God; of whom the people may seek spiritual food, but can find none. Others there are that preach, yet it is not the gospel, but themselves:—"That the king hath an unlimited power, and the subject no property in his goods." These are bad divines, and worse and more ignorant statesmen; who, under the name of Puritans, condemn all who truly profess religion. There are surely many, who, under a form of godliness, cloak impiety; but to teach that a man can be too holy, is the doctrine of devils. And now, for fear I have been over-long, I will speak of the subjects liberties; wherein I remember what was confirmed unto us by the word of a king: and God forbid that I, or any other, should imagine that the king did otherwise than he then granted us. But some there be that have betrayed the king unto himself; and so committed worse treason than those who betray him to others; who tell him his prerogative is above all laws, and that his subjects are but slaves: whereby the king is neither preserved in honour, nor the commonwealth in safety."

Proceedings of the Lords relating to the searching the Studies and Pockets of two Peers. Nov. 10. A motion was made in the lords, "That whereas two lords of this high and honourable court have had their Studies and Pockets searched for Papers, consideration might be had, whether it be not a breach of privilege; especially it being done soon after the dissolution of the last parliament, and within the time of privilege of parliament." Upon this the earl of Warwick and lord Brooke were appointed to declare the manner of it; and, after their lordships had made a full relation of it, it was agreed, That sir Wm. Beecher should appear at the bar of the house as a delinquent until he produced his warrants, and cleared himself.—The same day sir W. Beecher was brought to the bar, when the lord keeper demanded of him, By what warrant or direction he did search and carry away the papers of the aforesaid peers, &c. Sir William answered, That he was a clerk of his majesty's privy council, and sworn to his majesty's service; and therefore desired their lordships would give him leave to acquaint the king with it before he answered. Being ordered to withdraw, the lords, after much debate, had him called in again; when the lord keeper was directed again to ask him to show his warrant, and blamed him for naming the king in the business, no such thing being asked him, that he still refused to give a direct answer till the king was made acquainted with it.

Upon this he was again ordered to withdraw; and, after more consideration, he was called in, when the lord keeper told him, That the lords did take him to be the chief actor of the fact, and were resolved to proceed against him as the principal; and accordingly, to inflict punishment upon him, unless he then shewed by what warrant he did it. His answer was much the same as before; and he added, That he must do his duty to his majesty, and suffer what their lordships pleased to lay upon him.

The lords were, upon this, at a loss what to do with him; and, sir William being once more commanded to withdraw, they came to this Resolution, "That sir Wm. Beecher hath endeavoured to interest the king in this matter, and hath not dealt clearly or fairly with them; the earl of Warwick and lord Brooke having both affirmed, That they did see warrants in his hands, signed by the secretaries of state; and therefore it aggravated his offence in using his majesty's name, when he might have put it upon the secretaries. It was therefore ordered, That Sir Wm. Beecher should stand committed for the said offence."

But it appearing dangerous to commit one of the king's servants, the lords thought proper to try him once again; and he was called in and interrogated on the four following Questions: "1. Whether he did search the Studies and Pockets of the earl of Warwick and the lord Brooke? 2. Whether he did not shew the warrants to the said lords? 3. What names were subscribed to the warrants? 4. Where those warrants are?" Upon which, and being threatened with commitment for contempt, sir William confessed all, and that the warrants were in his custody, signed by the two secretaries of state. It was ordered, That the gentleman usher should go along with him, but not suffer any one to speak to him, going or coming to the house. Being returned, the warrants were produced and read, when they appeared signed by sir Francis Windebank and sir Henry Vane, both secretaries of state. And it was thought proper to commit sir William to the Fleet for giving the house so much trouble.—But these two secretaries being both members of the house of commons, the lords sent a Message to that house to desire a conference, to acquaint them with the business; and that, in the warrants, signed as aforesaid, there was no particular act specified; but before they proceeded to seek reparation for this injury done to the two lords, they thought fit to acquaint the commons with it, in order to keep up the good correspondency and respect between the two houses.—Yet, though the conference was held, and the commons made acquainted with the business, nothing further was done in it; and, two days after, sir Wm. Beecher, on his humble petition to the lords, acknowledging his error, was released.

Nov. 12. The commons sent up to acquaint the lords, that they were ready to attend them in a committee, that afternoon, about the Treaty at Ripon and York; which was agreed to by the lords.—Some further evidences were examined against secretary Windebank, and he was desired to withdraw. On the Comptroller of the Household's saying, 'That his majesty taking notice, &c.' it was observed the great inconvenience that might fall upon this house, if his maj. should be informed of any thing in agitation there, before it was determined; therefore it was moved, That some course might be taken for preventing that inconvenience.

Nov. 18. Resolved, upon the question, That those lords who were petitioners to the king at York, a copy of which petition was then read, had done nothing but what was legal, just, and expedient, for the good of the king and kingdom.

Remonstrance from the Parliament of Ireland. Nov. 20. Mr. Whistler reported from the committee for Irish Affairs, "That the parliament of that kingdom had set forth a Remonstrance; wherein it appeared, that trading was destroyed; industry disheartened; new and unlawful impositions were laid; the arbitrary determination of all causes for goods, lands, and possessions, by petitions and acts at the council table, where no writ of error can lie, and thereby the king loseth a fine: That his majesty's gracious disposition for the good of the kingdom is kept from them: that there is a Monopoly of the sole trade of tobacco, of more gain to the parties interested therein, than the king's whole revenue in Ireland; the destroying the plantation of Londonderry; the exorbitant power of the high commission, which crieth loud in all the three kingdoms; the proclamation, forbidding any departing thence for England, without licence, and paying dear for it; the many Subsidies given and money raised for the king, and yet he is still in debt; they therefore demand an account of his treasure, and desire present redress, or access to his majesty."

Orders respecting the Commons receiving the Communion. Sir Rob. Harley reported from the committee appointed to settle matters about the members receiving the Communion, That they had resolved none should sit in the house but those who should take the sacrament; and that this was intended for the discovery of papists amongst them: that the committee thought fit that some confession of sin, renunciation of the pope, &c. should be made, by such as are suspected, as by those that were papists, and now go to church; or are their wives papists; or bring up their children in popery; or keep a considerable number of papists for their servants; and if they here know such to give notice of their names: that two members of this house were required to go to the dean of Westminster,* to intimate to him, from the house, that it was desired the elements might be consecrated upon a Communion Table, standing in the church, according to the rubrick, and to have the table removed from the altar. The dean gave this answer, That it should be removed according to the desire of the house, with further respect to the house, That though he would do greater service to them than this, yet he would do as much as this for any parish in his diocese, that desired it."

Nov. 23. A committee for Religion having been appointed, divers reports were made to the house, and many speeches upon that topic ensued. The first we find was spoke by sir Edward Dering,* in the committee, Mr. White being in the chair, which we here subjoin:

Sir Edw. Dering rose and said:—"Mr. White; You have many private petitions, give me leave, by word of mouth, to interpose one more general, which thus you may receive. God's true religion is violently invaded by two seeming enemies: but indeed they are, like Herod and Pilate, fast friends for the destruction of truth. I mean the Papists for one party, and our Prelating Faction for the other. Between these two in their several progress, I observe the concurrence of some few parallels, fit, as I conceive, to be represented to this committee. First, with the Papists, there is a severe inquisition; and with us, as it is used, there is a bitter high commission; both these, contra fas & jus, are judges in their own cause; yet herein their inquisitors are better than our high commissioners: they, for ought I ever heard, do not, severe in suos, punish for delinquents and offenders, such as profess and practice, according to the religion established by the laws of the land where they live.—But with us how many poor distressed ministers, nay how many scores of them, in a few years past, have been suspended, degraded, deprived, and excommunicated, not guilty of the breach of any of our established laws. The petitions of many are here with us, more are coming: all their prayers are in Heaven for redress.—Secondly, with the Papists, there is a mysterious artifice, I mean their index expurgatorius, whereby they clip the tongues of such witnesses whose evidence they do not like. To this I parallel our late imprimatur, licenses for the press, so handled, that truth is suppressed, and popish pamphlets fly abroad cum privilegio: witness the audacious and libelling pamphlets against true religion, written by Pocklington, Heylin, Dow, Cosins, Shelford, Swan, Reeves, Yates, Hausted, Sparrow, Brown, Roberts. Many more: I name no bishops, but I add, &c.—Nay, they are already grown so bold in this new trade, that the most learned labours of our antient and best divines must now be corrected and defaced with a deleator, by the supercilious pen of my lord's young chaplain; fit perhaps for the technical arts, but unfit to hold the chair of divinity. But herein the Roman index is better than are our English licensors: they thereby do preserve the current of their own established doctrine;

* From a quarto pamphlet, published by himself, containing a collection of his speeches "some formerly printed, and divers more now added, in vindication of his name from want and wilful calumny," &c. London, 1642.

a point of wisdom. But, with us, our innovators, by this artifice, do alter our settled doctrines: nay, they do subinduce points repugnant and contrariant. And this I dare assume upon myself to prove.—One parallel more I have, and that is this; among the Papists there is one supreme Pope, supreme in honour, in order, and in power; from whose judgment there is no appeal. I confess, Mr. Chairman, I cannot altogether match a Pope with a Pope: yet one of the antient titles of our English primate was alterius orbis papa; but thus far I can go, ex ore suo; it is in print: he pleads fair for a patriarchate; and for such an one whose judgment he, beforehand, professeth ought to be final; and then, I am sure, it ought to be unerring. Put these together, and you shall find that the final determination of a patriarch will want very little of a Pope, and then we may say

— Mutato nomine de te

Fabula narratur —

He pleads popeship under the name of a patriarch; and I much fear lest the end and top of his patriarchal plea may be as that of cardinal Pole, his predecessor, who would have two heads, one caput regale, another caput sacerdotale: a proud parallel, to set up the mitre as high as the crown. But herein I shall be free and clear, if one there must be, be it a Pope, be it a Patriarch; this I resolve upon for my own choice, procul a Jove, procul a Fulmine; I had rather serve one as far off as Tyber, then to have him come so near me as the Thames. A Pope at Rome will do me less hurt than a Patriarch may do at Lambeth.—I have done; and, for this third parallel, I submit it to the wisdom and consideration of this grand committee for Religion; in the mean time I do ground my motion upon the former two, and it is this in brief: That you would please to select a sub-committee of a few, and to empower them for the discovery of the numbers of oppressed ministers under the bishops tyranny for these ten years last past. We have the complaint of some, but more are silent; some are patient and will not complain, others are fearful and dare not; many are beyond sea and cannot complain. And, in the second place, that the sub-committee may examine the printers, what books, by bad licenses, have been corruptly issued forth; and what good books have been, like good ministers, silenced, clipped, or cropped. The work, I conceive, will not be difficult, but will quickly return into your hand full of weight. And this is my motion.

Sir John Wray, spoke as follows:—Mr. Speaker; By the report made from the committee of Religion, you may see to what an exorbitant height Popery is grown; and yet how slowly we go on to suppress it: I fear God is displeased with us, or else no disaster should have prevented the sealing of our covenant, when intended; and I hope it shall be performed the next Sabbath. And our fast been accepted, and our outward humiliation cordial, no blow should have distracted our preparations. Mr. Speaker, if we had taken the good counsel of our teachers at the fast, and believed their report, we had done well; and by this time, no doubt, we might have found out Achan with his wedge of gold and Babylonish garments; but we have spent our time only in pilling off the bark, and snatching the boughs and the branches of popery, and that will do no good; for they will grow thicker and harder; what must we do then, to preserve our religion safe and sound, to us and our posterity, that our golden candlestick be not removed? Why, the only way is to fall to our work in earnest, and lay the axe to the root, to unloose the long and deep fangs of superstition and Popery; which being once done, the bark will soon fall down. Let us then endeavour a thorough reformation; for if it be imperfect, it will prove the seed of dissolution, if not dissolution; which God forbid: and, to prevent that, I shall humbly move, That the groves and high places of idolatry may be removed, and pulled down, and then God's wrath against England will be appeased; until then, never.
